Boston Public Library
3 9999 10588 686 3

AP2
.N2

TRUSTEES OF THE
PUBLIC LIBRARY
OF THE CITY OF BOSTON
1852 1878

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, & ART

* 7671.3
Vol. 44
1887

VOLUME XLIV

FROM JANUARY 1, 1887, TO JUNE 30, 1887

7175
3

NEW YORK
THE EVENING POST PUBLISHING COMPANY
1887

Michigan, Gov. Luce on carrying weapons, 24, decline in Republican majority, 305, 376, strong vote for prohibition amendment, 376, liquor-tax bill, 418, local option and taxation laws, 519—Maine Constitution vs. United States excise duty, 499 — Massachusetts, Gov. Ames on the Sunday laws, 24, Berkshire Republican Club, 239, Legislature passes bill exempting soldiers from civil-service examinations, 481, 519, passes no prohibition amendment, 519—Missouri Legislature refuses appropriation to militia, 218—Milwaukee, defeat of Socialists at the polls, 305—Morocco, American consul removed, 131—Secretary Manning's letter on the fisheries, 107, reply as to greenbacks and silver, 108—Mahone for Chairman of National Republican Committee, 284—Levi P. Morton defeated for Senator, 65—Rev. Dr. McGlynn will not go to Rome, 25, 500, tribute from his flock, 43, Archbishop Corrigan's statement, 66, case not likely to produce a schism, 109, on the Catholic support of Blaine, 375, 396, Anti-Poverty Society, 396.

New York, State: Hiscock elected Senator, 65, Senate passes Labor-Day Bill, 66, Legislature favors Hill or Blaine for President, 108, bill to tax short sales of stocks, 132, woman suffrage bill passed (Senate), 155, defeated (House), 219, Saturday holiday bill, 175, Field code passed by the Assembly, 198, High License Bill passed by Assembly, 259, and Senate, 283, Labor bills, 396, Senate will not confirm Gov. Hill's nominations, 283, Prison Labor Reform Commission on jute bag manufacture, 480; City: Fatty Walsh's example, 2, 3, Excise Commissioners to restrict licenses, 108, Republican Club Sherman boom, 133, Liquor-dealers' meeting against the High License Bill, 155, J. C. Bayles made President Board of Health, 240, garbage collecting, 261, want of back alleys, 377, Mayor Hewitt's cabinet meetings, 354, enforcement of Sunday liquor law, 397, Anti-Saloon Republican meeting, 459 —N. Y. World on Cleveland's renomination, 89—N. Y. Tribune on Cleveland's election, 305, on the state of the Atlanta, 307—New Jersey Senatorial contest ended, 198, Chancellor Runyon not reappointed, 284—New Mexico, partisan plans to make a State of, 2—Nevada lottery vetoed, 284—North Carolina, coalition Speaker for House, 24—National Labor party in opposition to Henry George, 132.

O'Brien, Mayor, Boston, sound vetoes, 2—William O'Brien cuts the Henry-Georgites, 481.

Pennsylvania, high-license law, 419—Philadelphia Mayor under new charter, 283, Philadelphia Brigade would restore Confederate battle-flags, 519—Consul-General Porch removed, 108—Tom Platt offers to resign Quarantine Commissionership, 460 — Pelletier claim against Hayti, 131, 132—Pensions for those who offered to serve, 89, Pension Bill pushed by Grand Army, 499, Powderly endorses the Declaration of Independence, 306, and orders boycotting the carpet-weavers, 480—Pinkerton's men, legislation against, 66, District-Attorney Martine on, 154, Missouri legislation promotive of, 217—President's right to sign bills after Congress adjourns, 197—Postal Savings Bank Bill's prospects, 153—Prohibitionists organizing anew, 2—Printers' Protective Fraternity, 218—Pacific Railroads, proposed investigation of, 44.

Quay, Matthew S., nominated U. S. Senator from Penn., 24.

Rhode Island's experience with prohibition, 24, election carried by Democrats, 305, effect on Presidential election, 375, 396, civil-service bill introduced, 481—Richmond State on the Virginia compromise, 499, 500—Edmund Randolph's account with the U. S., 177—Theodore Roosevelt dinner in N. Y., 417—Sam. J. Randall's reelection secured by Republican district-ing, 259—Geo. Riddle shakes the dust of Boston from his feet, 331—Real-estate boom at the West, 306—Railroad vestibule train, 354.

South Carolina, more than ante-bellum prosperity, 3—W. P. St. John on silver limit, 1—Senator Sherman on the use of the surplus, 133, on Democratic neglect to reduce taxation, 217, speech at Nashville, 259, 541, to Philadelphia Young Republicans, 307, at Springfield, Ill., 479, 541, on sugar bounties, 520, on financial troubles from Cleveland Administration, 541—O. S. Straus, Minister to Turkey, 260—Jacob Sharp trial in N. Y., 481, 521, 542, 543 — State Department and the Tangier abuses, 23, trouble with Congress over estimates, 176, account against Edmund Randolph, 176, 177—Supreme Court, U. S., decision on salesmen tax, 219 — Silver, Louisville Courier-Journal on discrimination against, 66, silver market not controllable by New York, 459, increase of silver certificates, 541—Society's responsibility for burglars, 109—Saloons diminished by high license, 259—Socialist apostles' extravagance, 25—Strikes, legislation needed for, 88, House Committee report on Southwestern strike, 198, silversmiths' strike in N. Y., 480, bricklayers', Chicago, 542—Steel-rail prices permit importation, 330.

Tennessee, Governor and Speaker of House, youthful, 24, House doubles school fund, 218, Senate substitutes an equivalent measure, 261—Texas Prohibition campaign, 393, stringent liquor law, 438—T. De Witt Talmage plagiarized by Canon Fleming, 460—Craig Tolliver killed, 541—Trade Dollar Bill ought to be vetoed, 153—Treasury on fresh fish, 23, 24, surplus reduction by anticipating interest, 395, by bond purchases, 542—Tornado refuge caves, 354.

Union Pacific R. R. and steel-rail monopolists, 23—Union Labor Party of New York, 520.

Virginia, Tazewell Court-house affray, 89, drummer license coupon decision by Judge Bond, 108, conference with creditors, 284, abortive, 417, Richmond State's apology, 499, 500—Vermont Central railroad accident, 109—Judge Van Vorst retires, 3—Cornelius Vanderbilt gives the "Horse Fair" to the Metropolitan Museum, 307.

West Virginia, a motherless lyncher, 133—Wisconsin abolishes its Board of Immigration, 177—Washington Territory, Chinese persecutions squelched by Governor, 397—Judge W. B. Woods deceased, 418—Western Union Telegraph unjustly taxed by N. Y., 418.

Yale Mugwumps, 521.

ABROAD.

GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND:—Death of Lord Iddesleigh, 45, Mr. Goschen defeated at Liverpool, 89, Parnell's amendment to address to the Queen lost, 133—Commission of Inquiry's report on Irish land question, 177—Salisbury Ministry floundering, 219—Corporation of City of London manufactures public sentiment, 241—New Coercion Bill, 261, 285, not new, as Mr. Bryce shows, 307—Chamberlain's violent speech at Ayr, 331—Times prints alleged letter of Parnell's sympathizing with the Phœnix Park assassins, 331, Gladstone's testimony, 377, Parnell's ill-health, 419—Irish outrages and the bloody shirt, 355—Irish Woollen Manufacturing Company to seek American custom, 376—Goschen proposes to reduce the sinking-fund, 395—Board of Trade to report on overrunning by foreign workmen, 500—Quarrel with Hayti over Tortoise Island, 355—Convention with Turkey for evacuation of Egypt, 501—Walter Besant on publishers and authors, 241—British emigration increasing, 240—Fall of death-rate, 240, in London, 377—Working of Corrupt Practices Act, 177—Marriage rate not advancing with cheap food, clerical improvidence, 155—Canon Fleming borrows from Talmage, 460—Spectator on the anti-Irish party in the U. S., 481—Economist on long-haul and short-haul, 1—W. H. Mallock on the labor problem, 241—Cardinal Manning supports Knights of Labor, 376 —Wear of gold coinage, 419—Jewish incomes in the London community, 461—Buffalo Bill a London lion, 521.

FRANCE:—Overeducation of girls in Paris, 25—Earthquake on the Mediterranean Coast, 177—Moderation in the Schnaebelé affair, 355—Goblet Ministry beaten on the budget, 419, question of Boulanger's retention as war minister, 439, 461, Rouvier Ministry sans Boulanger, 461.

BELGIUM:—Labor troubles and suffrage agitation, 439—Belgian Liberal programme, 501.

SWITZERLAND:—Government voted the monopoly of liquor making and sale, 460.

GERMANY:—Bismarck and Moltke's speeches on the Army Bill, 45, danger of crying war to influence the elections, 109, 155, Government victorious, 155, 219—Renewal of triple alliance with Austria-Hungary and Italy, 219—Bismarck's peaceful career since 1871, 355 —Schnaebelé arrest, 355.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY: Andrássy's bargain with Gortchakoff in 1877, 501—Hungarian Parliament's obsequious acts, 501.

ITALY: Earthquake on the Riviera, 177—Question of the Pope's successor, 199—Renewal of alliance with Germany and Austria-Hungary, 219.

BULGARIA:—Revolutionary outbreaks, 199.

INDIA:—Treasure trove of the Maharajah of Gwalior, 419.

CANADA:—Wm. O'Brien and the Orangemen, 419, mobs, 439.

MEXICO:—Law making citizens of foreigners, 23, question of Diaz's successor, 199, 285, attitude of the Diario and of Diaz, 355.

AFRICA:—Italians defeated at Massowah by Abyssinians, 89, 109—American consular abuses at Tangier broken up, 354.

Notes.

Announcements, 13, 34, 53, 77, 98, 118, 143, 164, 186, 207, 230, 250, 272, 283, 318, 343, 364, 386, 404, 426, 449, 470, 490, 508, 530, 553—Aristotle's Rhetoric, Welldon's translation, 233—G. B. Airy on the Roman dominion in S. E. Britain, 511—E. Atkinson on labor's share of profit, 320—Astor Library increase and Catalogue, 165—American Annual Catalogue, 320.

Browning, Robert, works on, by M. E. Burt and A. Symons, 36—Chas. Bigot's impressions of America, 121 —British Birds, Folk-lore of, 189—Battles and Leaders of the Civil War, 510—Boston Museum of Fine Arts, catalogue of Greek and Roman casts, 344—Bibliothèque Universelle, 100, 101, 406.

Cox, Sir G. W., Concise History of England, 36—Carlyle's garbling of Cromwell, 56—Caine's Coleridge, 472—Coleridge's "Dejection" and Wordsworth, 510—Benjamin Constant's Diary, 210, 367—Prof. Conrad on a cultured proletariat, 555—Canadian Annual Register, 78—Coöperation in Minneapolis, 15, in New England, 209—Copyright entries in United States and England, T. W. Higginson on, 450.

Deschanel, É., lectures on French literature, 15—Maxime Du Camp and Le Livre, 472—Dunlap Society's publications, 78—Deutsch-Amerikanisches Magazin, 120.

Emin Bey in Equatorial Africa, 36—Ersch und Gruber's Encyklopädie, 79—Emerson's poetry criticised by Prof. C. C. Everett, 232—England, Sir G. W. Cox's Concise History of, 36, English governmental methods following the American, 188—Euphuists, Vollmöller's, 296—English Historical Review, 450.

Foster, Abby Kelley, deceased, 55—Paul Féval, deceased, 274—Prof. Willard Fiske's Icelandic book catalogue, 56—Franklin's Works edited by John Bigelow, 121, 531, 532—Judge Fornander's Polynesian researches, 428—French Academy reception of É. Hervé, 189, 210, feeling against M. Gréard, 210—Benedictine provincial histories reëdited, 296—Men of Letters series (Hachette's), 492.

Goethe's Italian diaries and correspondence, 101, correspondence with Zelter, 209, 210—Prof. Gneist on Irish autonomy, 232 — Lord Gifford's lectureship, 532—Greek in English, Goodell's, 274—German university demoralization in the 16th century, 233, university slang, 253—Government, text-books on, 144—Gazette Anecdotique, 493.

Hamilton, Alexander, works (Lodge's ed.) completed, 35 —Hamerton Higginson discussion on literary celebrity, 252—Wm. Hazlitt celebrated by Geo. Saintsbury, 345—J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps's Shakspere Tours, 492—Hindu mathematicians, 121, Hindûstânî textbook, 166—John Harvard's relation to John Rogers, 345, Harvard College Observatory report, 296, Harvard Law Review and Report of Organization of Law School Association, 366, Irish MSS.; report of Historical MSS. Commission, 209—Ixil language, Otto Stoll on, 472.

Junker, Dr. Wilhelm, African explorations, 56—J. Janssen on German university life in 16th century, 233—Jefferson and the Kentucky Resolutions of '98, 389—John Paul Jones's burial in France, 406.

Kraszewski, J. I., deceased, 406—M. Kempson's Taubatûn-nasûh, 166.

Laveleye's Balkan Peninsula translated, 405—Lick Observatory lenses transported, 233—"Lohengrin" in Paris, 451—Les Lettres et les Arts, 252, 321, 389, 511.

Marston's Works edited by Bullen, 450, 451—H. J. Morgan's Annual Register, 78—Col. Mallery's N. A. Indian Photographs, 366—Methuen, Mass., Public Library and catalogue, 345—Mauritius, population and industry of, 145—Milan and the statue of Napoleon III., 79 —Minneapolis coöperative industries, 15—Minusinsk Museum antiquities, 321—Modern Language Association at Baltimore, 55—Magazines for January, 14, February, 100, 120, 252, March, 188, 209, 252, 320, April, 252, 273, 274, 320, 345, May, 366, 388, June, 450, 471, 492, 510, July, 532, 554, 555.

Necrology of 1883, 36—New England Historic-Genealogical Register, 345.

Oil on troubled waters, antiquity of, 78, 531.

Poe, Edgar A., supposed satire by, 531—Hector Pessard's 'Mes Petits Papiers,' 511—Pascal, new edition of, 253—Pushkin's works edited by Morozoff, 428, 429—Piloty's pictures, copies sold for originals, 36—Prof. A. F. Pott on Carl Abel, 367.

Quarterly Journal of Economics, 100.

Racot, Adolphe, 493—Renan's New Studies in Religious History, 472—D. A. Rovinsky's Russian Iconography, 166—Rogers pedigree traced by H. F. Waters, 345—Russian popular pictures, 166—Roman dominion in S. E. Britain, 511.

Stanton, Henry B., deceased, 56—W. W. Story's Roba di Roma reëdited, 252—Léon Say on E. About, 15—Rémi Siméon's Nahuatl Dictionary, 555—Leslie Stephen's Dictionary of National Biography, 55, 295— Thos. Sinclair's 'Humanities,'79—Shakspere's Tours, 492, Outlines (7th ed.), 510—Otto Schroeder favors free orthography and grammar, 165, 166—Schuchardt's 'Romanisches und Keltisches,' 428—Otto Stoll on the Ixil language, 472—Selden Society founded, 428—St. Louis, Billon's Early Annals of, 145— Southwestern R. R. system strike, official history of, 145—Stock and bond issues in Europe and U. S., 189.

Taine, H., Napoleon Bonaparte, 296—Thackeray Letters in Scribner's, 273—Tolstoi described by George Kennan, 492, "Kingdom of Darkness," drama, 511, religious works, 532.

Usener, Prof., on St. Marina, 15—Octave Uzanne's Modern Binding, 555.

Vietor, Wilhelm, Elements of Phonetics, 274.

Ward, Geo. Cabot, deceased, 406—Virgil Williams's art thoughts, 320—E. P. Whipple on "desipient," 366—B. B. Warfield's introduction to N. T. Textual Criticism, 405—Wagner opera performances in Germany in 1885, 492.

Zola, Émile, new novel, 'La Terre,' 345.

Editorial and Miscellaneous Articles.

American Application of English Election Methods 359
Andover Decision, Some Bearings of.. 525
Anti-Poverty Society..... 380
Arbitration..... 112
Bachelors of Art..... 505
Battle-Flag Flurry..... 524
Beecher, Henry Ward..... 225
Beverly Incident..... 422
Churches, Vacations in..... 547
Church Union, Question of..... 485
Cleveland and the Republicans 264
Cleveland Has Done, What..... 202
Congress, Forty-ninth..... 202
Coöperation in England..... 526
Country Living for City People..... 204
Criminal Classes, Rule of the..... 159
Dawes on the Crisis 289
Demagogy, Ineffective..... 289
Democratic Preparations..... 244
Diamonds..... 424
Dirt Roads..... 466
Doubtful Remedy..... 29
Drink Bill, Formerly and Now..... 354
Dumb Legislation..... 464
England, Coöperation in..... 526
European Zollverein..... 546
Field Code at Albany..... 265
Fisheries Fallacies..... 443
Fishery Question, Edmunds's Report on..... 71
Forests as Playgrounds..... 505
French Crisis..... 444
German Opera Season..... 182
German vs. American University Salaries..... 7
Germany, Emigration from..... 245
Germany, Pope's Interference in..... 137
Getting their Eyes Open..... 335
Government on Business Principles.... 288
Gresham's, Judge, Decision in the Wabash Case..... 48
Home Rule and English Journalism... 444
Importance of the Finish..... 334
Indiana State Prison Investigation..... 224
Ingersoll's, Col., New England Mystery..... 548
Inter-State Commerce Bill will Work, How the..... 93
Inter-State Commerce Decision..... 524
Ironsides, After the, on a Tricycle. 311, 336
Judges, U. S. District, Salaries of..... 6
Jury System, Reform of our..... 546
Knights and the Trades..... 358
Labor Legislation..... 48
"Labor Problem"..... 112
Labor Reformers, Great Chance for.... 158
Linen Paper vs. Cotton Paper 115
Liquor, Taxed and Untaxed..... 266
Mexican Legislation, Some Recent..... 7
Missouri Demagogy..... 289
Money Power in Politics.....180, 204, 222
Mormon Theocracy, Decline of the..... 29
Mugwump Idea..... 381
Mugwumpism, Growth of..... 204
New York Assembly Committee and the Strikes..... 130
Next Party Issue..... 158
Normirofka, The..... 181
One Thing Needful..... 358
Pacific Coast and the Commerce Act... 400
Pennsylvania vs. Anthracite Coal Companies..... 222
Pension Bill Veto..... 136
Pensioners, Our Standing Army of..... 92
People Voted, How the..... 49
Pinkerton's Men 70
Pope's Interference in Germany 137
President's Hindrances, Some of the... 288
Prohibition as a Solvent of Parties..... 504
"Pulls"..... 223
Readjuster Incident..... 244
Reform, Progress of..... 422
Refunding the Debt..... 464
Rhode Island Politics..... 114
Rule of Honor..... 401
Saloons and Workingmen..... 158
Shameful Business..... 28
Sharples Portraits..... 49
Socialistic Platitudes..... 504
"Soldier Vote"..... 159
South and the Commerce Act..... 484
"Speeches, Great"..... 311
Sugar Bounties and Socialism 28
Sugar, Protection for..... 484
Supreme Court and Parties..... 442
Sweden, Secondary and Higher Education in..... 290
Taxation, Love of..... 180
Tobacco 6
Trades-Unions, Composition of the..... 400
Trusts and Confidences..... 380
United States District Judges, Salaries of..... 6
University Salaries, German vs. American..... 7
Victorian Jubilee..... 526
Virginia Coupon-Killing..... 113
Virginia, Failure to Compromise in.... 465
Wabash Case, Judge Gresham's Decision in..... 48
Wagner Letters, Some..... 266
Weather Bureau, Reorganization of the..... 70
Woman Suffrage in Operation..... 310

Special Correspondence.

Domestic—Bradford's Index to Clemencin's Commentary on Don Quixote..... 267, 292
Kentucky Resolutions in a New Light..... 382, 467
Spring Meeting of the American Oriental Society..... 423
West Indies—Notes on the W. I. Islands 337
England—Nebulous English Politics.... 50
The Land War in Ireland..... 51
Laborers' Allotment Grounds..... 72
Irish Juries, the Lord Mayor's Banquet, Evictions..... 94
The Late Lord Iddesleigh..... 138
Are Englishmen Interested in Politics?..... 160
Why has Interest in Politics Declined?..... 245
Five Years of the Land Law..... 183
British Politics and Society..... 226
Report of Lord Cooper's Commission..... 227
Introduction of the Jubilee Coercion Bill..... 313, 338
Moral Responsibility of Political Parties..... 314
The Conquest of Upper Burmah..... 339
Exhibition of Photographs at Liverpool 384
Questions for the Jubilee..... 401
The Warwickshire Laborer..... 468
Present Condition of Ireland..... 485
"Alcestis" in Oxford..... 506
Bodyke Evictions..... 527
France—A New View of La Bruyère.... 9
The First Mme. Guizot..... 30
A Rising French Critic..... 73
Dumas's "Francillon"..... 139
The Princesse de Ligne..... 183
The Rémusats..... 205
Scherer's Grimm..... 247
The Peace of Europe..... 292
Dumas on Victor Hugo..... 340
Flaubert's Correspondence..... 385
Moral of the Schnaebelé Affair..... 424
Marriage of Louis XV..... 445
France and the Armed Peace..... 487
Boissier's Mme. de Sévigné..... 528
Geffroy's Mme. de Maintenon..... 550
Italy—Daily and Periodical Press.....8, 139
Carducci..... 95
Italian Army, 1887..... 360
Cathedral of Orvieto..... 361
Duomo of Florence..... 507
First Pilgrimage to Caprera..... 548
Germany—Ibsen's "Spectres"..... 116
Weimar and the Goethe Gesellschaft—A New Faust..... 488

Occasional Correspondence.

A. B., Degree of..... 97, 163, 207
Advertisements, Disguised..... 163
American Ancestry..... 553
American Archæological Expedition to Italy..... 341, 361, 386, 426, 469
"American" Architecture..... 142
American Teacher in Ireland 97
Anderson's, R. B., Translation of Brandes..... 186
Anglo-Saxon Pirating..... 271, 293
Archæology at Athens..... 317
Archæology in the Mediterranean 341, 361, 386, 426, 469
Athens, Archæology at..... 317
Baltimore "Politics"..... 207
Beekman and Clinton Coats..... 426
Beverly Incident 447, 470, 508
"Billion"..... 490
Blaine? Why Not Forget..... 317
Blind Guide..... 162
"Blizzard"..... 271
Brazilian River Sources..... 117
Careless Author..... 250
Chicago, Results of Sanitary Inspection in..... 228, 249
Church Union, Question of..... 552
Cincinnati Election..... 341
Civil-Service Reform in Michigan..... 13
Civil Service Reform, The People Not Hostile to..... 33
Coeducation.—A Straw..... 404
Comparative Politics..... 75
Congress, Sectional Paralysis of..... 248
Conventual Pastimes..... 249, 316
Corrections 98 539
Cotton, John, The Wrong..... 163, 249, 269
Coxe's, Bishop, English Pallology 12, 97, 140, 185
Cranston Arms..... 447
Crime, Secret Sympathy with..... 13
Crotona, Excavations at.. ..... 341, 361, 386, 426, 469
Davis, Jefferson, Was He a Republiator?..... 207, 248
Disreputable Review, A..... 317
Divorce Statistics..... 249
Domestic Service 11, 33, 75
Elective System, Introduction of the 163, 228
Female Suffrage in Kansas..... 362
Female Suffrage, Progress of..... 362
Fisheries, The Administration and the. 98
French Finances..... 551
Gilman Arms..... 490
Goethe Society..... 508
History and the Group System..... 11, 33
Hoar, Senator, or Citizen..... 506
Immigration, How to Control..... 140
"Influential"..... 140
Inn, How to Keep an..... 508
Inter State Commerce Bill..... 52
"Is Being Built"..... 447
Israelite in Maryland, The First 479
Kansas, Woman Suffrage in..... 362
Katheder Socialists, A Question for..... 142
Kentucky State Convention and the President 403
Labor Vote in Philadelphia..... 162
Land Tenure, Ethics of..... 161
Lee's "Countrymen"..... 363, 403
Library, How to Collect a..117, 142, 163, 247
Literary Morality..... 33
Local-Option Village, A..... 363
Longevity, Extreme 490
Louisiana Lottery..... 402
Machine Candidates, A Bad Day for.... 529
Maryland, First Israelite in..... 470
Massachusetts, Woman Suffrage in..249, 269
Means and Ends..... 270
Medford, Mass., Brooks's History of.... 97
Metempsychosis, Something New on... 448
Michigan, Civil-Service Reform in..... 13
Michigan, The President's Excuse in.... 53
Municipal Government, Important Element of..... 552
Nevada Oranges..... 163
New Jersey Chancellorship..... 317
Office-holders as Political Workers..... 162
Oil on Stormy Waters, Effect of..... 13
Old Clothes for the Free List..... 186
One-Man Power 206
Opéra Comique, Fire at the..... 553
Orvieto, Cathedral of..... 490
Pensions, Next Thing in..... 117
Perversion of History..... 74
Philadelphia, Labor Vote in..... 162
Philadelphia Postmastership..... 228
Plagiarism, Psychic..... 342
Plastounoff's Book Swindling..... 117, 142, 163, 207, 363
Postal Savings Banks..... 315
President and the Constitution..... 206
Protection against Western Wheat.... 76
Public and Private Interest..... 161
Railroad Evil, The Real..... 32
Reichstag, The New, Composition of .. 342
"Reliable," etc..... 97
Religious Statistics..... 10, 76
Russian Beggar, A..... 117, 142, 163, 207
Saunter, Derivation of..... 76, 185
Sharples Portraits..... 74
Silver and Greenbacks..... 31, 53
Silver, Discrimination against..... 31, 98
Skylarks? Why Have We No 479
Slip of the Pen..... 98
Soldier's Patriotism 142
South, The New..... 207
Stevens, Alfred, Another View of..... 447
Stone, Gen. Chas. P., The Late..... 98
Story without an End..... 53
Surnames, Transformation of..... 228, 250, 272, 294, 318, 342, 404
Surplus Revenue and the Bonds..... 529
Tariff and Socialism..... 227
Taxation of Personal Property 207
Teachers, the Supply of..... 32, 96
Tennessee, State Debt of 489
Tolstoi's "Autobiography"..... 12
Versifying Made Easy..... 363
Ways and Means..... 141
Western Mortgages..... 386, 425, 446
West Virginia Senatorial Situation..271, 448
Wolseley on Lee..... 362, 316, 362, 403
Woman Suffrage in Massachusetts..249, 269
Working Classes, Legislation for the. 32, 75
Workingman's Thoughts on Labor..... 270

Leading Reviews.

Adams's Emancipation of Massachusetts..... 189
American School of Evolutionists..... 121
Artistic Imagination..... 16
Asia, Central..... 475
Bancroft's British Columbia..... 367
Bancroft's Conquest of California..... 59
Blake, Admiral..... 511
Blockade-Runner, A..... 19
Brazil, Recent Works on..... 389
British Power in India..... 556
British Sergeant, A..... 535
Carlyle's Early Letters..... 97
Carlyle's Indebtedness to Goethe..... 391
Catharine II., Crimean Journey of 60
Channing, William Henry..... 101
Conway's Early Flemish Artists..... 214
Criticule Rampant, A..... 515
Divina Commedia, Time References in the 322
Dowden's Shelley..... 146
England's Case against Home Rule..... 59
English Letter Foundries, Old..... 347
Etymology, Some Recent Works on.... 82
Franklin in France..... 368
French Books, Recent..... 192, 275
French Constitutionalist on the English Constitution..... 451
Fyffe's Modern Europe..... 297
Gardiner's Great Civil War 233
Ghiberti 81
Greville Memoirs..... 108
Hannington, Bishop..... 408
Hauser, Kaspar, Story of..... 254
Hayward's Correspondence..... 212
Heraldry, Crazy..... 390
Israel, Ancient..... 211, 235
Italian Sculptor, A Modern..... 101
Jebb's Introduction to Homer..... 429
Ladd's Physiological Psychology..... 473
Law Books, Recent..... 109, 495
Lee, Robert E..... 321, 346
Loftie's London..... 407
McClellan's Own Story..... 57, 79
Mathematical Works, Recent 400
Maudsley on the Supernatural..... 253
Non-English Settlements in North America..... 302
Novels, Recent..... 17, 123, 147, 278, 299, 429, 453, 533
Oliver's Madagascar..... 190
Oriental Story-book..... 324
Philosophic Literature, Recent..... 370
Plumptre's Translation of the Divine Comedy..... 102
Poetry, Recent..... 208
Pomeroy's International Law..... 277
Price's London Guildhall..... 513, 534
Primitive Races..... 104
Railway Publications..... 556
Religious and Ethical Literature, Recent..... 61
Scherer's Essay on Goethe..... 514
Schumann Letters, More..... 493
Seeley's Napoleon..... 37
Skeats's Piers Plowman..... 274
Stage, Books about the..... 473
Stephens's French Revolution..... 166
Thayer's Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament..... 83
Verdi, Giuseppe..... 210
Walker's Second Army Corps..... 149
Year Books, The Latest..... 82

Titles of Books Reviewed.

(For lesser notices see also the Notes.)

Agnes Surriage (Bynner's)..... 17
Agriculture in its Relations with Chemistry (Storer's)..... 350
Algebra (Chrystal's)..... 409
Algebra, (Oliver, Walt, Jones's) Treatise on..... 409
Alston, (Peabody's) Last Evening with 302
America Heraldica (Vermont's)..... 390

American Ancestry (Hughes's)..... 477
American Home Rule (Robertson's)..... 517
American Literature (Richardson's)..... 172
America, (Bernard's) Retrospections of 170
Ancient Cities (Wright's)..... 63
André Maynard, peintre (Mairet's)..... 193
Angleterre, (Boutmy's) Développement de la Constitution en..... 451
Arguments to Courts and Juries (Johnston's)..... 495
Art, (Van Dyke's) Principles of..... 411
Aztecs (Biart's)..... 415
Bachelor's Blunder (Norris's)..... 17
Baldine (Edler's)..... 453
Ballads of Books (Matthews's)..... 236
Baltimore and 19 April, 1861 (Brown's)..... 412
Bank of England, (Rogers's) First Nine Years of..... 558
Baptists, Armitage's) History of the..... 536
Basque Provinces, (Monteiro's) Legends of..... 195
Bede, Venerable..... 194
Between Two Loves (Barr's)..... 123
Biographical Annals (Lanman's)..... 349
Bishops in the Town (Lackock's)..... 302
Blake, Admiral (Hannay's)..... 511
Book Fancier (Fitzgerald's)..... 41
Book worm, (Beeby's) Diversions of a..... 302
Borderland (Fothergill's)..... 278
Boston, Old, (Porter's) Rambles in..... 394
Bow of Orange Ribbon (Barr's)..... 123
Brain, (Ferrier's) Functions of the..... 173
Brazil, (Andrews's)..... 389
Brazil, (Wells's) 3,000 Miles through..... 389
Bride of the Nile (Ebers's)..... 429
British Columbia (Bancroft's)..... 367
British Isles, (Bartholomew's) Gazetteer of the..... 371
British Power in the East, (Elphinstone's) Rise of..... 556
British Trade to the East Indies (Stevens's)..... 348
Bugle Echoes (Browne's)..... 299
Bulgarians, (Rubin's) Struggle of the, for national independence..... 127
By Woman's Wit (Alexander's)..... 278
California (Bancroft's)..... 39
Cannibals and Convicts (Thomas's)..... 519
Canning, George (Hill's)..... 497
Carlyle, Thomas, (Norton's) Early Letters of..... 37
Cassiodorus, (Hodgkin's) Letters of..... 279
Celebrities of the Century (Sanders's)..... 393
Central America (Bancroft's)..... 518
Chace, Geo. Ide (Murray's)..... 282
Channing, Wm. Henry, (Frothingham's) Memoir of..... 101
Channing's, Dr., Note Book..... 214
Child of the Century (Wheelwright's)..... 453
Chinese Ghosts, (Hearn's) Some..... 456
Chivalry, (Ashton's) Romance of..... 69
Christian Platonists of Alexandria (Biggs's)..... 372
Cities, (Tenth Census) Social Statistics of..... 256
Civitas (Campbell's)..... 290
Clay, Henry, (Schurz's) Life of..... 536
Coach, (Champlin's) Chronicle of the..... 21
Collisions in U. S. Waters (Preble's)..... 170
Colors for Naturalists, (Ridgway's) Nomenclature of..... 216
Conception of the Infinite (Fullerton's) 370
Constitutional Law of the United States (Holst's) 495, (Thompson's)..... 169
Contemporains, Les (Lemaitre's)..... 276
Contracts, (Bishop's) Commentaries on the Law of..... 495
Contracts, (Black's) Constitutional Prohibitions against Impairing the Obligation of..... 495
Contracts, (Hare's) Law of..... 170
Contre le Flot (Claveau's)..... 276
Count Xavier (Gre-ville's)..... 147
Customs, (Elmes's) Law of..... 493
Cycling (Bury and Hilller's)..... 476
Dante (Ward's)..... 537
Dante, (Plumptre's) Commedia and Canzoniere of..... 102
Dante, (Scartazzini's) Handbook to..... 454
Dean Maitland, (Grey's) Silence of..... 17
Demigod, A..... 123
Dictionnaire étymologique (Pourret's). 82
Diman, Rev. J. L, (Hazard's) Memoirs of..... 40
Divina Commedia, (Moore's) Time References in the..... 322
Dogaressa (Melmont's)..... 302
Dragon, Image, and Demon (Du Bose's).. 126
Due North (Ballou's)..... 537
Dupré, G., Life (Pennell's)..... 191
Thoughts on Art..... 191
East Indies, (Stevens's) British Trade to the..... 348
Easton, Mass., (Chaffin's) History of..... 255
Ecclesiastical English (Moon's)..... 515
Eglise Française à la Nouvelle York, Registers of the..... 20
Egypt, Ancient, (Rawlinson's) Story of. 477
Egyptian Campaigns (Royle's)..... 516
Electric Motor (Martin and Wetzler's). 86
Elements of Right and of the Law (Smith's)..... 170
Eminent Authors of the Nineteenth Century (Brandes's)..... 20
England and Russia Face to Face in Asia (Yate's)..... 474
England, Bank of (Rogers's)..... 558
England's Case against Home Rule (Dicey's)..... 59
English and Scottish Popular Ballads (Child's)..... 325
English History, (Wheeler's) Sketches from..... 151
English Prose and Prose Writers, (Hunt's) Representative..... 257
English, The New (Oliphant's)..... 236
Essays (Vila Blake's)..... 85
Estoppel, (Bigelow's) Law of..... 170
Ethics, (Sidgwick's) Outlines of the History of..... 61
Ethik (Wundt's)..... 61
Europe, Modern, (Fyffe's History of... 297
Evangelical Revival in the Eighteenth Century (Overton's)..... 455
Expression, (Brown's) Synthetic Philosophy of..... 172
Factory System, (Taylor's) History of.. 85
Familiar Studies of Men and Books (Stevenson's)..... 517
Feud of Oakfield (Teck Rovee's)..... 453
Flandre, (Dehaisnes's) Histoire de l'Art dans la..... 280
Flemish Artists, Early, (Conway's)..... 214
Forty Years, (Gibb's) History of the..... 224
Française, (Brunot's) Grammaire historique de la langue..... 82
France, D'Ancienne, (Fiach's) Origines de..... 349
Francis (Dal Vero's)..... 17
Franklin in France (Hale's)..... 368
Frau Wilhelmine (Stinde's)..... 147
Fredericksburg, Campaign of..... 278
French Explorations and Settlements in North America (Winsor's)..... 392
French Language, (Brachet's) Etymological Dictionary of the..... 82
French Revolution, (Stephens's) History of..... 166
From the Forecastle to the Cabin (Samuels's)..... 517
Fuster, Madame (Fabre's)..... 192
Geological Field, (Winchell's) Walks and Talks in..... 302
German Classics (Lichtenstein's)..... 477
Ghiberti et son école (Perkins's)..... 81
Gilchrist, Anne (Gilchrist's)..... 476
Goethe and Carlyle, (Norton's) Correspondence between..... 391
Goethe, (Scherer's) Aufsätze über..... 514
Goethe's Faust (Saunder's)..... 127
Golden Justice (Bishop's)..... 278
Great Civil War (Gardiner's)..... 233
Greek British Legation of the New Testament (Thayer's)..... 83
Greek Lessons (Keep's)..... 559
Guildhall of London (Price's) Account of..... 513, 534
Halfa (Oliphant's)..... 466
Hannington, James (Dawson's)..... 408
Hausen, (Van de Weyer in Linde's)..... 454
Hayward, Abraham, Correspondence.. 212
Histoire et Littérature (Brunetière's).. 276
Home Life of Great Authors (Griswold's)..... 85
Homer (Jebb's)..... 429
Homeward Yarns (Whitney's)..... 299
Horse-keeper, (Fleming's) Practical.. 237
Huguenots and Henry of Navarre (Baird's)..... 433
I Am That I Am (Warriner's)..... 299
Imagination in Landscape Painting (Hamerton's)..... 16
Impôt, le revenu, (Lyon's) Rapport sur les questions relatives à l'..... 538
Impôts, (Say's) Solutions démocratiques de la question des..... 414
Indice de las Notas de D. Diego Clemencin (Bradford's)..... 267
Infinite, (Fullerton's) Conceptions of the..... 370
In One Town (Downey's)..... 453
International Law in Time of Peace (Pomeroy's)..... 277
International Law of the United States, (Wharton's) Digest of..... 169
International Law (Davis's) Outlines of..... 496
Interpretation, (Farrar's) History of... 61
Inter-State Commerce, (Harper's) Law of..... 495
In the Clouds (Murfree's)..... 147
In the Wrong Paradise (Lang's)..... 299
Ireland, (Towle's) Young People's History of..... 302
Irish Life, (Gregg's)..... 21
Israel, (Stade's) Geschichte des Volkes.. 211, 235
Jeanne Avril (Bonnières's)..... 277
Jenseits von Gut und Böse (Nietzsche's) 61
Jess (Haggard's)..... 429
Jesuit's Ring (Hayes's)..... 429
Kalia (Merrill's)..... 232
Katy of Catoctin (Townsend's)..... 17
Klaus Bewer's Wife (Lindau's)..... 299
Knight-Errant (Lyall's)..... 532
Lamarck, Darwin, et Haeckel, (Vianna de Lima's) Exposé sommaire des théories transformistes de..... 106
Landlord and Tenant, (Taylor's) American Law of..... 495
Lawrence, Sergeant Wm., Autobiography of..... 535
Law, (Dole's) Talks about..... 496
Lee, Robert E. (Long's)..... 321, 346
Letter Writers, (Reed's) Old English.. 299
Liber Amoris (Carpenter's)..... 299
Ligne, Prince de, Lettres du..... 60
Lorimer (Gift's)..... 453
Locksley Hall Sixty Years After (Tennyson's)..... 298
Logan, John A., (Dawson's) Life of..... 557
Logic, (Carroll's) Game of..... 456
London (Loftie's)..... 407
Longfellow, H. W., (Longfellow's) Final Memorials of..... 431
Look Round Literature (Buchanan's).. 411
Lovely Wang (Wingfield's)..... 453
Mc Clellan's Own Story..... 67, 79
Machinery, (Kennedy's) Mechanics of.. 410
Madagascar (Oliver's)..... 190
Mahogany Tree (Thackeray's)..... 21
Mammalia in their Relation to Primeval Times (Schmidt's)..... 149
Margaret, (Martin's)..... 299
Marquis of Peñalta (Valdés's)..... 17
Martyr of Golgotha (Escrich's)..... 147
Massachusetts, (Adams's) Emancipation of..... 189
Mathematical Teaching (Safford's)..... 173
Maximilian's Empire, (Schroeder's) Fall of..... 237
Mediæval and Modern History, (Stubbs's) Seventeen Lectures on... 193
Mémoires d'aujourd'hui (Bonnières's). 276
Merry Men (Stevenson's)..... 429
Messis Vitæ (Blackie's)..... 299
Mexican Guide (Janvier's)..... 126
Microscopy for Beginners (Stokes's)..... 350
Millionaire of Rough and Ready (Harte's)..... 278
Mineral Physiology and Physiography (Hunt's)..... 538
Minerals, Common, (Crosby's) Tables for the Determination of..... 257
Minister's Charge (Howells's)..... 123
Miss Maple's Romance..... 532
Miss Churchill (Reid's)..... 429
Modern Idols (Thorne's)..... 84
Money and Other Things, About, (Craik's)..... 62
Morale, (Letourneau's) L'Evolution de la..... 61
Morals, (Wilson and Fowler's) Principles of..... 61
Mural Painting (Crowninshield's)..... 105
Muramasa Blade (Werthelmer's)..... 40
Musical History, (Davis's) Studies in..... 414
Napoleon I, (Seeley's) Short History of 37
Natural Causes and Supernatural Seemings (Maudsley's)..... 253
Naturvölker (Schneider's)..... 104
Nemra (Graham's)..... 17
New England Idyll (Greene's)..... 429
New Haven, (Levermore's) Republic of. 194
New Testament, (Thayer's) Greek-English Lexicon of..... 83
New York (Roberts's)..... 456
New York, (Lanman-r's) Story of a..... 532
Nordafrika (Diercks's)..... 195
Normans, (Jewett's) Story of the..... 477
Nouveaux Mélanges d'histoire et de littérature..... 275
Obiter Dicta (Birrell's)..... 559
Odyssey (Carnarvon's)..... 298
Ohio Corporations (Brewer and Lauscher's)..... 170
Onnalinda (McNaughton's)..... 299
Opera Français, Nouvelle and Thoinan's) Origines de l'..... 474
Oratorios, (Upton's) Standard..... 105
Origin of the Fittest (Cope's)..... 121
Pairing, (Greville's) Impressions on.... 433
Papacy during the Reformation (Creighton's)..... 325
Parleyings with Certain People (Browning's)..... 298
Parliament, (Skottowe's) Short History of..... 278
Pêcheur d'Islande (Viaud's)..... 192
Perley's Reminiscences (Poore's)..... 434
Perry's Journal (Winsor's)..... 106
Persia, (Benjamin's) Story of..... 350
Pharaohs of the Bondage and the Exodus (Robinson's)..... 394
Phelps, Samuel, (Phelps's) Life of..... 473
Phillips Exeter Lectures..... 537
Philosophical Study, (Starck's) A..... 497
Philosophy, Aristotle (Mcish's)..... 370
Philosophy, (Alexander's) Scme Problems of..... 370
Physiology, (Foster's) Text-book of..... 173
Piers the Plowman (Skeats's)..... 274
Pleadings in Personal Actions (Heard's) 170
Poetical Works (Parnell's)..... 298
Police Power in the U. S., (Tiedman's) Limitations of..... 169
Princess Casamassima (James's)..... 123
Private Soldier in the Army of the Potomac (Wilkeson's)..... 236
Psychological Theory, (Bowne's) Introduction to..... 370
Psychologist (Bishop's)..... 17
Psychology (Dewey's)..... 370
Psychology (McCosh's)..... 370
Purpose of the Ages (Morison's)..... 298
Question of Identity..... 299
Railway Law, (Patterson's)..... 170
Railway Practice (Alexander's)..... 556
Railway Problems (Jeans's)..... 556
Railway Rates (Fairlie's)..... 556
Railway Supplies, (Kirkman's) Handling of..... 556
Raleigh (Gosse's)..... 85
Rankeiu Reader (Wendell's)..... 123
Reade, Charles (Reades')..... 455
Real Property (Washburn's)..... 170
Recollections of My Mother (Lesley's).. 516
Registers of the French Church of New York..... 20
Religion, (Bienbam's) Dictionary of.... 478
Religion, (Dahl's) Die Nothwendigkeit der..... 61
Religion, (Pfleiderer's) Philosophy of.. 61
Religionersatzes, (Druskowitz's) Moderne Versuche eines..... 61
Reminiscences of a Country Journalist (Frost's)..... 279
Revisers' English (Moon's)..... 515
Revolution, (Taylor's) Ballads of the... 299
Rhetoric, Practical (Clark's)..... 195
Rhode Island, (Austin's) Genealogical Dictionary of..... 413
Road and the Roadside (Coster's)..... 170
Rodman the Keeper (Woolson's)..... 299
Roland Blake (Mitchell's)..... 17
Romanischen Philologie, (Gröber's) Grundriss der..... 280
Romantisme français (Crane's)..... 371
Rome, (Muirhead's) Private Law of.... 170
Romische Reisebilder (Reinsmoullié's). 325
Sabina Zembra (Black's)..... 532
Salem, (Silsbee's) Half-Century in..... 194
Saracens, (Ameer Ali's) Story of the.... 127
Saracinesca (Crawford's)..... 532
Schumann's Briefe, Robert..... 493
Scotland, (Macgibbon and Ross's) Castellated and Domestic Architecture of..... 279
Second Army Corps, (Walker's) History of..... 149
Sentimental Calendar..... 299
She (Haggard's)..... 532
Shelley, P. B., (Dowden's) Life of..... 146
Siam (Cort's)..... 301
Siddons, Mrs. (Kennard's)..... 473
Sidney, Sir Philip (Symonds's)..... 349
Sigrid (Thoroddsen's)..... 532
Silent Workman (Ross's)..... 147
Sir Percival (Shorthouse's)..... 123
Sketches and Impressions (Goodwin's). 372
Sketches from My Life (Robart Pasha's)..... 19
Sne (Kjelland's)..... 326
Socrates, Talks with, about Life..... 171
Sonnets (Pfeiffer's)..... 299
Sons and Daughters..... 299
Souvenirs of My Time (Frémont's)..... 216
Spies, (Lossing's) Two..... 151
Spiritismus, In Sachen des, und einer naturwissenschaftlichen Psychologie (Bastian's)..... 61
Squire of Sandal-Side (Barr's)..... 299
Stage d'Adhémar (Rabusson's)..... 193
Step Aside (Dunning's)..... 17
Strike in the B—— Mill..... 453
Surveying (Gillespie's)..... 410
Taken by Siege..... 299
Templars in Cyprus (Lewis's Werner's)..... 299
Tennessee, (Lindsley's) Confederate Military Annals of..... 215
Teresa Itasca (MacAlpine's)..... 147
Théâtre, (Régnier's) Souvenirs et Etudes de..... 473
Théâtres de 1800 à 1880, nos (Leveaux's)..... 473
Towards the Gulf..... 147
Tramp Trip (Sierwether's)..... 173
Two Gentlemen of Boston..... 453
Two Gentlemen of Bohemia..... 453
Tzar, Archidiscevese of Burgraves (Lubomirski's)..... 193
United States, (Lanman's) Biographical Annals of the Civil Government of. 349
United States Constitutional Law (Holst's), 495 (Pomeroy's)..... 169
United States, (Moore's) Digest of the International Law of..... 169
United States Supreme Court, (Kinney's) Digest of the Decisions of.... 169
Universities, (Laurie's) Rise and Early Constitution of..... 215
Verdi (Oppenheim's)..... 210
Victims (Gift's)..... 453
Victoria, Queen, (Greville's) Journal of the Reign of..... 168
Village Photographs (Larned's)..... 301
Wade, Benj. F. (Riddle's)..... 104
Wages, (Tenth Census) Statistics of.... 125
Waste-Land Wooings (Abbott's)..... 475
When I Was a Boy in China (Li's)..... 559
Whole Truth (Chadwick's)..... 453
Without Blemish (Meredith's)..... 532
Woman Suffrage, (Stanton, Anthony, Gage's) History of..... 432
Woodlanders (Hardy's)..... 429
Woodland Tales (Stinde's)..... 532
Words as the Symbols of Ideas, (Darmesteter's) Life of..... 82
Wordsworth, Dorothy Lee's..... 256
Year Books of Edward III. (Pike's)..... 82
Year in Eden (Preston's)..... 299
Years of Peril (Brown's)..... 413
Zealot in Tulle (Wildrick's)..... 453
Zyte (Malot's)..... 193

Books of the Week.

21, 41, 64, 86, 106, 128, 151, 173, 195, 237, 257, 281, 303, 326, 350, 372, 394, 415, 434, 457, 478, 497, 518, 539, 560.

Fine Arts.

Salmagundi Club Exhibition..... 86
Water-Color Exhibition..... 128
Etching Club Exhibition..... 129
Academy Exhibition..... 327, 373
Exhibition of Photographs at Liverpool..... 384
Society of American Artists..... 415, 435
American Art Association..... 457

ERRATA.

Page 15, col. i, line 21. For "Pittsburgh" read "Pilsbury."

Page 40, cols. ii and iii passim. For "Wertheimer" read "Wertheimber."

Page 43, col. i, bottom line. Omit all after "obey" to end of sentence.

Page 54, col. iii, line 6 from bottom. For "Red" read "Swiss."

Page 134, col. iii, line 32. For "forty-eight" read "thirty-eight."

Page 140, col. iii, line 37 from bottom. For "acceped" read "accepted."

Page 165, col. iii, line 42. Omit "or preposition."

Page 185, col. ii, line 12 from bottom. For "rile" read "vile."

Page 321, col. iii, line 6 from bottom. Dele "Scott had no children."

Page 385, col. ii, line 17 and passim in the same letter. For "Comanlville" read "Communville." Col. iii, line 4. For "caro" read "Caro."

Page 390, col. i, lines 6 and 10. For "Depauw" read "De Pauw." Line 8. For "Indianapolis" read "the Palmer House, Chicago."

Page 447, col. iii, line 28 from bottom. For colon substitute a period.

Page 472, col. i, line 4. For "F. G. Stimson" read "F. J. Stimson."

Page 509, col. ii, line 34. For "Mrs." read "Mr."

Page 511, col. i, line 30 from bottom. For "Gustave" read "Frédéric."

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1123. THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

33 and 1/3 PER CENT.

DIVIDEND.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.

In addition to the reduction of the current yearly payments, as compared with the rates charged under the old system of Life Insurance, which reduction equals a CASH DIVIDEND of more than FIFTY PER CENT. UPON THE TOTAL PREMIUMS PAID.

Notice is hereby given, that, in addition to the aforesaid cash reduction, the amount now to the credit of all present members of the MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION, who became members in 1881, equals a DIVIDEND OF THIRTY-THREE AND ONE-THIRD PER CENT. upon the entire assessment premiums paid during the first quinquennial (five years) period, viz.: From 1881 to 1886, inclusive. Which amount has been deposited with and held by the Central Trust Company of New York, as Trustee of the Reserve Fund of this Association, and applicable as provided in the contracts held by the members of the Association.

Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association.

EDWARD B. HARPER, Pres. F. T. BRAMAN, Secretary.

Notice is also given that during said time (from 1881 to 1886, inclusive) the MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION has paid to the widows and orphans, and representatives of its deceased members nearly THREE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS IN CASH.

Within this time its total business exceeds TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

More than fifty-five thousand of the leading citizens of our country have been received into its membership.

Every death claim has been paid promptly and in full, in many instances the widow and children receiving the money before the body of the deceased husband and father was laid in his grave.

Within this time (from 1881 to 1886, inclusive) there has accumulated in its CASH TONTINE RESERVE FUND nearly ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS, which fund is held either by Governmental authorities, as required by law, or it is held by the CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY of New York as trustee for the members, thus precluding the possibility of the Reserve Fund of this association from being squandered by the officers of the association, as all investments must be made upon the joint approval of the TWO COMPANIES, while held by the Trust Company, yet invested in the name of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, so that a failure of either institution would not jeopardize the securities held by the Trust Company for the protection of our members; and this RESERVE FUND is increasing at the rate of nearly ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS PER DAY.

We HAVE saved our members, by a reduction of the premiums, as compared under the old system, within the past SIX YEARS, more than TEN MILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

OUR SURPLUS is largely in excess of ONE MILLION ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS.

Our new business for the year 1886 exceeds FIFTY-FIVE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

OUR EXPENSE OF MANAGEMENT IS AND HAS BEEN LESS THAN ONE-THIRD AS GREAT AS THAT OF THE LEVEL PREMIUM MONOPOLY COMPANIES, TRANSACTING BUSINESS UNDER THE OLD SYSTEM OF LIFE INSURANCE, BEING LESS THAN ONE-FIFTH AS GREAT UPON EACH ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS OF NEW BUSINESS TRANSACTED, AND LESS THAN ONE-THIRD AS GREAT UPON EACH ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS OF OLD BUSINESS.

The conflict waged against this association and its management by the old and expensive level premium system, under the leadership of three of the most gigantic, unscrupulous, and soulless monopolies the world has ever known, has been constant and never ceasing within the past twelve months (the father of lies, with his trusted lieutenants, has been met and a complete victory won by truth and justice), and to-day the officers of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association greet its many thousands of policy-holders throughout the length and breadth of our land, WISHING THEM A HAPPY NEW YEAR, and assuring them that no better, no cheaper, and no safer form of life insurance was ever devised than that offered by the MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

Further information can be had at any of the branch offices of the Association, which are located in the leading cities of our country, or by applying at the Home Office, Potter Building, 38 Park Row, New York City.

E. B. HARPER, President.

THE CENTRAL TRUST COMPANY OF NEW YORK, TRUSTEE FOR THE RESERVE FUND.
ALFRED TAYLOR, FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT.
C. F. POTTER, SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT.
N. W. BLOSS, DIRECTOR OF AGENCIES.
F. T. BRAMAN, SECRETARY.
J. M. STEVENSON, ASS'T SECRETARY.
C. R. BISSELL, TREASURER.
J. W. BOWDEN, M.D., MEDICAL DIRECTOR.
TAYLOR & PARKER, ATTORNEYS.
C. R. McCHESNEY, ADJUSTER.
J. A. WESTERFIELD, ACTUARY.

The Complete Works

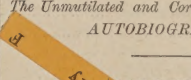
OF

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN,

Including his Private as well as his Official and Scientific Correspondence, and numerous Letters and Documents now for the first time printed;

ALSO

The Unmutilated and Correct Version of his AUTOBIOGRAPHY.



TO BE EDITED BY

JOHN BIGELOW.

This edition (which will be the most complete ever issued) will be Limited to Six Hundred Sets, and be published in ten royal octavo volumes, handsomely printed from pica type, in the general style of Lodge's edition of Hamilton's Works, with several engravings on steel.

Price Per Volume, $5.00.

The first volume is expected to be ready in January and the others will follow at short intervals.

As the edition is limited and will not be stereotyped, those desiring sets should enter their names at once. (The subscription for the set of Hamilton exceeded, by a considerable number, the copies printed, and many of the later orders the publishers were unable to fill.)

The set will contain a number of previously unpublished papers of Franklin, and also the correct unmutilated version of FRANKLIN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY, to be printed from the autograph manuscript, now in possession of the editor.

This edition now in preparation will, it is believed, be not only the most complete, but, as far as the material is concerned, the final edition of the writings of "the most eminent journalist, philosopher, diplomatist, and statesman of his time"; of one whose writings, whose picturesque career, and whose incalculable services to his country are supposed to have done more to shape the opinions of mankind than those of any other American.

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

NEW YORK:
27 and 29 West Twenty-third St.

LONDON:
27 King William St., Strand.

 A large proportion of the 600 sets to be printed have already been subscribed for. Jan. 2, 1887.

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 1

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 4

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
- Salaries of the United States District Judges 6
- Tobacco 6
- Some Recent Mexican Legislation 7
- German vs. American University Salaries 7

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
- The Daily and Periodical Press in Italy 8
- A New View of La Bruyère 9

CORRESPONDENCE:
- Religious Statistics 10
- History and the Group System 11
- Domestic Service from a Western Point of View 11
- Bishop Coxe's Half-Knowledge 12
- Tolstoi's "Autobiography" 12
- The Inter-State Commerce Bill 13
- Civil-Service Reform in Michigan 13
- Secret Sympathy with Crime 13
- The Effect of Oil on Stormy Waters 13

NOTES 13

REVIEWS:
- Artistic Imagination 16
- Recent Novels 17
- A Blockade-Runner 19
- Eminent Authors of the Nineteenth Century 20
- Registers of the Births, Marriages, and Deaths 20
- Chronicle of the Coach 21
- The Mahogany Tree 21
- Irish History for English Readers 21

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 21

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.
Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

Scale of Agate lines.

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27. — 5

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80. — 10

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top. — 15

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding.

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gillig & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CALIFORNIA, San Diego, Pierce Place.

THE SOUTHWEST INSTITUTE.—Health and Education for Girls and Boys in the finest climate in the world. Girls received into the family. For circulars address MRS. E. C. DERBY. Refers by direct permission to Rt. Rev. Wm. I. Kip, D.D., Bishop of California; General Geo. Stoneman, Governor of California; General W. T. Sherman, General George Crook, U. S. A.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL GIVES a superior preparation for College. The Principal has served a term of three years as tutor in Yale College. Send for circular. E. H. WILSON.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE.—A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls. MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School. Address the Dean, EDMUND H. BENNETT, LL.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

*PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI*tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY HALL SCHOOL (50th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

*HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT AD*mits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

*ADAMS ACADEMY. — PREPARA*tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886. For all information address WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, Southborough.

MRS. FAY'S AND MISS BURNETT'S Preparatory School for Boys.—Boys are received from five to twelve years of age and fitted for St. Mark's, Groton, and St. Paul's Schools.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

*GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE*paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

*HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI*tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course. HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal, Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

MASSACHUSETTS, Worcester.

OREAD INSTITUTE (FOR YOUNG Ladies), established in 1848. Second half of present school year will begin 29th Jan., 1887.

NEW HAMPSHIRE, Portsmouth.

MISS A. C. MORGAN'S SCHOOL FOR Young Ladies. Second term begins Feb. 1, 1887. J. G. Whittier says a better, healthier, and pleasanter location for a school could scarcely be found in New England."

NEW YORK, Binghamton.

*ALLAN MEAD NORTH (B.A., AM*herst) prepares boys for all colleges. Conditioned and rejected men coached.

NEW YORK, Long Island, Hempstead.

HEMPSTEAD INSTITUTE.—Established 1861. A thorough English Boarding School for Boys. Primary, Intermediate, Higher English, and Commercial courses. Reopens after the Holiday recess, January 3. Catalogues, giving full information, sent on application to the Principal.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys. WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. C. M. WILKINSON'S HOME School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Refers to Miss Louisa M. Alcott, Hon. John Lowell, Geo. Wm. Curtis, Esq.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill. WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies. Students prepared for College. Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

JAMAICA, Potsdam School, Sta. Cruz Mts.

THE REV. W. D. PEARMAN, M.A. (Cambridge) prepares for Business and Universities. In the Cambridge University Local Exams., 1884, a Potsdam boy stood 2d in Greek and 10th in Latin, of all England. For Terms apply as above.

ENGLAND, Weybridge.

*MR. ERNEST HARTLEY COLE*ridge, M.A., Balliol College, Oxford, prepares pupils for the Universities, etc. Terms, including all vacations, $1,250 a year. American and English references. Address Fieldside, Weybridge, England.

Teachers.

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER OF French and German (French acquired in Paris; German in Hanover) desires an engagement for the next school year. High School or Female College in one of the Middle States preferred. Address "ADVERTISER," P. O. East Liberty, Penn.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

*JOHN W DALZELL, PRIVATE TU*tor, 15 Appian Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

School Agencies.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free. E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

Wants.

*WANTED.—POSITION ON NEWS*paper or periodical as book reviewer or literary editor. Address CRITIC, 85 Prospect Street, Cambridgeport, Mass.

TO PUBLISHERS AND AUTHORS.— The undersigned, having lately read several books published by prominent houses, and found them very incorrectly printed, offers his services in detecting errors overlooked by the printer. Has had a long experience as proof-reader and press corrector. Would also revise Authors' MSS., and prepare them for the printer. For terms and particulars, address READER, care Nation.

4 to 8% INVESTMENTS Municipal BONDS

And other Securities. Call or send for Lists.

S. A. KEAN & CO., BANKERS,

UNITED BANK BUILDING,
Broadway and Wall Street, New York.
MAIN OFFICE: CHICAGO.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have never another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars. Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

7 2/3% CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures Capital $600,000 Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets. AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N. Y.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL,

to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. B. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

A NET SIX PER CT. INCOME

FROM DEBENTURES OF THE
FIDELITY LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY,
STORM LAKE, IOWA. CASH CAPITAL, $100,000.

The New York Tribune of Oct. 20, 1886, in its financial article, says: "The 6 per cent. debenture bonds of the Fidelity Loan and Trust Company of Storm Lake, Iowa, are secured by deposit with the Metropolitan Trust Company of New York of mortgages on improved property in the West—principally in Iowa. The Fidelity Company is endorsed by some of the best-known bankers in this city."

A superior investment for Savings and Trust Funds, where safety is the first consideration. Address

WILLIAM G. CLAPP, Treasurer,
7 Nassau Street, New York.

WORCESTER'S
UNABRIDGED QUARTO
DICTIONARY.

With or without Denison's Patent Index.

EDITION OF 1887.

ENLARGED BY THE ADDITION OF

A New Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary of nearly 12,000 personages, and

A New Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World, noting and locating over 20,000 places. Containing also over 12,500 New Words, recently added, together with a table of 5,000 words in general use, with their synonymes. Illustrated with woodcuts and full-page plates.

The National Standard of American Literature.

Every edition of Longfellow, Holmes, Bryant, Irving, Whittier, and other eminent American authors, follows Worcester. It presents the usage of all great English writers. It is the authority of the leading magazines and newspapers of the country and of the National Departments at Washington.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES says:

"Worcester's Dictionary has constantly lain on my table for daily use, and Webster's reposed on my shelves for occasional consultation."

FOR SALE BY ALL BOOKSELLERS.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY, Publishers,
715 and 717 Market St., Philadelphia.

ANY PERSON WISHING TO ACQUIRE A sound and practical knowledge of the German language, one that is of real use in business, reading, or travel, without waste of valuable time and without unnecessary labor, will find 'German Simplified' eminently suited to every requirement.

It is published in two editions: (1.) For self-instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each. (2.) As a School Edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all booksellers; sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by PROF. A. KNOFLACH, 140 Nassau St., New York.

Historical Poetry
OF THE Ancient Hebrews.

TRANSLATED AND CRITICALLY EXAMINED

By MICHAEL HEILPRIN.

Vols. I. and II. 8vo, cloth, price of each volume, $2.

Extracts from Remarks of the Press:

"Mr. Heilprin's book . . . has a double interest for us; both as a translation and as an historical criticism. . . . The deviations from the common translation are sometimes quite marked; but they are generally well supported by eminent authorities, and show the latest results of Hebrew scholarship. . . . When we turn now to the critical part of the book, we are impressed not simply with the erudition of the writer, but also with his thorough independence in the treatment of his themes."—Rev. S. J. Barrows ("Christian Register," Boston).

"The notion has somehow got abroad that the scientific study of the Bible is inconsistent with the most tender reverence for its contents, or with their persistent fascination. But the reverence of Mr. Heilprin for the subject-matter of his criticism could hardly be surpassed; and that it has not lost its power to interest and charm, his book itself is ample evidence, which will be reënforced by the experience of every intelligent reader of its too brief contents."—Nation, New York.

"Because Kuenen is as undogmatic in his realm as Darwin is in his, and because Mr. Heilprin, like his leader, has the humility as well as the boldness of science, they, and such as they, are our best present guides in the tangle of early Hebrew literature."—Rev. W. C. Gannett ("Unity," Chicago).

"Die grosse Belesenheit des Verf.'s bietet eine sorgsame Zusammenstellung der verschiedenen in der englischen, wie in der deutschen, holländischen und französischen Literatur vorgetragenen Anschauungen."—Count W. Baudissin ("Theologische Literaturzeitung," Leipzig).

"With all his critical freeness . . . he deals reverently with the religious thought of the Old Testament."—Prof. C. H. Toy ("American Journal of Philology").

"In Michael Heilprin mogen wij een geestverwant begroeten."—Dr. A. Kuenen ("Theologisch Tijdschrift," Leyden).

D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers,
1, 3, & 5 Bond Street, New York.

F. W. CHRISTERN,
39 West Twenty-third Street, New York,
Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANguages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N.Y.

Important Publications of 1886
SELECTED FROM THE LIST OF
G. P. Putnam's Sons,
NEW YORK AND LONDON.

AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIAtion Papers. Vol. I. 8vo, cloth, $5.

AMERICAN CITIZENS' MANUAL. By Worthington C. Ford. 8vo. 2 Parts in one. $1.25.

A STUDY OF DANTE. By Susan E. Blow. 12mo, $1.25.

AN INVESTOR'S NOTES ON AMERIcan Railroads. By John Swann. 12mo, $1.25.

CHIVALRIC DAYS AND YOUTHFUL Deeds. By E. S. Brooks. 8vo, illustrated, $2.

DAWN OF THE NINETEENTH CENtury in England. By John Ashton. 2 vols., 8vo, illustrated, $10.

DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF American History, 1606-1863. By Howard W. Preston. 8vo, $2.50.

EVOLUTION OF TO-DAY. By N. W. Conn, Ph.D. 8vo, $1.75.

ESSAYS ON FINANCE. By Robert Giffen. 8vo, $3.50.

FRANCE UNDER RICHELIEU AND Mazarin. By James Breck Perkins. 2 vols. 8vo, $5.00.

HUMOROUS MASTERPIECES FROM American Literature. Edited by Edward T. Mason. 3 vols. 16mo, cloth, $3.75; cloth, extra, gilt tops, $4.50.

HUNTING TRIPS OF A RANCHMAN. By Theodore Roosevelt. 8vo, illustrated, $3.50.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF JOEL BARlow. By Chas. Burr Todd. 8vo, $2.50.

POETRY AS A REPRESENTATIVE Art. By Prof. G. L. Raymond. 8vo, $1.75.

POCKET ATLAS OF THE WORLD. Prepared by John Bartholomew. 32mo, cloth, $1.00; full leather, $1.50.

PROBLEMS IN PHILOSOPHY. By John Bascom. 8vo, $1.50.

RISIFI'S DAUGHTER. A Drama. By Anna K. Green. 16mo, $1.00.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A PRIVATE. By Frank Wilkeson. 16mo, $1.00.

REMINISCENCES OF THE FILIBUSter War, 1855-60. By Gen. C. W. Doubleday. 8vo $1.25.

ROBERT FULTON AND STEAM NAvigation. By Thomas W. Knox. Large 12mo, illustrated, $1.75.

ROMANCES OF CHIVALRY. By John Ashton. 8vo, illustrated, $5.00.

SCRIPTURES FOR YOUNG READERS. Vol. I. Arranged and edited by Rev. Edward T. Bartlett. 12mo, $1.50.

STORY OF THE NATIONS. Volumes now ready: GREECE, ROME, JEWS, CHALDEA, CARTHAGE, HUNGARY, SPAIN, NORWAY, MOORS IN SPAIN, SARACENS, GERMANY. Large 12mo, per volume, $1.50.

THE FUNCTIONS OF THE BRAIN. By David Ferrier. 8vo, illustrated, $4.00.

THE OLD ORDER CHANGES. By W. H. Mallock. 16mo, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cts.

UNCLE SAM'S MEDAL OF HONOR. By Gen. Theodore F. Rodenbough. 12mo, cloth, $2.00.

YEARS OF EXPERIENCE. By Georgiana B. Kirby. 12mo, $1.50.

 Putnam's new Classified Catalogue sent on application.

STÄGER'S SUMMER COLLEGE OF LANGUAGES,
UNIVERSITY OF VERMONT,
BURLINGTON, VT.
July 11th to August 20th, 1887,

To impart a Speaking Knowledge of German or French, or other languages, is the principal aim of the well-qualified Faculty of exclusively native teachers. Terms: $20.00, entitling to all the instruction given during the six weeks. Board at German or French table, $6.00. For Circulars, etc., address the President,

L. A. STÄGER, 4041 Haverford St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

The Hayward Letters.

Being a Selection from the Correspondence of the late A. Hayward, Q.C. 1834 to 1884.

With an Account of his Early Life. By HENRY E. CARLISLE. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $7.50.

"Cavendish on Whist."

The Laws and Principles of Whist stated and explained, and its practice illustrated on an original system, by means of hands played completely through. 16th Edition, with an Appendix on American Leads and the Plain-Suit Echo. Printed in Colors. 12mo, cloth, $2.00.

WHIST DEVELOPMENTS: American Leads and the Plain-Suit Echo. By "Cavendish." 12mo, handsomely printed in red and black, cloth gilt, extra, $2.00.

MODERN WHIST: A Guide to the Winning Game. By Clement Davies, M.A. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.

The Wisdom of Edmund Burke.

Extracts from his Speeches and Writings. Selected and arranged by E. O. Pankhurst. 16mo, cloth, $2.40.

Romantic Spain:

A Record of Personal Experiences. By J. A. O'Shea. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $8.40.

Anchor-Watch Yarns:

Pictures of Life in the Coasting Trade, etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1.40.

The Ministry of Fine Art to the Happiness of Life.

By T. Gambier Parry, M.A. 8vo, cloth, $5.60.

CONTENTS: Purpose and Practice of Fine Art.—Ministry of Fine Art to Common Life and to Spiritual Life.—Ministry of Color to Sculpture and Architecture.—History of Mosaic, Ancient and Christian.—Art and Artists of Glass Painting, Ancient and Mediæval.—Adornment of Sacred Buildings.—Art in Archæology.—Builders and Buildings of the Cathedral at Gloucester.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

Containing Standard Works of European Literature in the English Language, on

History,	Theology,	Natural History,
Biography,	Antiquities,	Poetry,
Topography,	Science,	Art,
Archæology,	Philosophy	Fiction,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference, comprising in all Translations from the

French,	Spanish,	Anglo-Saxon,
German,	Scandinavian,	Latin and Greek.
Italian,

$1.40 or $2 per volume (with exceptions). Complete sets in 677 volumes. Special prices on application.

The following works are recommended to those who are forming public or private libraries. The volumes are sold separately:

ADDISON'S WORKS. 6 vols.....$1.40 each.
BACON'S ESSAYS, MORAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS. 2 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON and TOUR IN THE HEBRIDES, &c. (Napier). 6 vols. 1.40 each.
BURKE'S WORKS AND LIFE. 2 vols..... 1.40 each.
BURNS'S LIFE. By Lockhart..... 1.40 each.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols..... 1.40 each.
CHAUCER'S WORKS (Prof. Skeat). 4 vols... 1.40 each.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
DEFOE'S WORKS. 7 vols..... 1.40 each.
GIBBON'S ROMAN EMPIRE. 7 vols..... 1.40 each.
GOETHE'S WORKS. 14 vols..... 1.40 each.
GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. 5 vols..... 1.40 each.
HAZLITT'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
LAMARTINE'S WORKS. 8 vols..... 1.40 each.
LESSING'S LAOKOON, &c..... 1.40.
LESSING'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 2 vols.... 1.40 each.
MILTON'S PROSE WORKS. 5 vols..... 1.40 each.
MOLIÈRE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols... 1.40 each.
PLUTARCH'S LIVES (new translation by Long and Stewart). 4 vols..... 1.40 each.
SCHILLER'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
VASARI'S LIVES OF PAINTERS (with new appendix by Dr. Richter). 6 vols.. ..... 1.40 each.
BURNEY'S (Mme. D'Arblay's) CECILIA. 2 vols 1.40 each.
BURNEY'S (Mme. D'Arblay's) EVELINA..... 1.40.
FIELDING'S NOVELS. 4 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
PETRARCH'S SONNETS..... 2.00.
MANZONI'S BETROTHED. (I promessi Sposi). 2.00.
PEPYS'S DIARY. 4 vols..... 2.00 each.
KANT'S CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON ..... 2.00 each.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. 2 vols ..... 2.00 each.
HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS AND TRAVELS. 3 vols.... .....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
STAUNTON'S WORKS ON CHESS. 4 vols... $2.00 and 2.40 each.
GILBART ON BANKING. 2 vols..... 2.00 each.
LOWNDES'S BIBLIOGRAPHER'S MANUAL. 11 parts .....$1.40 and 2.00 each

* The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Holiday Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.*

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743 745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Begin the New Year

BY SUBSCRIBING TO

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

Published Monthly. With Illustrations.

$3.00 a Year; 25 Cents a Number.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE aims to give its readers general literature of lasting value and interest. Each number is fully and handsomely illustrated by the work of the leading artists, reproduced by the best-known methods. The pictures will be in the best sense illustrative of the text.

THE FIRST (JANUARY) NUMBER WAS PUBLISHED ON DECEMBER 15. THE EDITION OF 100,000 COPIES WAS EXHAUSTED ON THE DAY OF PUBLICATION. SECOND AND THIRD EDITIONS WERE PUT TO PRESS AT ONCE, AND THE SALE OF THE FIRST ISSUE HAS NOW REACHED 140,000 COPIES.

ADDRESS

Charles Scribner's Sons,

PUBLISHERS,

743-745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1887.

The Week.

THE remarks made by Mr. Wm. P. St. John, President of the Mercantile National Bank, at the dinner of the Commercial Club of Providence, embody very sound opinions upon the silver question and the national-bank question, yet without carrying conviction that the plan which he favors is either feasible or desirable. The course of reasoning that he follows leads to the conclusion that the country can carry a great deal more silver in its circulation than it now carries, and that, therefore, it would be wise to come to an agreement with the silver men and fix the maximum amount of compulsory coinage now, at (say) $500,000,000. Mr. St. John points to the example of France to show that it does not follow that a great silver currency causes a nation to lose its gold, or prevents it from importing more gold. The fact stated by Mr. St. John, that France has made net gold imports of nearly $300,000,000 during the past eleven and one-half years, in spite of her $550,000,000 of silver coin, is a very telling one. It coincides with our own experience, which shows that the movement of gold to and from this country goes on regardless of the operations of the mint, being as indifferent to them, indeed, as to the production of Bessemer steel, or to the construction of cruisers for the navy. The significance of this fact will be learned after a little by the silver men themselves, and when they learn it they will stop the compulsory coinage without any bargain with the anti-silver men, provided they are not strong enough to secure free coinage.

The significance of the observed facts in both France and the United States is only half understood, or, at all events, only half explained, by Mr. St. John. He perceives clearly that movements of gold between the different nations are controlled by the balance of trade —not the balance shown by the custom-house, which may be very illusory, but the real balance of debit and credit arising from the exchange of all other things except gold. Now in countries where the gold standard prevails silver falls into the category of "all other things," no matter how much of it may be in circulation or in warehouse. That portion which is in circulation is three parts value and one part "fiat." The greenback is all fiat and no value whatever. Now if we can divest ourselves for a moment of all preconceptions concerning silver as a "precious metal"—a character which it does not now enjoy in the commercial world, except as platinum may be called one of the precious metals—we shall see that for all purposes of expelling gold the greenback dollar is quite as powerful an agent as the silver dollar under present conditions. What they might be under conditions of free silver coinage or of unlimited greenbacks it is not necessary now to inquire. We may play with silver as much as we like, and we may give it what names we like, its effect, so long as the gold dollar is de facto the standard and de jure the unit of value, as a gold-expelling agent is no greater than that of the greenback, but may conceivably be much less, since silver has intrinsic value equal to three-fourths of its face value. Mr. St. John seems to think that the coinage of some considerable amount of silver above $500,000,000 under the present law would expel gold and bring on some kind of crisis, and that therefore it would be wise to compromise on $500,000,000 as a maximum now. His apprehensions on this point coincide with the hopes of the silver men. If he or anybody can convince them that continued coinage will have the effect to expel gold and bring the country to the silver standard, no compromise can be got out of them, because that is just what they want. But evidence is not wanting that their leaders are becoming doubtful whether the $2,000,000 per month law, or anything less than free coinage, will bring the country to the silver standard. It was for this reason that Mr. Bland made such a vigorous push at the last session for the free coinage of silver. His failure has undoubtedly led him to contemplate the stoppage of the present coinage within some determined limit which shall have the appearance of a victory for the silverites.

Ex-Gov. Hoadly writes to us, as illustrating the needlessness of the Cullom and Reagan Inter State Commerce Bills, that in Ohio, while he was Governor—that is, from January, 1884, to January, 1886—not one complaint of railroad management reached the office of the Commissioner of Railroads and Telegraphs, and he thinks this is also true of the past year. The only railroad trouble in Ohio, he says, arises out of the practice of discrimination between large and small shippers, and the courts have shown themselves fully able to take care of such cases without the aid of legislation. Since Judge Baxter removed Gen. Pease from his office as receiver of the Cleveland and Marietta Railroad for granting a rebate to the Standard Oil Company, and the Supreme Court enjoined any discrimination between large and small shippers in the case of Scofield vs. the Lake Shore Railway Company (43, Ohio State Reports, 571), there has been no doubt of the power of the courts to abate this evil. Within a fortnight, too, the Attorney-General of the State has begun proceedings in quo warranto to forfeit the charters of two other railroads for alleged discriminations of this kind.

The Chicago Tribune, discussing with Mr. Geo. R. Blanchard the same question as raised in the Inter-State Commerce Bill, makes the ingenious argument that since our long lines of railway from the Mississippi to the Atlantic are made up of separate lines pieced together, and since the operation of the short-haul section is limited by the words "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," the short-haul clause does not necessarily apply to such long distances as between Milwaukee and New York. It says:

> "The bill does not legalize as great a rate from Racine and Evanston as from Milwaukee to New York, but leaves the associated carriers to justify it if they can. Nor does it require the charge between Racine and Evanston by a single common carrier to be determined or measured by any percentage the connecting roads between Milwaukee and New York may agree to pay the Milwaukee and St. Paul, be the same more or less; and it is just there that Mr. Blanchard misinterprets the bill—the result, doubtless, of hasty or superficial reading.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> "The rate from St. Paul to New York must be fixed by a combination of carriers, each acting for and by itself; that from Racine to Evanston by a single carrier acting individually between its own terminals. The first transaction as compared with the second is remote and unrelated, and neither rate would be necessarily dependent on the other.
>
> "The Milwaukee roads taking grain from Milwaukee to Chicago without loading at one point or unloading at the other would not perform the service under 'conditions and circumstances' similar to those in the case of a shipment between Racine and Evanston, where the roads would perform station services at each place."

This means that the bill is nugatory, or may be made so, as between connecting lines. That Senator Cullom does not so understand it is made plain by a letter addressed by him a few days ago to Mr. Datus C. Smith of New York, in which he says that "if goods or grain should be shipped from Chicago to New York on a given line of road, that road should not charge more from, say, Fort Wayne, if the line should be the Pennsylvania Road, to New York, than from Chicago to New York—not per mile, but the total or aggregate charge; Fort Wayne being 140 miles nearer New York than Chicago. The provision also says that the Commission may in special cases, on application by the railroad, after investigation, give the railroad relief from the operation of the short-haul provision if it sees proper to do so." As the distance from Fort Wayne to New York by any route requires a haul on two or three separate lines of railway, it is evident that Mr. Cullom does not see the matter in the same light as the Chicago Tribune.

The long-haul and short-haul question has been a subject of increasing agitation in England for some years, and is to be examined in Parliament in the course of the next session, together with other railway problems. The Economist considers the charging of a greater price for a short haul than for a long one on the same line of rails indefensible. The argument on the other side, which maintains that English railways must take goods destined for the Continent at any rate they can get above cost of hauling, or lose the traffic altogether, allowing it to pass into the hands of foreign competitors, to the detriment of English manufacturers, it meets by saying that this is requiring British consumers to pay an indirect tax to enable the producers to compete with the German, French, and Belgian manufacturers. The operation has this appearance undoubtedly, but the question is still to be answered, How would the consumer be helped by stopping the export trade, or that portion of it which depends upon the minimum freight charge and could not be carried on at all without it? Surely the railroads may be trusted to charge all that this traffic will bear. They will never let a penny slip through their fingers by reason of not charging enough. If the law steps in and says you shall not carry goods from Manchester to Dover for less than you charge from Manchester to any intermediate point, the railway will have to sacrifice one or the other sort of traffic. It will not sacrifice that portion from which it gets nine tenths of its revenue. It will let go the one-tenth. The nine-tenths will be no better, but may be worse off than before, as being called on to make good the loss of the one tenth.

Mr. A. J. Falls, a Washington attorney, is endeavoring to secure the passage of a bill, which Representative Morrow has in charge, providing for an appeal to the Attorney-General from decisions of the First Comptroller adverse to the claims of marshals and commissioners of the United States courts. It appears that the present Comptroller has been disallowing many claims for expenses and charges for services preferred by such officers, and pressed with great diligence by their attorneys in Washington, to the great consternation and loss of both, who had no idea that any Treasury official would attempt to deprive them of those perquisites which for so many years have been duly allowed when properly "looked after." These disallowances thus made must stand. It is not in the power of the President or of the Secretary of the Treasury to change or reverse any of the Comptroller's decisions. The right to do so was constantly claimed by heads of departments from the beginning of our Government. It was strengthened by opinions of attorneys-general, and frequently admitted by the accounting officers, but at last the vexed question, which had caused in the Treasury more dispute than any other, was set at rest by the act of 1868, which declared the decisions of the Comptroller conclusive upon the executive branch of the Government. The bill in question, if it should become a law, would constitute an exception to this act of 1868, for the Attorney-General is now a part of the executive branch of the Government, he having been made the head of the Department of Justice in 1870. And of all the heads of departments, he is the last who should be permitted to disturb the rulings of the Comptroller upon the accounts of marshals and other officers of the United States courts, for the very excellent reason that he is their head. They are his subordinates; many of them are his appointees; he approves their accounts before they are submitted to the Comptroller; he is in consequence naturally prejudiced in their favor.

But there is no good reason why any claimant dissatisfied with a decision of a comptroller should not be allowed, without unreasonable delay or expense, to attack the grounds upon which it rests, before some appellate tribunal having jurisdiction only of such cases. There are thousands of instances in which an appeal to the Court of Claims is out of the question, because the amount involved is small; and a petition addressed to Congress is labor lost, for the reason, as Mr. Springer has lately said in his report, that the history of past legislation shows that only a fraction over 1 per cent. of the bills introduced for the relief of citizens for private and domestic claims against the Government (not including war claims) pass that body. The right of appeal would cause more consideration to be given to claims in the first instance by comptrollers, and it would diminish the labor of the Congressional Committee on "Private Claims." Indeed, it might be enacted that the adverse decision of the appellate tribunal should be the end of the matter. Why can we not have in the Treasury a method of procedure similar to that of the Patent Office, which has proved so satisfactory, namely, an appeal from one comptroller to the Board of Comptrollers, and from it, if it should be found necessary, to some one supreme over all?

"The proposition to make the small, illiterate, ill-assorted, three-fourths 'Greaser' population of New Mexico a State with two Senators, a Congressman, and three electoral votes, is one which even the most partisan Democrat should hesitate to press," says a Republican organ, and very properly too. But it is only fair to remember that a dozen years ago a Republican House did not "hesitate to press" and to adopt this same proposition. In May, 1874, a bill for the admission of New Mexico as a State passed the lower branch of Congress, then Republican by more than two to one, by an overwhelming majority; Mr. Kasson of Iowa rebuking a criticism of the illiteracy of the population, on the ground that such talk was unworthy a party which had given suffrage to 4,000,000 negroes in the South. But it must be remembered that in 1874 "Steve" Elkins was delegate from New Mexico, and the Republicans then expected the Territory to be a Republican State. "Circumstances alter cases."

Mayor O'Brien promptly justified the confidence of the Independents who supported him for a third term, by two vetoes which he sent to the Boston City Council on Monday week. One refused his signature to an order rescinding the proviso attached to the police item in the Appropriation Bill, that no money should be expended for the police signal system—on the grounds that if the Police Commissioners had, as was reported, contracted certain bills for the signal system in disregard of a direct prohibition, they should not be relieved from responsibility in the matter, and that every department must live up to the letter of the city charter, which forbids the incurring of liabilities for any purpose beyond the appropriation duly made therefor. The other veto was of an order requesting the Mayor to petition the Legislature for an act raising the limit of indebtedness established for next year from 2 per cent. to 2½ per cent., Mr. O'Brien holding that the act ought to have a fair trial, and that "it will be a check on extravagant schemes and expenditures which speculators are preparing to force upon the city." Both vetoes were sustained, and the Mayor's defence of the taxpayers' claims in the latter case was so unanswerable that only one Alderman voted to override him.

A gentleman who is interested in the question how the practice of "trading" and "selling out" at the polls shall be broken up, calls our attention to the system adopted in Boston. At the recent municipal election the "regular Republican ticket" bore this inscription: "This certifies that this ballot is the regular and genuine ballot of the Republican party, to be used at the election on December 14, 1886, in the city of Boston," with facsimiles of the signatures of the President and Treasurer of the Republican City Committee. In like manner the "regular Democratic ticket" bore a certificate, signed by the Chairman of the Printing Committee, that "this ballot contains only the regular Democratic nominees, and is issued by the Democratic City Committee of Boston." Such a certificate is an important aid to the identification of the ticket and a serious obstacle to the business of trading, and therefore a great advance upon the system—or rather lack of system—which we have in this city. But it ought to be possible to make improvements upon this, and it would hardly be possible to do a greater service in the cause of honest politics just now than to devise a practicable plan for State supervision of the distribution of ballots, to be submitted to the approaching Constitutional Convention.

The Prohibitionists are so much encouraged by the large increase in their vote at the recent elections that they are already reorganizing for the next campaign. The State Central Committee of the party in Minnesota recently held a meeting and laid plans for holding meetings throughout the State and for circulating prohibition literature. Great reliance is felt in this method of proselyting; and the fact that the steady increase in the number of newspapers devoted to the cause is accompanied by a similar growth in the dimensions of the party vote, appears to justify the confidence of the managers. Nowhere are any signs of weakening to be detected. On the contrary, the believers in prohibition appear to be resolved to make a stronger fight in 1888 than they did in 1884.

We spoke last week of the evil effects on the young rowdy population of this city of "Fatty" Walsh's appointment, owing to the fact that his career has been precisely that on which a large proportion of them are entering, or think they are entering. He began what we may call his public life as a member of the gang known as the "Dead Rabbits," who were a great terror to the city and trouble to the police before the war. The Evening Post reproduces from the columns of the New York Times of 1859 an account of his training for a prize-fight, as the custom is among the more muscular young men of his class. His opponent was "Mike" Norton, now another successful municipal statesman of the same school, for he has secured the position of Civil Justice in the First District. The fight never came off, as the two young rufflans were captured and brought up before Mayor Tiemann. After that, Walsh's career followed the regular course. His pugilistic prowess raised him to eminence in ward politics. Eminence in ward politics made him influential with the police and District Attorney, so that he was able, during the next twenty years, or until he began to get old, to go on with impunity assaulting, fighting, carrying concealed weapons, getting drunk, gambling, opening liquor-stores and gambling-houses, cheating at the elections and in the primaries, or, in other words, leading a life of crime and vice. When hauled up, as he was two years ago for keeping a gambling house, he had only to tell the District Attorney that he had "reformed" in order to get the matter dropped.

Now, as we have said, Walsh's career is that which thousands of men in this city are following, and which thousands more mean to follow if they can. They form a stream of vice and crime which our religious people and philanthropists are constantly struggling to stem, and too often feel that they are struggling in vain. It was to keep these men out of the public service, and above all to keep their protégés and cronies out of it, that the Civil-Service Act was passed and made compulsory in the great cities. What, then, must be the effect on this vicious, idle, and lawless element of seeing one of their own chiefs and heroes, a man whose whole life has been a defiance of law and a menace to order, actually put in charge of the prison in which malefactors await their trial? We understand Commissioner Porter, who helped to appoint Walsh, is wagging his head, Hedden fashion, and declaring that he knows what he is about, and does not mind what the newspapers say, and is sure that "Walsh is a good man for the place." But how does he know it? He has not a single reason for supposing it. The only way of knowing whether a man is good for any place, is by observation of his character and career. If his life has been a vicious one, and he has never followed any regular calling, all the marks of fitness for any place of trust, however small, are wanting. We venture to assert there is not a business man in this city who would take Walsh as a janitor or elevator-man. Moreover, if the Commissioners, and men like Mr. Beekman, now in office, who signed Walsh's recommendation, suppose that this little escapade of theirs is going to be forgotten after they get Walsh into the place, they are hugely mistaken. It will never be forgotten as long as they show their noses in public life. People cannot afford in our time to overlook gentlemen who think old criminals are just the men to have charge of jails. There is something "distingué" about this which is a sure protection against oblivion.

The advantages of the fourteen years' term for judges of the courts of record, have been well illustrated during the past few days in the formalities which have attended the retirement of Judges Davis and Van Vorst from the bench of the Supreme Court. Fourteen years is about equivalent on the average to a life tenure, because it is not often that a man who has reached the age at which he becomes a suitable candidate for judicial honors has more than fourteen years' good work left in him. But in addition to this it is long enough to enable a good judge to make both a personal and professional impression on the bar and the public, and to make the close of his term an event which touches the imagination of everybody who cares to see the laws faithfully executed. The retirement of Judge Daly last year, and the retirement of Judges Davis and Van Vorst this year, are occurrences, therefore, which even those who care least for ceremony do not feel disposed to let pass unnoticed. Judge Davis has been an able and upright judge, who has carried his court through very exciting times without any other impeachment of his integrity than that he was too good a Republican, and too well satisfied that only half the American people had any interest in the maintenance of the Government, to hold the scales with an impartiality which all men would acknowledge. But this was a fault from which the greatest judicial luminaries both here and in England have not been exempt, and against which men of strong natures and decided opinions find it almost impossible to guard themselves. Those who love to see a judge live in a wholly judicial atmosphere, and to pursue without fear and without reproach, but most quietly and unostentatiously, the path of judicial duty, will find Judge Van Vorst a more attractive figure. When he left the bench, it lost a good man, in all senses of the word—an upright magistrate, whose integrity of purpose no one has ever had reason to question, and who will be followed into well-won repose by everybody's thanks and good wishes. Both judges have done honor to the elective system to which they owed their elevation.

There are a great many side-lights thrown upon American history in the biography of Abraham Lincoln by John G. Nicolay and John Hay, which seems likely to take a high place in our political literature. One of the most valuable of these, illustrating the character and forecast of Mr. Lincoln himself, is an extract from a letter written by him December 17, 1840, soon after the election of President Harrison, to John T. Stuart, member of Congress from the Springfield, Ill., district. Mr. Stuart and Mr. Lincoln were entitled, according to party usage, to the "patronage of the district." Mr. Lincoln, however, privately advised Mr. Stuart that he was not in favor of removing postmasters for mere political differences. He said:

> "This affair of appointments to office is very annoying, more so to you than to me doubtless. I am, as you know, opposed to removals to make places for our friends. Bearing this in mind I express my preferences in a few cases, as follows, etc."

In other words, although there was no Civil-Service Reform Society in existence, or even dreamed of, Mr. Lincoln was a civil-service reformer at heart. The letter now published was written only for the eye of the person to whom it was addressed. It was a confidential communication. It expressed his inmost thought, and we cannot doubt that the motive which prompted him to give this advice to his friend Congressman Stuart was a lively sense of the dangers of the spoils system inaugurated in the Presidency of Gen. Jackson, twelve years before. It is no small thing to have the testimony of Mr. Lincoln, obtained in this way, recorded in behalf of civil-service reform. It may be said that when Mr. Lincoln himself became President he did not act upon the principles laid down in this letter. But such a criticism has no force, since the torrent of war which met him at the threshold of office never gave him rest or opportunity to consider any policies unconnected with secession and slavery.

The steady improvement of business is freshly illustrated by the report of the Massachusetts Savings Bank Commissioners for the year ending with October. The amount of deposits is $16,199,488 larger than in 1885, which is a gain of nearly one-third upon the increase in 1885 over the record in 1884. There is no more sensitive business barometer than the savings bank, and the uniformity with which large gains in deposits are shown by the reports in the different States is therefore a matter of much significance. The improvement of business is not the only cause of this increase in savings. Another important element is the continued and growing cheapness of provisions. Tables compiled by the American Grocer show that the wholesale cost of staple articles of food has, with one or two exceptions, been lower in 1886 than in 1885, the average price of flour, $4.43 per barrel for straight winter wheat, being the lowest on record. It seems quite safe to say that it costs less to live now than at any previous time for a generation.

That the abolition of slavery was a boon to the South, solely from the material point of view, is already capable of demonstration. The Charleston News and Courier has just established this fact beyond question, so far as the State of South Carolina is concerned, by a comparison of its condition in the year before the war with the record for 1886. Last year the total value of the farm products was $44,109,501, which, despite the decline in prices of late, is very nearly as much as the value in 1860, while the number of manufacturing establishments has advanced during this period from 1,230 to 3,242, the capital invested has more than trebled, the number of hands employed has increased nearly five-fold, and the value of the products now reaches $29,951,551. Adding to agricultural products the products in the different branches of manufacturing and the outputs of the mines and quarries, the News and Courier considers it evident that the total income of the State is now fully 50 per cent. larger under freedom than in the most prosperous era of slavery. Allowing for the increase in population, the average income of each person is already about as large as before the war, and is growing larger rapidly every year. It is evident that the time for speaking of the South as "still impoverished by the war" has passed, and that in fact she is already better off than before the outbreak of the rebellion.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, December 29, 1886, to TUESDAY, January 4, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND resumed his official duties on Tuesday, though still suffering from rheumatic pains.

President Cleveland some months ago withdrew his name as honorary Vice-President of the American Exhibition in England.

The public-debt reduction during December was $9,358,202.

The body of Senator Logan, after brief ceremonies at his late residence, was on Thursday afternoon taken to the Senate Chamber, where it lay in state until Friday. At noon the funeral services were held in the presence of a distinguished assembly. The solemn services were begun by the reading of the Ninth Psalm by Bishop Andrews. Dr. Butler read as the burial service a portion of the Fifteenth Corinthians. Prayer was offered by Dr. Tiffany, and the funeral sermon was delivered by Dr. Newman. The body was then taken to Rock Creek Cemetery for temporary interment in a vault.

A movement has been started in Chicago to pay off Gen. Logan's debts, which amount to $30,000. This is in addition to the amount that is being raised for Mrs. Logan.

The Civil-Service Commissioners, after a careful investigation of the New York Custom-house, have submitted a report to the President recommending that promotion be made from class to class by a process of examination, upon certification of the whole list of eligibles to the promoting officer. The regulations which the President is considering will supersede the so-called "Hayes rules," under which promotions have heretofore been made in the New York Custom-house.

A movement is in progress among Southern men in Congress who are in favor of the reduction of the surplus, to form a combination by which the taxes upon fruit brandy and tobacco and its manufactures shall be abolished, and there is some expectation that Mr. Randall will coöperate in this scheme. It is also said by Democrats who ought to know that Mr. Morrison, during the holiday recess, has become convinced that it will be expedient for him to move again to consider revenue bills, and that it is not improbable that he will have a larger vote than he had before.

Prior to the recent discussion of the Inter-State Commerce Bill, the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association of Cincinnati passed a resolution endorsing the measure and urging its adoption. On Thursday, after discussion, the former action was rescinded, and a resolution adopted setting forth that the bill in question in some of its features aims at a radical interference with the business interests of the country.

Mr. V. P. Snyder, Deputy Comptroller of the Currency, was on Saturday appointed Examiner of National Banks at the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, in place of Mr. A. M. Scriba.

The New York Legislature convened at 11 A. M. on Tuesday at Albany. James W. Husted (having received the caucus nomination of the Republicans) was elected Speaker of the Assembly by 73 votes to 51 for W. F. Sheehan (Dem.). Charles A. Chickering (Rep.) was reëlected Clerk.

The annual message of Gov. Hill was sent to the New York Legislature on Tuesday. He renews and enumerates sixteen recommendations of his previous messages which have not yet been embodied in legislation. Among the new recommendations which he makes are the following: (1) Some means to lessen the present burden of taxation on real estate, and provide for the taxation of that species of property which now almost entirely escapes assessment, to wit, the indebtedness of corporations, joint-stock companies and associations represented in the scrip, bonds, or certificates of indebtedness issued by such bodies. (2) A representation of all interests of the State in the coming Constitutional Convention. It is suggested that the Convention should consist of 110 delegates, of which 68 should be elected by districts, 2 from each Congressional district, and 42 should be elected from the State at large, no elector being permitted to vote for more than 15 delegates, and the 42 delegates receiving respectively the highest number of votes should be declared elected. (3) A legal holiday to be known as "Labor Day"; a special labor commission to examine the whole subject of the grievances of labor; and the making of manual training a part of the public-school system.

Presiding Justice Noah Davis of the Supreme Court of this city was on Thursday presented with an engrossed address by the New York bar in view of his retirement from the bench after a service of twenty-six years. His portrait by Huntington was presented to the Supreme Court. A reception was given him by the Bar Association in the evening.

Abram S. Hewitt sent his first message as Mayor of New York city to the Board of Aldermen on Monday. In it he says: "The change in the law which gave the appointment of commissioners to the Mayor has enabled my predecessor to make eight appointments by which the character of the commissions has been greatly improved. So far as the appointments may be made during my term of office, I shall endeavor not to fall below the standard of excellence which he has set up. Inasmuch, however, as I am necessarily lacking at the outset in the knowledge of municipal government which, fortunately, my predecessor possessed when his power of appointment was enlarged, I shall endeavor to supply it from the larger experience of the heads of departments, by calling them together from time to time for consultation. This course would seem to be especially necessary in view of the fact that the Legislature will begin its annual session to-morrow, and will be asked to consider measures of vital consequence to the city." He proposes to have a thorough investigation made by the Commissioners of Accounts before making any specific reform recommendations.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania rendered on Monday a decision relative to the penal statute of May 21, 1885, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, which declares the law to be constitutional and valid.

Official count of the vote on the Minnesota State ticket was made on Monday. The result on Governor was: A. R. McGill (Rep.), 107,064; A. A. Ames (Dem.), 104,464; T. E. Childs (Proh.), 18,966; scattering, 37. Dr. Ames will contest the election.

The County Judges of the drought-stricken district of Texas met recently. Twenty counties were represented. They reported in the aggregate 27,900 persons in actual need of food and clothing. They have made an official report and published an appeal to the Legislature, and ask the endorsement of the Governor. They also make an appeal to charitable people for immediate relief.

It is announced that John Roach, the shipbuilder, is suffering from a cancer in the mouth, and that there is no longer any hope of his recovery.

James A. McMaster, for forty years the editor of the Freeman's Journal, a well-known Roman Catholic paper in this city, died on Wednesday in Brooklyn, aged sixty-seven years. In 1862 he was imprisoned in Fort Lafayette for publishing articles in favor of the rebellion.

Gen. William W. Loring (Loring Pasha) died at the St. Denis Hotel in this city on Thursday evening, having been taken ill with pneumonia on Wednesday. He was born in North Carolina in 1817. His father died at sea when he was a child, and the family moved to Florida. The son, as a boy, was a volunteer in the Seminole war, then became a student at Georgetown, D. C., and next studied law. He was a member of the first Legislature of Florida. In May, 1846, he was appointed a captain of Mounted Rifles, United States Army. Serving through the Mexican war, he lost an arm at Chapultepec, and was promoted for gallantry to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. After that he was actively engaged in Indian warfare. He resigned from the army at the outbreak of the Rebellion and joined the Confederate service, in which he became a Major-General. In 1868 Gen. Loring accepted an offer from the Khedive of Egypt to take a position in his army, and remained there ten years, during which he held the rank of General, or Pasha, and was engaged in active service against the Abyssinians. He returned to this country with a competency, and invested largely in orange-groves and real estate in Florida. About three years ago he published 'A Confederate Soldier in Egypt,' a book descriptive of life in the Khedive's army, and at the time of his death was engaged in writing an autobiography.

Hilborne L. Roosevelt died on Thursday in this city. He was thirty-seven years old. While very young he studied the manufacture of church organs, and then made several trips to Europe for the same object. He identified himself particularly with electric inventions as applied to organ building, which he began in this city on his own account in 1871. Among the organs that he built were those in the Garden City Cathedral, in Grace Church, and in the main building of the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia. Mr. Roosevelt invented several important details of the telephone.

Ex-Gov. Gibbs, known as the War Governor of Oregon, died in London on Thursday. He had been lecturing on temperance in Great Britain.

Gen. Albert Gallatin Lawrence of Newport, R. I., died on Saturday night, aged fifty-two years. A son of the late William Beach Lawrence, he served with conspicuous gallantry in the war, and particularly distinguished himself at the capture of Fort Fisher. After the war he was appointed Minister to Costa Rica.

Gen. George W. Palmer died on Sunday evening at his home in this city. He was born in Ripley, Chautauqua County, in 1835. When the war broke out he went to Washington, was soon appointed in the War Department, and held various military positions at Washington and in this State. In 1869 he took up the practice of law in this city and was appointed Appraiser of the Port. He resumed the practice of his profession in 1871. He was prominent in Republican political circles.

Bishop Horatio Potter, of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of New York, died on Sunday at his home in this city, after several years of bodily feebleness. His last appearance in public service was on Ascension Day in 1883, when he administered the rite of Confirmation in the Church of the Incarnation. He was born in Dutchess County, N. Y., on February 9, 1802, was graduated from Union College in 1826, and ordained a deacon in the following year. In 1833 he became rector of St. Peter's Church, Albany, and he retained that position until September, 1854, when he was elected Provisional Bishop of the diocese of New York. In 1861, on the death of Bishop Onderdonk, who was under suspension at the time of his death, he succeeded to the full Bishopric. He performed the laborious duties of his office with marked ability and faithfulness. In September, 1883, he was relieved of diocesan duties by the election of the Rev. Dr. Henry C. Potter, his nephew, as Assistant Bishop, who will succeed him as Bishop.

FOREIGN.

From a private letter of the Marquis of Salisbury the following account of the origin of the British Cabinet crisis is given: About two weeks ago Lord Randolph Churchill informed Lord Salisbury that unless the total army and navy estimates were very considerably below those of last year he would not continue as Chancellor of the Exchequer. After a discussion with the departments he resigned office in a letter which Salisbury received on Tuesday, December 21. Salisbury replied to his arguments, and said he could not take the responsibility of refusing the heads of the War Department and the Admiralty the sums which, after prolonged consideration, they thought necessary for the defence of the country, and least of all could he refuse the funds necessary for defending the ports and coaling stations, to which point Churchill had taken most objection. Churchill replied in a letter which Salisbury received at one A. M. on Thursday (Dec. 23), confirming his intention of resigning, and mentioning, much in the language used in his communication to the Times, his dissatisfaction with the legislative programme of the Government. Churchill had not before alluded to this subject in connection with his resignation. A few hours later the announcement of the resignation appeared in the Times.

Mr. George J. Goschen (Liberal Unionist) has finally consented to join the Tory Government, succeeding Lord Randolph Churchill as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The fact was officially announced on Monday. Lord Hartington fully approves Mr. Goschen's course. He joins the Ministry, the London Times says, on the understanding that he does so as a Liberal, and that his object is to strengthen the Unionist cause. He desires to be satisfied that he is in agreement with the Government on all important foreign and domestic questions. Mr. Goschen has not been offered the leadership of the Government in the House of Commons, but that will naturally revert to him after the pro tem. lead of Mr. W. H. Smith. Lord Salisbury has assured Lord Hartington that he is trying, with some hope of success, to overcome the reluctance of the Conservatives to accept Lord Hartington as Prime Minister.

Before accepting office in the Tory Cabinet, Mr. Goschen closely scrutinized the accounts and estimates of the War and Navy Departments in order to ascertain whether or not there were any grounds for Lord Randolph Churchill's charges of maladministration. He found that Lord Randolph had been misled by wrong data, which it is supposed were supplied through interested Treasury officials. Mr. Goschen is convinced that Lord Randolph is unable to prove his allegations, and that Lord Salisbury was right in refusing to reduce the estimates.

It is considered improbable that a change will be made in the British Foreign Office. Lord Iddesleigh denies that he has expressed a wish to retire, and Lord Morley denies that he has been offered the foreign portfolio. The Earl of Northbrook has consented to join Mr. Goschen in the Conservative Cabinet. He has heretofore been hostile to Lord Salisbury's foreign and Indian policies. He is suspected of sympathy with Mr. Gladstone. Mr. W. H. Smith has accepted the leadership of the House of Commons.

The Pall Mall Gazette asserts that Mr. Chamberlain has consented to have a private informal conference on the Irish question with Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Morley, and Sir William Vernon-Harcourt. Mr. Chamberlain denies this

Mr. Gladstone, in a letter to Sir William Vernon-Harcourt, has expressed his willingness for a free discussion of the differences in the Liberal party. The Birmingham Post announces that Sir William Vernon-Harcourt, Lord Herschell, Mr. Morley, Mr. Chamberlain, and Sir George Trevelyan will meet, probably next week, to discuss the Irish question in the spirit of Mr. Gladstone's letter.

The seventy-seventh anniversary of Mr. Gladstone's birth was celebrated on Wednesday by Liberal banquets in many places. Mr. Gladstone wrote as follows to the chairman of a banquet given at Chester in his honor: "The strain of the last year has been considerable, but never during my half century of labor have I more clearly seen that I was at work in behalf of my countrymen in all parts of the three kingdoms, and in behalf of the true union and greatness of the Empire, which in this year of her Majesty's jubilee we ought to cherish more warmly and loyally than ever. In this conviction the recent progress of events confirms me daily."

Mr. Gladstone, in his article in the Nineteenth Century on "Locksley Hall and the Jubilee," after praising the Laureate's verse, deals with the teachings of the poem. He admits that no greater calamity could happen to a people than that of breaking utterly from its past. This applies, however, he says, more to the aggregate than the immediate past. In the first three decades of this century England won great military glory, but her industry was brought to the lowest point of degradation. With the history of these three decades he says the history of the past fifty years contrasts favorably. He expresses the hope that his article will show that England is still young, though old, and in her latest days has not been unworthy of herself.

Mr. John Morley, writing in reply to Mr. A. V. Dicey's book on Ireland, argues that the question is not a theorem, but a problem; that it is not a matter of proving a thesis, but of curing a malady. If home rule is too mischievous to be tolerated, so is everything else. A crown colony is opposed to the Union; Irish representation is opposed to the Union. A provisional legislature on the model of the Legislature of Ontario or Quebec would be worse than repeal, and a local government would cure nothing and disturb everybody.

Mr. John Dillon on Thursday deposited £1,000 bail required by the recent decision against him in Dublin for agitating the plan of campaign.

Bernard Kelly, Parnellite M. P. for South Donegal, died suddenly on Sunday while visiting his constituents. He was secretary of the local branch of the National League and the son of a large merchant in Ballyshannon.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times affirmed on Thursday that he had information from an undoubted source that Russia and Germany signed a direct alliance a fortnight ago. "The Czar," said the correspondent, "was decided in taking this course by the attitude manifested towards Russia by Count Kálnoky, Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs, and by the expectation that M. Floquet would be made Prime Minister of France."

Dr. Blowitz says that by the terms of this new alliance Russia binds herself to remain neutral in the event of war between France and Germany, and Germany binds herself to remain neutral in the event of war between Russia and Austria.

It is reported in Vienna that the German Government has assured Count Kálnoky that the statement that a treaty has been concluded between Germany and Russia to the detriment of Austrian interests, is not true.

Russia has suggested as a basis for negotiations between the signatories to the Berlin treaty for the settlement of the Bulgarian question that the Bulgarian regents resign; that a new Sobranye be elected for Bulgaria only; that two Zankoffites be admitted into the Bulgarian Cabinet; that Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia be proposed to the new Sobranye for the Bulgarian rulership, and that an ordinary provincial assembly be convoked for Rumelia.

Russia has concluded arrangements for obtaining from the Hersants of Paris a loan of 75,000,000 francs. The money is to be expended in constructing a canal from the eastern extremity of the Gulf of Perekop in the Black Sea, across the neck of land joining the Crimea to the mainland, to the Sea of Azov, in order to afford a direct water route from the river Don to the Black Sea.

The Vienna press is becoming convinced that Russia is determined on war. Reports of increased Russian armaments are continually coming to hand from various sources. The latest intelligence of this kind is to the effect that 300,000 Russian troops have been ordered to mass in Kieff, and that the occupants of 10,000 houses have received official notification that soldiers will soon be billeted on them.

The Servian Government has opened confidential negotiations for a confederation of the various Balkan States in the event of war.

M. Clémenceau in a recent interview said: "There can be no war between France and Germany unless Germany makes the first attack, because every responsible Frenchman is determined that France shall offer no provocation. Even if Russia and Germany should fight, France would remain passive. It would require a gross provocation indeed to rouse France to war. Of course, France will refuse to disarm. It must be admitted that France has been coquetting with Russia, but this was intended merely to frighten Germany."

At a recent grand reception given to the officers of the army by the Minister of War, Gen. Boulanger emphatically disclaimed the warlike intentions ascribed to him in Germany.

Diplomats consider the statements made by the French Government organs that Gen. Boulanger had not reduced his supplemental military estimates from $60,000,000 to $10,000,000, coupled with the Journal Officiel's list of his reappointments of the generals in command of the French fortresses, another evidence that war is not remote.

It is reported that a conference has been held by President Grêvy and MM. Ferry and Freycinet with a view to the speedy dissolution of the present Ministry and the formation of a Ferry-Freycinet Cabinet. It is also reported that M. Ferry has consented to support M. Freycinet as the successor of President Grévy. The Radicals are in high dudgeon at the prospect of having their plans upset in this manner.

It has been decided that M. de Brazza shall be permitted to return to the French Congo country, and there dispose of the grant made by the Chamber of Deputies in the manner he may deem best.

Madagascar has concluded arrangements for obtaining a loan of $3,000,000 for twenty-five years at 6 per cent. per annum from the Comptoir Escompte of Paris, guaranteeing therefor the customs revenue of six of the Madagascar ports. Of this sum $2,000,000 is to be devoted to paying off the French indemnity, and the balance will be expended on the native army.

It is rumored that Rasalula, the Abyssinian commander who undertook the relief of Kassala, which has been besieged by the followers of the late El Mahdi for upwards of two years, has succeeded in rescuing the city from the Arabs. Another report states that the dervishes defeated the Abyssinians at Sabderat.

The German Reichstag will meet on the 4th of January, the Army Bill Committee on the 5th, and the Landtag on the 12th.

Should the United States Congress reject the new treaty with Spain, a duty of 25 per cent. will be levied on American imports, and the Spanish Government will immediately make overtures to other European Powers in order to obtain new markets for West Indian exports. Spanish statesmen of all parties look with uneasiness and jealousy upon the increasing intimacy of the relations between Cuba and Porto Rico on the one hand and the United States on the other.

The followers of King Bo-Shwé, after his flight into the impenetrable forests of Burmah, submitted to the British authorities,

SALARIES OF THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGES.

The bill, which has passed the Senate more than once, to increase the salaries of the United States district judges, has been somewhat unfairly treated by the Judiciary Committee of the House. If brought to a vote, it would almost certainly pass, but the dominating influence of the Southern members of the Committee, for reasons not difficult of explanation, has been sufficient to smother it, notwithstanding a favorable report by a bare majority of the Committee. Except in cases controlled by paramount political considerations, either house should always facilitate a vote upon any public bill that has passed the other, and the process of strangling a measure, so situated, by hostile committees, cannot be in the interest of wholesome legislation. The practice too often permits the prejudices of one or two men to obstruct the wishes of a large majority of both houses of Congress. Because of this unfair treatment in the House, the Senate attached the bill it had previously passed, as an amendment to a bill passed in the House to create a new district in one of the Southern States. Reluctantly, this plan of forcing the measure to a vote in the House was abandoned by its friends, upon the hope, if not the promise, that at the present session the Committee in the House would permit a vote upon the Senate bill.

There is not much room for any argument against the increase of salary. The standard already fixed for the circuit judges is a meagre enough measure of compensation for all the judges. If travelling expenses be paid by the Government, or an allowance for them be added to the salaries of the circuit judges, there is no substantial reason for any discrimination between them and the district judges. In any given district the district judge does the greatest part of the work of the Circuit Court in addition to that which he does in the District Court. There should not be two courts, and there is no necessity for two judges of the same court; but this is not the fault of the judges, and the district judges are not those that could be dispensed with as superfluous. Doing as much work as or more than the circuit judges, there is no just reason for paying the district judges less salary; and, in one sense, it is degrading to them and the judgments they give, by far the most numerous in the court, to pay them unequally. All discriminations, whether of pay or rank, are injurious to the public service, and this is a most serious objection to the existing judicial system. The judges of a court being coördinate in authority, as the several judges holding a circuit court are, should be co-equal in both rank and pay. These judges are in fact, in practice, and in theory the equals of each other, except that certain necessary provisions, growing out of the absurdities of the system, are made for proceeding with a case when they disagree in judgment. Sitting alone, either of them is the equal of the other, and, sitting together, no other inequality should exist than that just mentioned. For the time being the judgment of the circuit judge prevails, as does that of the Supreme justice over his, when these two sit together; but the very fact of disagreement formerly suspended the case until the Supreme Court could decide between them, and now affords a basis of appeal without regard to amount, after the final judgment according to the opinion of the presiding judge.

There can be, then, no reason for paying one more than the other, expenses of travel excepted; and it was generally understood, when the salaries of the circuit judges were increased to $6,000, that those of the district judges should be fixed at $5,000. The delay in doing this has been caused by the subsequent difference in the political complexion of the two houses of Congress, and a feeling that the salaries of the district judges should be graded according to the amount of work done by each. How far the fact that nearly all the judges of all the courts belonged to one political party—a deplorable fact, no doubt—has influenced the neglect of the district judges, may be conjectural; but, whatever has been that influence, it should no longer operate, since the remedy is being rapidly applied as vacancies occur. Political considerations are unworthy of attention from any source in regard to this matter, and, perhaps, no member of Congress would confess that any such influence controls him. With possibly some rare exceptions, anomalous in their character, it may be affirmed that the judges of the United States courts have been commendably free from political motives in the discharge of official duties. These courts and their judges have not been exempt from that hostility which arises from the innate prejudices on the one hand of an exaggerated local opinion in favor of States' rights, or, on the other, from the favoritism which follows undue exaltation of the Federal notion; but, after all, they succeed in meeting the demands of the most intelligent public opinion for a judiciary that shall be reasonably free, in the judgments which they give, from bias in either direction.

The argument that the salaries should be graded is, under the circumstances, delusive, although speciously so. An act of Congress properly and sternly forbids all the judges from practising law or acting as counsel. Presumably, none of them has either a taste for or any adaptation by experience to any other remunerative calling. And it is wholly undesirable that the judges should engage in money-making pursuits—certainly in corporate enterprises, manufacturing concerns, stock speculations, or other doubtful employments, which, for obvious reasons, unfit any man for the judicial office. This is too plain to require anything more than a statement of the proposition to enforce it; and as long as Congress requires the judges to abstain from professional labor, it in effect disables them from all labor that would add anything to their salary as a means of support for themselves and their families. If the salaries were $500 a year, abundant applicants would offer for every place, no doubt, but the United States should pay a fair salary to secure the ablest men, and tolerate none other.

Much has been made of the singular suggestion that these judges should not be paid more than the State judges are paid. This would enable a parsimonious local influence to regulate the salaries of the national courts, and, in some States, deprive those judges of just compensation. The argument is the outgrowth of mere prejudice against the Federal courts, and is not entitled to the least serious consideration. The United States should set a good example, and not follow a bad one in deference to provincial prejudices of that kind.

TOBACCO.

It is customary to include the tobacco tax among "taxes on luxuries," and to point to it as an ideal source of revenue because nobody need pay it unless he chooses to do so. As compared with many other taxes, this is a correct description. Taxes on food and clothing are much more objectionable, whether levied under the tariff or otherwise. A statesman unbiassed by the demands of special interests, and looking only to the good of the community as a whole, would knock off thousands of other taxes before he would reduce that on tobacco, and he would do so in the interest of the poorer classes. He would first cheapen their sugar and their salt, their shirts and blankets, their medicines and their tools, before he would think of cheapening their tobacco. Yet it is not exactly right to say that the tobacco tax should be retained as long as the Government needs any revenue.

The dividing line between necessaries, comforts, and luxuries is a hard one to draw. The East Indian coolie can live on rice of a poor quality flavored with salt and washed down with common spring water. The West Indian laborer is compelled not seldom to subsist on this sort of diet with yams in place of rice, and the Irish cotter with potatoes instead of either. These, or their equivalent in corn-meal, or dates, or chestnuts, may be called the actual necessaries of life as regards food. Of course no one will consider that as necessary which civilized men never felt the need of, or knew the existence of, until the time of Sir Walter Raleigh. As the Romans conquered the world without using tobacco in any form, it cannot be considered an article indispensable to the dominant races. As neither Homer, nor Dante, nor Shakspere smoked or chewed, it cannot be regarded as essential to the highest intellectual activity.

Tobacco must be rated either as a comfort or as a luxury. Our treatment of it as a source of revenue will depend very much upon which category we put it into. If it is, strictly speaking, a luxury, then the tax should be retained, or at all events should not be disturbed at present. If it is a comfort depended upon by large numbers of poor people to soothe and soften their lot in life, then the same arguments hold good for reducing or repealing it that apply to a great multitude of things not necessary to civilized life, but in such common use that deprivation of them would be counted a great hardship, such as tea and coffee, both of which are of comparatively recent introduction to the civilized world. Tea and coffee being articles of food, as well as of comfort and solace, are much better entitled to consideration in the arrangement of taxes than tobacco. Yet neither of them can be called necessaries, seeing that neither Alexander the Great nor Julius Cæsar, neither Demosthenes nor Cicero, ever tasted either of these articles, and yet reached very high standards.

Tea, coffee, and tobacco have been seized upon by governments as sources of revenue almost everywhere, not because they are the most appropriate subjects of taxation from the standpoint of justice, but because they are articles of universal use. Being such, they insure a very large income to the treasury, and this is very easily collected. The fact that the poor pay nearly as much of these taxes per capita as the rich is lost sight of, or purposely hidden, or, when brought forward as an accusation against the ruling authorities, is excused upon the ground that no other enforceable means can be devised for collecting the necessary amount. This country long ago discarded the taxes on tea and coffee. The repeal was unjustifiable only because it was adopted as a means of clearing the Treasury of surplus funds, in order to retain other taxes still more unjust and oppressive to the poorer classes, the proceeds of which go into the pockets of private persons and do not reach the Treasury at all. If this element of fraud could be left out of the reckoning, the repeal of the taxes on tea and coffee would be among the wisest financial measures ever adopted by any government, because it put an end to a disproportionate tax upon the poorer classes.

The question of repealing or reducing the tobacco tax comes before us with the same complications. We are not permitted to discuss it apart from the tariff taxes, which oppress the poor much more severely than the rich. The question which presents itself to a rational mind is, whether it is best to take off the tobacco tax rather than the clothing tax, the sugar tax, the salt tax, or the raw-material tax. Of course, the answer must be in favor of retaining the tobacco tax. But supposing that the protectionist superstition, or the protectionist ring, is too strong as yet to be broken, what view should be taken of the proposed repeal or reduction of the tax on tobacco? In our view it is not a thing for free-traders to wail over. The repeal bill does not come at its proper place in the procession. It ought to follow rather than precede the repeal of the taxes on blankets and thread and wood-screws and codfish, etc., but it ought to come some time because the tobacco tax is an unequal assessment upon the humbler classes, upon those least able to bear the burden. Grant that it is a voluntary burden, the bearing of it ought not to be required unless it can be shown that tobacco is upon the whole hurtful to the human system and to the social system. Meantime, it is admitted by most of those who have adequate means of knowledge, that tobacco is a great solace and sedative to the worker, whether he works with his mind or with his muscles, and is a kind of stimulant which does not call for an increasing dose in order to produce its customary effect. We now and then hear of a tobacco drunkard, but they are as rare as white blackbirds. None of them are wife-beaters, or give any occupation to the police.

SOME RECENT MEXICAN LEGISLATION.

THE first session of the Thirteenth Mexican Congress, brought to a close on December 15, besides the infinity of private bills, passed some measures of national and even international importance. First among these are the enactments looking to relief from the financial strain under which Mexico is laboring. One of these is the so-called amendment to article 124 of the Constitution, declared adopted on the 26th of November with due pomp and parade, and heralded as of great significance both for domestic and foreign commerce. The impression was given, that is, that the system of internal custom-houses and of onerous municipal taxes on produce, the "alcabala, was to be entirely abolished. To effect this it would not seem that there was need of amending the Constitution of '57, inasmuch as the very article in question distinctly declares: "On December 1, 1858, the alcabalas and interior custom-houses shall be abolished throughout the entire Republic." Article 124 says exactly and solely this. But it remained a dead letter. So did the law of May 17, 1882, which enacted that "On December 1, 1884, at the latest, the alcabalas and interior custom-houses shall be abolished in the Federal District and in the Territory of Lower California, as well as in those States which have not already suppressed them."

The substance of the new amendment is that the States can no longer tax commodities in simple transit through their territory, that they can lay no export duty, that duties must be assigned without discrimination against localities, and that domestic traffic shall no longer be compelled to follow a fixed route or be subjected to inspection and entry. Here would certainly appear to be a gain for importers and shippers, provided the law is executed, but the advantage for domestic trade must be considered problematical. For example, the Governor of the State of Mexico has just issued a decree whose bare terms will best show how these matters of fiscal reform fare under Mexican methods: "Article 1. The collection of the alcabala is to cease throughout the State, and for it is to be substituted an impost called duty of consumption. Article 2. The duty of consumption shall take effect in the same cases and upon the same products as did the alcabala." This process would seem to be rightly called by El Nieto del Ahuizote, the comic illustrated paper of the capital, the proverbial one of changing the piston and leaving the syringe the same.

Far more significant is the action taken by Congress on the report and proposed bill of a committee appointed to bring in measures for the promotion of the interests of mining, of agriculture, and of manufactures. Nothing more radical has ever been heard in Mexico than the speech of Señor Bulnes, the able chairman of this committee. He cogently set forth the need of helping the industries of the country by freeing them from the vexatious governmental regulations and the frightful taxation to which they are now subject. In reference to the tariff he took ground which he admitted to be essentially that of free trade, but contented himself with urging for the present no more than the putting on the free list of several articles and the reduction of the duty on others. The first ten sections of the bill which he presented, and which, strange to say, after an animated discussion, was passed by a large majority, are occupied with provisions removing from miners and farmers some of the strangling taxes hitherto laid upon them. The eleventh section removes all import duty from a long list of articles, of which the most important are all the acids used in mining, barbed wire, live animals, ploughs and ploughshares, pitch and tar, crowbars, all sizes of wire, iron tubing, all classes of machinery used in mining or agriculture, powder and dynamite, common salt. The succeeding section reduces to a merely nominal sum the duty on several minor articles. This bill, as we have said, passed the House of Deputies with no appreciable opposition, though it was not, so far as we can learn, taken up by the Senate, and will, therefore, come up as unfinished business at the spring session. Completely in the face of Spanish traditions and of Mexican practice as it is, this enlightened measure must be supposed to have back of it the approval of the Administration, else it could never have been received as it was, and accordingly to be one of the certainties of coming legislation. It is highly suggestive of more sweeping changes to follow in the outrageous tariff which has so long marked the barbarous character of the fiscal policy of Mexico, and is reassuring evidence that the densest ignorance and prejudice cannot for ever withstand reason.

We regret to have to add to the encouraging features of recent Mexican legislation which we have cited, one step decidedly retrogressive. We refer to the repeal of the law of 1867 which forbade bull-fights within the Federal District. Those demoralizing exhibitions are to be restored to the capital, 15 per cent. of all receipts to be paid over to the Government and to be devoted to the fund for the drainage of the city. It cannot be denied that there is a sort of ghastly propriety in using a revenue derived from such a source for the purpose of disposing of the city's filth.

GERMAN VS. AMERICAN UNIVERSITY SALARIES.

DESPITE repeated correction, the orthodox view of German university life current in this country persistently maintains one eminent misconception. The generally accepted type of the German university professor is a man who has put behind him the world, the flesh (and the devil?), divested himself of carnal ambitions, and given over the search after the root of all evil—except in the purely theological sense. He is lean, shabby, and generally poverty-stricken, a self-sacrificing, self-abnegating truth-seeker. His salary is a pittance, a mere life preserver; and starvation figures are quoted by book-writers and lecturers as appeals to the ludicrous, or by college trustees as an intimation to the pampered American professor that he ought to feel himself supremely blessed and particularly well-fed. It is certainly startling to hear that the famous theologian, Karl Hase, during fifty years (1830–1880) of brilliant service in the University of Jena, managed to subsist upon a salary that never exceeded $600 (800 thalers). Relying upon reports and estimates like this, American universities in quest of foreign rarities have assured themselves that their $3,000–$4,000 salaries would be most captivating bait. They have repeatedly let down the line, but no big fish bite.

The fact is, that for a German professor ordinarius or well-established extraordinarius with fair prospect of a successful career, the American university salary will offer no possible attraction; and the reason is not far to seek. It may lie partly, to be sure, in the natural disinclination to expatriation so notably characteristic of the German official as well as military and aristocratic class, especially in so far as expatriation is supposed to involve retirement from the arena of advanced investigation. This explanation is, however, unnecessary. The German professor is decidedly better off financially than the American; and we shall deceive ourselves if we think the German Gelehrter oblivious to financial considerations, or in any wise disinclined to estimate the value of his services in terms of the worldly mammon.

A comparison of American with German salaries cannot, of course, be effected by rudely turning one dollar into four marks, or even by levelling with the help of any such ratio in comparative cost of living as 3 : 2 or 2 : 1. The entire scale of living differs. The recognized standard of living is different. In America the mercantile class makes, more or less immediately and definitely, but ultimately, the standard for the official and professional class as well as for itself. In Germany the official (including the professorial) class is conscious of an independent existence, maintains a standard of its own, and lets the mercantile class go its own gait. This distinction is most evident in Berlin and Leipzig.

Entirely independent, however, of such considerations as these, the German salary will stand the test of a direct comparison of marks and dollars much better than has been generally believed. Salary must, however, be understood in the sense of income, and must, for purposes of comparison, include the various lecture fees, examination fees, both for the civil examinations (Staatsexamina) and doctor examinations, the allowance for rent (Wohnungszulage), and occasional immunity from various taxes, to say nothing of the various travelling stipendia, of the definite prospect of pension, and of the permanency of tenure. In the larger universities the lecture fees alone frequently exceed the amount of the salary. Assistant professors in Berlin have frequently declined calls to full professorships in smaller universities, preferring the fees in Berlin to the salary elsewhere. Prominent lecturers in the philosophical faculty at Leipzig receive $2,000 to $3,500 in lecture fees, medical and law professors much more. Windscheid, the "Pandektist," receives a yearly addition to his income of about $5,000 from this source alone. In Berlin figures run still higher.

The Wohnungszulage is a small or nominal allowance for rent which many universities prefer to keep distinct from the salary proper, in order to reduce the claims for pension, which are ultimately based upon the maximum amount of salary received during the years of active service. Allowance is also made for moving expenses in case of removal from one university to another.

Examination fees are very considerable. Most faculties have now adopted the practice of dividing the fees for each doctor-examination per capita among all the members of the faculty before which the examination is held. This amounts in the philosophical faculty of the average university to about $2 or $3 for each examination. Similar fees attach to positions on the Prüfungscommission for the civil examinations, positions held by the representative professors of each university department. A second and not inconsiderable advantage of such a position is the legal or moral necessity imposed upon the student and prospective candidate of subscribing for all the lecture courses of his future examiner.

The offices of honor, the prorectorships and the decanates of the various faculties pass in a sort of rotation through the list of professors, and involve considerable extra emolument; for instance, the prorector generally receives all the matriculation fees, or $3 to $5 for each new student.

A recent number of the Kulturkämpfer (September, 1886) offers an interesting article entitled "Das neue Leipzig und seine Universität," in which some figures are given relative to the incomes of Leipzig professors. The average salary —i. e., the salary proper in distinction from the other sources of income—of the sixty-three regular professors is said to be 5,525 marks, or about $1,300. The average income may be safely set at more than double this sum. The average salary of the forty-eight assistant and honorary professors is reported as 2,400 marks. The entire income of the University amounts to 1,197,079 marks, of which the endowment yields 423,271 and the State appropriations 773,808 marks. The sum total of salaries paid to professors amounts to 463,315 marks.

In the smaller universities the minimum salary (proper) of a full professor is now about 700-800 thalers (2,100-2,400 marks). Increase of salary depends, as a rule, upon the demand for the services of a particular professor elsewhere. The comparative uniformity of American salaries within the same university flavors of communism, and has an effect upon individual impulse similar to that of trades-union wages. As a rule, the figures of a German salary may be said to roughly represent the number of calls the man has received. At Heidelberg, for example, several professors receive a higher salary than the facile princeps Bunsen; he long ago expressed his determination to spend his days where he is, and so withdrew himself from the market. His present salary is less than $2,000, to which must be added, however, in fees at least $3,500. The highest salary paid by the University is $2,700 to the philosopher Kuno Fischer, whose income from fees is also large. Heidelberg is poor, and some of its younger men are very poorly paid, but the smallest income of any full professor is about $1,500. If this seem small, it is to be remembered that the average professor's salary in America is scarcely more. Relatively few colleges pay over $2,000–$2,200. On the basis of the bare figures alone, the Germans are better off; the advantage of cheaper living and different social requirements is clear gain. The grievous side of the German university career is the period of probation; the Privatdocent butters his bread with hopes.

THE DAILY AND PERIODICAL PRESS IN ITALY.

LENDINARA, December 4, 1886.

I HAVE a faint suspicion that more than ten years since I sent an article with this same title to the Nation, dating from Rome; and if I am right in my surmise, comparisons may be found odious, as since that time the Italian press has certainly not ameliorated, and from many points of view has deteriorated. Compared with the Americans, the English, the French, and the Germans, Italians spend very little time in reading. Not long since I said to one of the largest publishing houses in Italy: "It is difficult to understand why, during the sixteen years that have elapsed since Cattaneo's death, the owner of his papers has never been able to find a publisher for his political writings." His answer was: "Find me readers and I will find a publisher." Such a response might be intelligible in England, where circulating libraries like Mudie's and his country branches exist, but in Italy such luxuries to poor readers are unknown. If you except Vieusseux's old standing library in Florence for ancient and modern books and daily and weekly newspapers, with a fair sprinkling of English and American fortnightlies and monthlies, you may say that Italy possesses no public reading-rooms. In the large city of Milan, for instance, unless you have a friend who can present you to some private club or circolo, you must subscribe or buy your dailies if you wish to read them. At Venice there is the Querini-Stampaglia foundation, at Rome the United Press Association opens its rooms to friends of members; but large cities such as Naples, Turin, Bologna, Pisa offer nothing to the general public. One would suppose, therefore, that good daily papers, a few weekly, and half-a-dozen monthlies might live on their purchasers and subscribers, but this is not the case. In the bad old days, when party spirit ran high, the party of order and the party of action issued racy newspapers. In Turin the Opinione, in Milan the Perseveranza—the former edited by Signor Dina, the second by Signor Bonghi—furnished good daily reading. So the several Mazzinian papers, the Tribuna, the Italia del Popolo, the Italia e Popolo, the Unità Italiana, the Dovere, the Emancipatore, variously edited by Quadrio, Campanella, De Boni, Mario, and other good ones gone. The Diritto held the middle line between these two extremes, published first in Turin and afterwards in Florence by the heads of the old Piedmontese Left, Lorenzo Valerio, Sineo, Brofferio, and reinforced by recruits from the party of action, who, after the campaign of 1860, in obedience to the plébiscite, took their seats as members of Parliament. Up to 1870, these clearly drawn party lines were kept distinct; but when, in 1870, Rome became the capital of Italy, nothing seemed left to fight for or to write about. Consequently, parties ceased to supply the sinews of war, and one after another the newspapers not maintained by Government funds died for want of breath. The party of action struggled bravely as long as Mazzini, Garibaldi, Maurizio Quadrio lived to inspire them. On the day of Mazzini's death, March 10, 1872, expired also the Roma del Popolo, a splendid weekly initiated by Mazzini himself, and to which he confided his last thoughts on religious, social, and political questions. The Emancipatore and the Dovere, posthumous echoes of the great master's words, died with the chief apostle, Maurizio Quadrio, in 1876. The Lega della Democrazia, intended by Garibaldi to become the organ of the various fractions of the democratic party, died with its editor, Alberto Mario, one year to the day and hour after Garibaldi's death. The Fascio and the Democrazia, which arose from its ashes, breathed scarcely six months apiece. At the present moment the old party of action has no vocal organ.

The party of order, whose members are wealthy and better trained, retain some of their old newspapers, but, alas! they are shadows of their former selves. Who now reads the Perseveranza of Milan or the Opinione of Rome, save the writers and their special friends? The Diritto one scarcely hears of and rarely sees quoted; the Tempo for Venice, the Gazzetta di Torino for Turin, the Caffaro for Genoa, the Nazione for Florence, and the Pungolo for Naples are mere local papers, though in favor of the last it must be said that it treats broadly and fairly all national and international questions, and Italian politics from a mild half-way-milestone point of view. The Government, or rather Signor Depretis, owns as organ the Popolo Romano. Of the editor and his paper the less said the better. The Tribuna is certainly the best Roman paper, and represents the politics—we had better say, the aspirations—of Cairoli, Nicotera, and other ex-right-honorables, left out in the cold. The Riforma is the mere personal organ of Signor Crispi, who, as proprietor and real editor, maintains it at his own expense. The daily Rassegna ceased to exist in this last month of November; its proprietors and chief editors, Sydney Sonnino and fraternity, set on foot and for several years maintained the best weekly paper ever seen in Italy, the Rassegna Settimanale, in which social questions were impartially treated from a practical, scientific, and philosophical point of view. Now, more than ever, such a newspaper is a desideratum in Italy, since in every town or city a so-called social newspaper appears and disappears, leaving no useful trace behind it. I am not, as may seem, in a pessimist mood, nor at all inclined to judge newspapers from a party point of view; nay, I must confess my weakness for the genus and the various species. American and English papers I read with delight. But in Italy hunger and dearth are words all too meek: there is an absolute famine of literary or real political food. Taking daily papers as a whole, the Secolo of Milan, which has a circulation of 80,000 copies, has the merit of giving you the news of the day within the twenty-four hours; but the only daily paper worth reading is the old Unità Cattolica of Turin, still edited by Don Margotto, the most sceptical of mortals and the phœnix of journalists. A subscriber I am not nor have ever been—it would require more moral courage than I possess to have the organ of that thorough-going, constant champion of the temporal power of the papacy addressed to my humble dwelling daily; but when there is a chance of reading it round the corner, I confess to devouring it surreptitiously, and feeling satisfied after so doing. It gives you general news, reports the doings and sayings of friends and foes; some of its articles on non-religious questions are admirable, and for memory of dates, facts, episodes, and anecdotes, Don Margotto is unsurpassed; his only rival in the times gone by was Maurizio Quadrio, editor of the Unità Italiana.

This is not a satisfactory report, but, believe me, it is as conscientious as it is painful to the writer. If, passing from the daily to the periodical press, I could give a brighter picture, there would be due compensation, but this is not the case. From 1820 to 1860 I doubt whether any country in Europe possessed a more splendid periodical press than did Italy. Think of the old Politecnico under Carlo Cattaneo, issued between the years 1837 and 1849, then reissued in 1860, and continued until the death of that great philosopher and political economist. In that monthly review every question, great or small, was exhaustively treated—the theology and philosophy of Rosmini and Romagnosi and Ferrari, political economy from Adam Smith to Stuart Mill, agriculture from Arthur Young to Ricasoli and Ridolfi, the state of India and British treatment of Ireland (anent which country Cattaneo's prophecies are, alas, all too well fulfilled); the United States with her civil war; railroads, gas-lighting, popular armament, rotation of crops, the necessities of Italy of those days. Or take, if you prefer, a more conservative organ, the Crepuscolo, which saw the light, lived and died under the Austrian régime between 1849 and 1859. That was a weekly paper, a star of first magnitude, visible during the darkest night. Then, to come to more prosaic times, think of the Vecchia Antologia, under the bad old grand-dukes, and even the Nuova Antologia until a few years since, never equal to the Revue des Deux Mondes, still keeping pace with it at a respectful distance. But now, if you except Ruggero Bonghi's uniformly excellent articles, a rare contribution from Pasquale Villari, and an annual sonnet or literary gem from Giosuè Carducci, the Nuova Antologia is but a shadow of its former self.

The number of journals subsidized by the Government and the sum paid it is impossible to state. That is a secret known only to the handler of the secret-service funds; but the fact, which is incontestable, does not diminish the discredit into which the press has gradually fallen. J. W. M.

A NEW VIEW OF LA BRUYÈRE.

PARIS, December 17, 1886.

M. ÉTIENNE ALLAIRE has just published two large octavo volumes on La Bruyère. It is not long since M. Servois undertook a study of our great moralist, which found a place in Hachette's magnificent collection of "Les grands écrivains de la France." M. Servois carefully collected all the original documents concerning the life of La Bruyère. M. Allaire has had peculiar opportunities. He was chosen in 1866 as preceptor of the young Duc de Guise, the second son of the Duc d'Aumale, and he remained a few years at Twickenham, where he had access to the archives of the House of Condé. He used the documents which he found there as well as in the rich library of the Duc d'Aumale, and compared them with other well-known documents—Dangeau's 'Journal,' the Memoirs of the Marquis de Sourches, those of Saint-Simon, etc.—and he finally made for himself a sort of theory of the 'Caractères,' which I must explain.

There were in the lifetime of La Bruyère eight successive editions of the 'Caractères.' Each new edition contained some new characters, portraits, maxims, spread somewhat in disorder among the old ones; each of these additions was the result of La Bruyère's mental experience during a certain period of time; and M. Allaire, if I understand his plan, has tried to explain these successive additions by the history of the time. He sees in them a sort of mirror of events, a mirror which gives at times a confused light, but which is nevertheless faithful. Surely, the mind of La Bruyère, living as he did in the atmosphere of the court, could not but receive strong and constant impressions; it remains, however, to discern how much in these various strata of thought, if the word may be allowed, which are found in his numerous editions is subjective and how much is objective—how much is the lesson of the time and how much must be looked upon as the mere individual caprice of a creative mind. This was a very delicate work to perform, one which required the insight of the moralist as much as the knowledge of the historian.

M. Guillaume Guizot has planned an edition of Montaigne, in which the additions of the second and of the third part are marked with some visible sign, so as to show the progress of Montaigne's ideas; and he has also undertaken to explain the development of the philosophy of Montaigne in connection with the history of his time. His work is not yet finished. M. Allaire's task was easier, since there are as many as eight original editions of La Bruyère: a mathematician would say that the law of a curve is easier to find when you know many points of it. The additions in La Bruyère become more and more numerous: "From the fourth edition to the eighth," says M. Allaire, "that is to say, from 1688 to 1694, there is no year during which the follies of his contemporaries do not furnish him elements for a new volume. The fourth, the fifth, the sixth, the seventh, the eighth, all have very important additions, wherein we see a reflex of the moral facts of which La Bruyère was an attentive witness, and of the historical facts of which he was an authoritative judge. He places under our eyes not only literary events of the highest interest, such as the quarrel of the ancients and of the moderns, the criticism of 'Tartuffe,' the triumph of 'Esther,' and the fall of 'Athalie'; but also political events of the highest gravity, such as the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the diplomacy of the Prince of Orange, the English Revolution, the League of Augsburg. . . . In our eyes La Bruyère is no less remarkable as a historian than as a moralist."

M. Allaire has not quite followed the plan which I set forth; he does not follow La Bruyère from edition to edition. The thread of his study is not chiefly literary, it is chiefly historical; he tells in the most minute details the history of the times, and, when the moment comes for a criticism or a philosophical maxim, instead of making it himself, he introduces a sentence from La Bruyère. His work might be called the History of the Court of Louis XIV., with a perpetual commentary by La Bruyère. Such a method is open to criticism; it is very arbitrary, it is not often possible to see a distinct connection between the events and the reflections of La Bruyère, which have a character of great generality. It would be, I do not say easy, but possible, to write a history of Louis XIV. intermixed with constant citations from Pascal, or from any other great moralist. At the foot of each page you see notes giving references to such or such a chapter of the 'Caractères,' to such or such numbers of these chapters. I observe, for instance, on page 25 of the first volume of M. Allaire's work as many as eight such notes, which means that there are on the page as many as eight citations from La Bruyère; on page 41 I find also eight such notes; there is hardly a page where such a note is not found.

La Bruyère was the witness of very extraordinary events, and he lived with very extraordinary people; but his position did not allow him to make any clear allusions. We shall not repeat here the biographical details given by M. Servois about his first years and his youth; we will only follow him after he entered the family of Condé. He was attached, on Bossuet's recommendation, to the Duc de Bourbon, the grandson of the Grand Condé. M. le Prince, as the latter was called, wished to make a hero or at least a good soldier of this grandson. M. le Duc (such was the name given to Condé's son, the father of La Bruyère's pupil) was less ambitious: he merely wished to make of the Duc de Bourbon a perfect courtier: he was very anxious to marry him to Mlle. de Nantes, a daughter of Louis XIV. and of Mme. de Montespan, since a marriage with a légitimée would give the young Prince the grandes entrées—that is, free access to the King in his private apartment and at all hours. Gourville, who was the general intendant and factotum of the House of Condé (he left very curious memoirs), entered into these plans. So did Mme. de Maintenon, who was on the point of secretly marrying the King. The match was decided at Chantilly, between Louis XIV. and Condé, though the Duc de Bourbon was only fifteen years old. La Bruyère entered upon his functions on the 15th of August, 1684. The Great Condé had himself traced the programme of the education of the young Prince. M. Allaire enters into very interesting details on this subject, and describes minutely the entourage of the Duc de Bourbon and the life of the little court at Chantilly, and afterwards of the Hôtel de Condé in Paris. La Bruyère followed the Duc de Bourbon everywhere, trying to teach him history, to explain to him the Cartesian philosophy. Such subjects were somewhat too serious for the young Prince, and his preceptor soon found that the Duc de Bourbon, like his father, M. le Duc, would be very different from the Grand Condé.

The death of the last-named gives M. Allaire an occasion to speak of a well known tradition, which was carefully concealed for a long time from those who did not belong to the great House of Condé. Tallemant des Réaux says distinctly: "The Marshal de Brézé married the sister of the Cardinal de Richelieu, then Bishop of Luçon. The woman was mad; she died in confinement."

Nobody ever denied this fact. From this marriage came two children, one of whom, Claire Clémence de Maillé-Brézé, married the Great Condé (February 7, 1641). Condé had in vain striven against his father, who was anxious to secure the good will of the great Cardinal, and obliged his son to contract this marriage. Condé never ceased to protest that he had never given his consent to this union except under fear of the violence of the Cardinal and out of deference to the absolute wish of his father. The Princess of Condé was only thirteen years old when she was married, and still played with her dolls; she became in time a lively brunette. A child was born a little while after the battle of Rocroy; two others were born afterwards, but died young. Condé, however, neglected his wife. He was convinced that his marriage was a blot on his character; he could not reconcile himself to it. The Princess was much affected by his desertion, and she became a monomaniac. The secret was well kept and her mania remained unknown. M. Allaire cites, however, a report of an English political agent, taken from the State Paper Office (published in an 'Essay on the Life of the Great Condé,' by Lord Mahon, 1842), which tells of an incident that allowed Condé to shut up his wife with the consent of the King. "La Bruyère," says M. Allaire, "speaks of this affair as one of those curious cases which he does not understand: 'Is it on account of the secret or from an hypochondriac taste, that one woman loves a servant, another woman a monk, and Dorinne her doctor?' La Bruyère adds: 'For a woman of the world, a gardener is a gardener, a mason is a mason; for some women who live in great retirement, a gardener is a man, a mason is a man. Everything is temptation for those who fear temptation.'" I ask here, By what right does M. Allaire apply this passage to the case of the Princess of Condé? It is enough for him that such an application could be made, but was it really made by the author of the 'Characters'?

The Princess became incurable; she was kept in a park at Châteauroux in Berri, where she was treated with care, and was surrounded with devoted servants. Her son, Henri Jules de Bourbon, called M. le Duc, was never shut up, but he was very eccentric, very irrational; for a moment he excited great hopes in his father, but he was a failure. He never could learn the first elements of the art of war; he had no equilibrium, no balance; he was light, irrational, full of caprices; he was incoherent, dissipated. As long as Condé lived, he was kept within bounds; after his father's death M. le Duc became uncontrollable, and he had frequently terrible fits of anger, which, says Saint-Simon, resembled at the same time epilepsy and apoplexy. He died in one of these fits, at the age of forty-two, in full carnival, making horrible grimaces.

Condé had always had great fears of his son, seeing in him the temper of his mother, and it was for this reason that he took such great care of the education of his grandson, the Duc de Bourbon, and placed near him such men as La Bruyère. It was also to please his son, and to keep him contented, that he consented to the marriage of the Duc de Bourbon with Mlle. de Nantes, the daughter légitimée of Louis XIV. and of Mme. de Montespan, though he saw the vice of such an alliance; he hoped, also, to bring fresh blood into his family, and to counteract the influence of the blood of the Brézés. He showed great affection for the young Duchess, who was amiable, sensible, who led a regular life, and who protected her husband against the evil influences of the little court of the Dauphin.

After the death of Condé, La Bruyère remained attached to the Duke and Duchess of Bourbon, with the functions of gentleman in waiting. The leisure of his new life gave him time to finish his 'Characters.' He read his work to a few friends, and among them to Boileau, and, after some hesitation, took it to the printer. The book had immediately a great success, especially in the ranks of the high clergy. The pious Catholics understood at once the scheme of the work, which only shows what is false and ridiculous in the world in order to bring the mind of man into the higher atmosphere of truth. Bussy-Rabutin, who was a pure mondain, wrote, however, a charming letter on the book, praised it, and expressed a great desire to make the acquaintance of the author. M. le Prince (since the death of Condé M. le Duc had assumed this name) did not much admire the 'Caractères,' and simply approved of them. The success of the first three editions added a little lustre to the House of Condé. La Bruyère was one of his gentlemen; he was proud but unselfish, unambitious; perhaps the Prince could make some use of his talents and of his good will.

The success of his 'Caractères' was a great encouragement to La Bruyère; and it may be said that the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh editions form altogether a new work, and the most important. In these editions La Bruyère touched boldly some of the most important questions, he passed in review all classes of society, he spoke of the people, he deplored war, he showed the advantages of good government, he prophesied revolution, he described the follies of the court and of the world, he entered into the highest philosophical problems, he gave the history of his own soul, his illusions in regard to life, love, glory. His work had come to its present state of perfection (the word perfection is not too strong) when he died on the 11th of May, 1696, at Versailles, at the moment when he was preparing a ninth edition, which had no additions, but only a few corrections.

Correspondence.

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: To any one who has had experience, as a scribe of a local conference, in gathering the religious statistics from the individual churches, your recent article on "Religious Statistics" is calculated to provoke a smile. You object to the simple denials of your assertions by the Independent, and call for specific proofs, though it is hard to see why the denials of a paper familiar with religious matters are not all that is called for in reply to the assertions of a paper not familiar with them, till those assertions are supported by some specific proof. In my own denomination (Congregational), and I suppose in others, it is customary to apportion the amount to be raised for benevolences and the expenses of our denominational machinery among the churches in proportion to their membership; and the pressure which is felt by the churches is toward reporting the membership as small as possible. But this is a point on which minute investigation is necessary to reach any results which can be put into figures. When, however, you say, "The lists of membership given in denominational year-books are notoriously inflated, as are also the returns of church benevolences," you in the latter clause get into the range of figures ready to hand; and a slight examination of the last (or any other) Congregational Year-Book will show how wide of the truth your statement is, at least so far as the Congregational churches are concerned.

Thus, according to our last Year-Book (cf. p. 210 with pp. 43-53), the amount which the churches report as given the preceding year to foreign missions is $302,395.19, while our Board of Foreign Missions actually received in donations from the living $428,769.98. The donations to the American Missionary Association were $191,698 35, of which only $114,283.36 got into the church reports. The cash receipts of our Home Missionary Society and New West Education Commission were $500,237.81 besides over $50,000 in supplies; but the church reports include only $279,433.40. In this last case, but not in the others, legacies are included in the receipts; but legacies, as well as supplies not in cash, are often included in church reports, and may correctly be so included.

These figures certainly do not show that "the returns of church benevolences are inflated," and would seem sufficient till you have something besides assertions to offer on the other side. As sometimes the total is reported without specifying the separate causes, the column of "Total Benevolences" is more nearly complete; though this column (which includes all gifts to local and undenominational causes) is far below the facts.

Respectfully yours, E. W. Miller.

Big Rapids, Mich., December 25, 1886.

[The trouble with Mr. Miller seems to be the same as is the case with the Independent, not seeing that ignorance, however extensive, must always be of less value than knowledge even if limited. What he has to urge against the main contention of our article, he admits to be of little consequence. We do not know why the conference to which he refers did not follow the usual practice of going on the basis of the last reported membership of the churches. But the Congregationalists are especially weak in the matter of statistics, as we shall see. At any rate, we presume that Mr. Miller would assign no more weight to his exceptional experience, probably among missionary churches, than to the remarkable argument of the Independent—the only one it has thus far made use of—to the effect that there can be no inflation of the statistics of church membership, because the one denomination that investigated its rolls found that its figures had been decidedly inflated.

Our correspondent contents himself with combating an incidental and entirely subordinate remark of ours—a single clause, in fact, of the whole article. Now we make no boast of being "familiar with religious matters," but it would be a very slight familiarity which could not show that Mr. Miller's figures are misleading and worthless. Why did he not read, or, if he read, why did he not believe, the statements of the editors of the Congregational Year-Book appended to their summaries of church benevolences? They say (p. 211, Notes 3 and 4): "The amounts reported above for the specific objects of benevolence are such as are reported by the State organizations and are below facts. They are inserted as indicating proportions, but are not worth adding up. It will be seen that the reports are very imperfect. Many churches make no report." Mr. Miller seems to have thought that such confessedly untrustworthy figures were not only "worth adding up" (they are not added up in the Year-Book, it should be understood), but also worth basing a serious argument upon. We see but one possible excuse for him. If he meant to argue that the benevolent returns of Congregational churches are not inflated because there are no returns at all deserving the name, that his denomination is so loosely organized that it cannot secure the facts from the local churches, we are willing to admit that he has made his point, though he has most ingeniously concealed it; but we wonder that he went at it in such a roundabout way. In any other aspect of the case, we see nothing for it but to accuse him of presenting figures that are either ridiculous or intended to deceive. Furthermore, the Year Book itself makes it clear that gifts of $387,000, not $302,000, as he says, were credited to the churches, since p. 43 states that the former sum has been "acknowledged in the Missionary Herald."

Now, if Mr. Miller is really willing to rest the case upon an argument of the kind he advances as "sufficient," we commend to his attention the corresponding statistics of the Presbyterian Church, whose polity admits of a very near approach to accuracy in such matters. In the minutes of the General Assembly of this year, gifts by the churches to home missions are returned aggregating $760,947. But the financial report of the Home Mission Board shows that of this amount no more than $498,662 reached its treasury. We understand perfectly that a part of this discrepancy of $262,285 is to be accounted for on the score of "supplies" sent directly to needy ministers, but, to account for it all in this way, the gifts would have to be at the rate of $191 to each of the men commissioned by the Board, or rather at the rate of $400, inasmuch as not half of them are favored with "boxes"; and we leave it to Mr. Miller if any of the home missionaries of his acquaintance would not surrender his "supplies" for two or three years in lieu of such a sum in cash. The facts are similar in the case of Presbyterian foreign missions. The minutes report contributions of $651,160, while the Foreign Mission Board acknowledges but $538,638. In this case "supplies" cannot be invoked to any appreciable extent, to account for the deficiency of $112,522. Part of it, no doubt, goes to such non-Presbyterian missions as the McAll in France, or the Van Meter in Rome, which survives to prey upon the churches, even after its frequent exposures; a fraction, we suppose, finds its way to the pockets of irresponsible Armenians and Hindus who are for years "on the point of returning to preach the Gospel to their countrymen," and meanwhile pick up a comfortable living among American Christians; as to the rest, we confess we are as curious as the missionary secretaries to know what becomes of it.

These are some of the facts we had in mind at the time of penning the clause so much objected to. Another one like them is the practice of some city pastors who, when the time comes to make the yearly returns, gather together the reports of public charities—hospitals, asylums, orphanages, etc.—and put down, under the head of "miscellaneous benevolences" of their churches, all gifts which they find credited to any member of their churches or congregations. We suppose we ought to add, to prevent, if possible, the charge that we accuse ministers and churches of intentional dishonesty, a denial of intending any such thing. We simply maintain our former position, that the statistics of church benevolence, like those of church membership, need to be sifted before they can be used with such positiveness as that with which they are often cited. That is, Christian apologists who are working the statistical argument so hard nowadays, ought to be a little less dogmatic in proving that Christian faith is not waning from the fact that it "lays upon the altar" such and such sums in "hard cash." This would be true, even if the discrepancies pointed out above were to be fully explained.—Ed. Nation.]

HISTORY AND THE GROUP SYSTEM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The statement from Prof. Palmer's article which you quote in your issue of December 23, has left upon some minds a false impression with respect to the limitation of our undergraduate courses in English and American history to law students and students of modern languages. As a matter of fact, there is no obstacle in the group-system to any student electing three hours a week of French and English history for one year, and the same amount of English and American constitutional history. While absolving the requirements of a particular group of studies, say the classical, students are not only allowed, but are sometimes encouraged, to elect historical courses in addition. To say, therefore, that "One does not feel quite easy in allowing nobody but a lawyer or a devotee of modern languages to read a page of English or American history" is expressing a discontent which is hardly warranted by the elasticity of the group-system.

I may perhaps be allowed to add that all undergraduate applicants for admission to the university are first examined orally in American history; if successful, they are then admitted to the written examination for matriculation, which, in history, requires a text-book knowledge of either (1) England and the United States, or (2) Greece and Rome, as the candidate may elect. The history of England and of the United States is usually offered for matriculation, even by classical students. Every undergraduate is further required to elect a class course in either ancient history or general European history. Classical and historical students elect the former; scientific students, the latter. Upon such historical foundations, which, with other English studies, underlie the entire group-system, our own special group of historical and political studies is founded. Each of these two main subjects occupies two years, with five hours each week. Upon this general and special undergraduate work is based the graduate curriculum of three years in history and political science. Graduates from other colleges frequently elect undergraduate courses in our group, but our own undergraduates are not allowed to elect graduate work.

Very respectfully, Herbert B. Adams.
Johns Hopkins University, December 28, 1886.

DOMESTIC SERVICE FROM A WESTERN POINT OF VIEW.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In response to the question asked in the Nation of the 23d inst., "Why do not intelligent and refined women more frequently choose house service as a support?" it might be answered, For the same reason that intelligent and refined men do not pursue the humbler callings in life. Capable and refined women can do better for themselves; more limitedly than men, it is true, but better every year and with more hope. A few years ago some six or seven employments only were open to women. There are now in the neighborhood of 100. In our own city one factory alone employed during the last season some 200 women, between the ages of fourteen and sixty. These earned from fifty cents to one dollar and a half per day, and in the evening passed out to their homes their own mistresses until the next morning. All these changing and widening influences must bring confusion to housekeepers, if for no other reason than that the demand exceeds the supply.

More than forty years ago, De Tocqueville noticed, in connection with our democratic institutions, the social inquietude and helplessness arising out of the domestic-service problem. He decided that in our country, where nothing is hereditary, not even money, it is impossible for a working class to exist. One whom you employ to-day may be your equal to-morrow. The men and women who for the time being work for you "rebel in their hearts against a subordination to which they have subjected themselves and from which they derive actual profit. In every household, secret and intestine warfare is going on between powers ever rivals and suspicious of one another." The forty years between then and now have but increased the difficulty. The colored people, in this section at least, and the native whites have almost entirely abandoned any kind of work which keeps them from home at night, and the whole business is given over to foreigners who, catching the spirit of unrest which governs all classes in the United States, yield but a temporary and a capricious service.

With regard to the conditions named, it would be well to ask if in factories, schools, and businesses generally the employees frame the rules. If not advisable in business, it is less so in domestic life, where each household is necessarily a law unto itself, and where the object is not to have some one whom you may kindly instruct or carefully advise, but to secure a faithful and a capable girl. Were school committees to provide for the welfare of the teachers rather than the pupils, hoping in this way to obtain more favorable and judicious teaching, it would be deemed the most farcical of means to secure the desired end. The rigor of the school law is such that teachers dare not do other than their duty. In Cincinnati, for instance, a few minutes' tardiness on the part of a teacher is mulcted as a quarter of a day's absence; but who ever heard of a deduction from wages appearing as a factor in the economy of a household for tardy meals, or absences, or comings home late?

Were social life better organized, it would be more powerful. Many rough issues which men prevent by combination, women are subjected to by isolation. In their case there is no majesty of the law to offend, but in every instance it is the personal, intimate relation of "you and me." If then, as a class, women were more dignified, if cases of disobedience were met with prompt dismissal, girls would discover their zeal and their interests united, and learn to prize the sense of honor more than they do now. Every lady would gladly give to a girl that sympathy and assistance which she extends to a friend, could she, in return, receive the same sympathy and assistance. The unfortunate point is, that in the transitional state in which we live, the girl uses her position for her own ends, and counts it no disgrace to be whirled from place to place, while the oftentimes dishonorable expedients to which ladies resort to secure help would cause a philanthropist interested in feminine advancement to shudder.

Life has many cares, but one of its heaviest to an educated woman is the necessarily constant intercourse with the "stranger within her gates," a relationship demanding continual forbearance, and returning, at its best, but a melancholy satisfaction. One may be "baptized into the sense of all conditions," but no state will prove security against a family of little children or their necessary wants. The training of little children and the active supervision of everything within her borders constitute at times, it would seem, a complex and an unequal share of life's duties for a woman. But with kind and efficient servants, she could retain in a measure her accomplishments, and find, through all discouragements, "some sparkles of a better hope which elder days would happily bring forth." But it is to be feared that until this new-world society outgrows its primitive conditions, and makes for itself a condition of things stable and conservative, or protects itself by coöperative schemes successfully carried out, it will remain in its present chaotic state, and burden the world with its jeremiads upon domestic service. E. B.

KEOKUK, IA., December 28, 1886.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The communication in your last issue relating to "Domestic Service" and signed "A. S.," gives one a fair idea of the circumstances under which the "refined, intelligent girl" would engage to do housework for a woman. To express it more plainly, this superior young person would consent to perform the duties which in modest households are assigned by the mistress to her daughters, and in consideration for this noble act of self-abnegation she demands—the use of a suite of rooms, board, and money in amount from two to four dollars per week.

Now it seems to me the great demand is, not for "intelligent, refined girls," who are barely willing under impossible conditions to enter domestic service, but for strong, honest girls, who are not ashamed to wash, iron, scrub, or cook. I repeat, the general demand is for servants; and as servants "imported" young women are superior to the Americans, and will continue to be preferred until our own countrywomen are in condition to replace them; and this will not be until the present supply of American workingwomen is furnished with an amount of common sense exceeding its degree of "refinement." Good "help" we must have, and if we cannot find it at home we must get a larger supply from abroad. These despised foreigners seem to appreciate their opportunity, and so, to express it vulgarly, will their "sisters and their cousins and their aunts."

Despite all this talk of abuse received by workingwomen at the hands of the mistress, it in fact amounts to little more than the complaints of some vain, silly domestics, who have perhaps been frustrated in a desire to "lord it" over an employer possibly ignorant in household affairs; chagrined because unnoticed by father or son; angered because the impropriety of entertaining many "followers" has been suggested. Each woman of this class is anxious to appear to the world as a "lady," and, because of her ignorant attraction for the word, seeks at all costs to assume the finery of a woman of wealth, and, in time, forgets even that originally her aim was to win for herself respect and esteem.

My circle of acquaintances is large, and I know not one woman who does not gladly allow her servants at least the following privileges: the use of a comfortable bed and decent room; appointed hours for meals; for entertaining friends, the use of a warm, well lighted kitchen, that can be made as attractive as desired; one afternoon and evening of each week for leaving home; any time as their own at home when the work has been properly done; the part of Sunday that can be conveniently given up to them; money, in acknowledgment for services, from two to five dollars per week.

The women who wish to monopolize all the light work, and leave all the hard work for some one else to perform, are not deserving of sympathy. E. H.

MICHIGAN, December 29, 1886.

BISHOP COXE'S HALF-KNOWLEDGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As your correspondent, "E. M. D.," has recalled attention to Bishop Coxe's singular manifesto in the October Forum, it seems worth while to point out more directly some of the errors of his article, illustrating the well-worn fact that eminence in one department of knowledge does not necessarily constitute authority in another. The "illogical and vulgar" use of the adverb between to and the infinitive, which he finds in Mr. Gladstone's speech, he has also noted in two or three other writers, even twice in Temple Bar, and, suggesting that Dickens may have introduced this locution into England from American "tap-rooms," asks: "Is there a reputable authority for this treatment of the verb before the days of Dickens?"

Now Dickens has been made to answer for many sins of his pen, but he should not be charged with this attempt to "debase his mother tongue." This treatment of the verb is as old as Wyclif, and is found in the works of such writers as Bishop Doane, Sir Thomas Browne, Dr. Johnson, Burke, Southey, Coleridge, Lamb, and De Quincey. These certainly are "reputable authorities," and (since the days of Dickens) Ruskin, Spencer, Browning, Matthew Arnold, and Leslie Stephen have thought the form reputable enough for their writings.

Bishop Coxe expresses great surprise at finding that "such a scholar as Liddon does not disdain to use" that "abominable barbarism" reliable. Has he never found it in the works of Cardinal Newman, Dean Mansel, J. S. Mill, Leslie Stephen, and Mr. Gladstone, who use it without scruple? Certainly he cannot have read Dr. Hall's volume, 'On -Able and Reliable,' which thoroughly vindicates the reputation of this word. He is also very severe upon the use of such "vulgarisms" as talented, lengthy, being built, etc., as evidence of the "rapid defilement and deterioration" of the language. It may shock him to know that the grammars in most extended use in the schools to-day have added a Progressive Passive Form to the regular conjugation to accommodate just such "improper" phrases as is being built.

But it is especially surprising that the Bishop, while appealing to his readers "to stand up for the purity of our noble language," should be very careless with his own purity. He cannot endure the established coinage talented, but gives us "Anglilxquent," coined "on my own theory." He abominates reliable, but uses "rationale" where he means simply reason. He says that Canning "confessed," on a certain memorable occasion, when, as a matter of fact, he only acknowledged. He objects to the "vulgar use" of the word influential, but, on the same page, uses the very illogical provincialism "in this connection"—a New England phrase which, says Bartlett, "has become quite shocking to nervous people." Many other infelicities might be noticed, since (to borrow the writer's own language) "I have thrown out these examples from a somewhat extensive collection of specimens." Enough has been said to show that the verbal habits of Bishop Coxe, though perhaps not as "vulgar" as Mr. Gladstone's, are certainly as "illogical," so far as illustrated in this article. However effective the intuitive method of propounding truth may be in the realm of morals and theology, it ought not to be rashly applied to the facts of linguistic usage. And as to matters of opinion and taste, one is inclined to believe that Bishop Coxe would have been less peremptory in his charges of vulgarity, had he fully perceived the wisdom of his own remark: "No individual has any right to engraft his personal peculiarities upon the common tongue."—Respectfully yours,

J. W. A.

BROOKLYN, December 29, 1886.

TOLSTOI'S "AUTOBIOGRAPHY."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of your remarks on page 545 of this week's Nation on Tolstoi, permit me to say that the French titles 'Mémoires' and 'Souvenirs' were publishers' inventions, for purposes best known to themselves. I have before me the fifth edition of the complete works of Tolstoi, in Russian (excepting, of course, 'My Religion,' which circulates in Russia only secretly), printed in Moscow in twelve volumes, dated 1886. The whole of the first volume is taken up with three distinct works, apparently independent of one another. They are entitled as follows: (1) Childhood. A Story. Written in 1852. (2) Boyhood. A Story. Written in 1854. (3) Youth. A Story. Written in 1855-57. The Russian word is povyest, which is properly a narrative, as distinguished from razskaz, which might be translated A Tale; if, indeed, there really is any difference between the two. Whoever sees in these titles anything more than what they indicate—such as an autobiography of Tolstoi, for which this work erroneously passes—has indeed a valuable faculty, but it is scarcely one compatible with a clear perception of facts as they are. Many, perhaps very many, scenes have undoubtedly a basis in Tolstoi's own life; but this is far from making the work an autobiography. Would it be right to omit the title from 'David Copperfield,' and, without further qualification or explanation, print it as an autobiography of Dickens? Of late, especially, whenever Tolstoi has had anything to say about himself, he has not been in the habit of concealing himself behind fictitious names and titles of "stories." It must, further, be remembered that as an artist Tolstoi is the exact counterpart of Turgeneff; if the latter's art was eminently objective, the former's is eminently subjective. Hence Turgeneff's first great work was a series of sketches of things and men without him—the 'Memoirs of a Sportsman'; Tolstoi's first great work was a series of sketches of things principally within him—for the three stories form together a continued subjective analysis of the growth of a human soul on Russian soil.

As you see from the above, the proper dates for these sketches are not 1851, but 1852-57; nor can these years be called "the years immediately following the Crimean war." If my memory serves me well, the Crimean war began in 1853 and ended early in 1856. The work, moreover, bears no traces of being "abruptly dropped." The work ends with the first half of the hero's youth; the narrator was seized with a sudden moral impulse, and says, "How long that impulse lasted, what was its nature, and how much it contributed to my further moral development, I shall relate in the following happier half of my youth." This promise of more may have been made bona fide, or may have been designed as part of the "plot." Be that as it may, on the face of it this is by no means an "abrupt" ending.

These points may seem trivial. But when one constantly hears of details of Tolstoi's life which on closer inspection prove fictitious, it is interesting to trace them back to loose statements of faithful but untrained students of their favorite author.—Respectfully, IVAN PANIN.

WELLESLEY, MASS., December 30, 1886.

THE INTER-STATE COMMERCE BILL.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your number for December 23 it seems to us that Mr. Ashley made several errors in his letter on the Inter-State Commerce Bill.

He tells us "that if the short-haul principle is adhered to, not a grain of Dakota wheat will reach the mechanics of New York." Now, on the contrary, granting that it cannot be carried quite as cheaply, perhaps, under this bill, we claim (and the facts and figures will bear us out in the statement) that, in case of the passage of the bill, Dakota wheat would reach Duluth by paying much less freight than it now does, and from there it would be carried to the "mechanics of New York" for less money than now. The wheat receipts at Duluth are almost as large as those at Chicago, and, for the week ending November 13, were 543,000 bushels, as opposed to 634,000 at Chicago. The passage of this bill would make Duluth the great depot for Dakota wheat, and right then would commence the only real competition—that between carrying by water and by railroads.

We cannot show more clearly the futility and uselessness of pooling and competition in the matter of reducing railroad rates than by quoting a part of an open letter from the "Mankato Jobbers' Union" to the Railroad Commissioners of this State:

"We claim that no point in southern Minnesota is by nature or geography tributary to any city north of a direct line to the foot of Lake Michigan except possibly it be to a point at the head of Lake Superior, and that any adjustment of traffic rates which would force us to pay such tribute is contrary to public interest, is based on unsound business principles, and is illegal and unjust discrimination; and furthermore we allege that the C., St. P., M. and O., the C. and N. W., and the C., M. and St. P. Railroad Companies and other roads are to-day, and have been in all their past, so adjusting their tariffs from lake points as to enforce this unjust discrimination.

"We allege that the C., M. and St. P. R. R. crossing the Mississippi at La Crescent carries its Chicago freight, of all classes, north to Minneapolis, 139 miles, for a lower rate than it will the same freight to Mound Prairie, 16 miles west, or to any point on its lines west of this last-named place. We allege that the C. and N. W. R. R. carries freight from the same point to Minneapolis, 420 miles, at a lower rate than it will carry the same freight to Utica, 319 miles, or to any other point on its western line."

Respectfully, J. A. Nowell.

Mankato, Minn., December 27, 1886.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM IN MICHIGAN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Friends of civil-service reform are scarce in these parts, and somewhat timid in making known their existence; but there is a time when patience ceases to be a virtue, and silence causes suspicion of imbecility. At present there seems to be a proper occasion to break that silence and give vent to one's dissatisfaction.

The subject of this complaint is the course of the Administration in regard to the Federal offices in this district, which has been such as to give the lie to its promises of reform and to the claims of its stanch friends, the Mugwumps. The latter looked upon President Cleveland's election as a triumph of sound political principles over the old spoils doctrine; they hoped to benefit their cause thereby, to be able to point to the practical application of their teachings, and thus to make converts. In this they have been most grievously disappointed, as will appear from a short statement of facts.

The district in which Detroit is situated has four principal Federal offices, viz.: the Pension Office, Post-office, Internal-Revenue Office, and the Custom-house—all of which were formerly held by Republicans. The latter have all been removed from office, and Democrats have been appointed in their places; and the reason for and manner of doing it have, in three cases out of the four, been in accordance with the old approved principles of the spoils system. The former Postmaster was an exemplary officer, as acknowledged by everybody, irrespective of party, excepting the Republican campaign managers, who were mad at him because he refused to employ the influence of his office in their interests. But off came his head, and an old Democratic warhorse, who knew nothing about the business of the office, received his place. The Mugwumps felt hurt, but did not complain.

The Collector of Internal Revenue was the type of an old-time politician, who used his office for two purposes only, one to draw a fat salary with great diligence, and the other to fight the battles of the grand old party. His attacks on Cleveland during the Presidential campaign were worthy of a denizen of Five Points, and he was most deservedly kicked out of his office. But the man who received his place was one of the most active wire-pullers in the Democratic ranks, and notorious for having used his position as Clerk of the Superior Court of this city for the purpose of transforming fresh immigrants into full-fledged Democratic citizens, to the detriment of the other business of the office; and his appointment could only be considered as a reward for most offensive partisanship. This, again, was a sad illustration of the application of reform.

There remained the Collector of Customs. He, too, had been an active and offensive partisan during the campaign of '84, and his removal from office on that score would have been justifiable. As special protégé of the Senator from this city he was not molested until recently, when his office was given to a Mr. Campau, a young man of large fortune and social prominence, one of those who might have been expected to entertain higher views of politics than the pot-house orators. The friends of reform were inclined to consider his appointment a good one, and offset it against the former bad ones; but alas! they were doomed to be disappointed again, as will appear from the following, taken from the Detroit Free Press, the Democratic and Administration organ of this city:

COLLECTOR CAMPAU'S PLANS.

He Will Fill the Sixty Positions Under Him with Competent Democratic Officials.

D. J. Campau last night received notification from Washington of the confirmation by the Senate of his appointment as Collector of the Port of Detroit. Mr. Campau said to a representative of the Free Press, who called upon him to learn what steps he would take towards the reconstruction of the force of deputies under him, that he felt exceedingly gratified that the confirmation was made so soon after the opening of the session, and wholly without effort on his part. Further, Mr. Campau said that as a Democrat he should consider it a duty, both to his party and the office, to supply every position under him with a good Democratic official, and that it would only be a question of time when such changes would be made. He now has on file just 600 applications, mostly from Detroit, each of which are from Democrats qualified to fill the positions sought for. The Collector has sixty appointments in his gift, and says that as he is responsible for the work done in the various departments, he would much rather have men of his own political complexion to deal with. The entire matter of selecting men as to their respective qualifications is left to him, the name of each being sent to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington for approval. There is no reason to fear that Mr. Campau's administration will not be satisfactory to all Democrats.

One could possibly overlook one or even two mistakes in disposing of four important offices, but such a complete disregard of principles and promises in three cases out of four makes it imperative to call attention to them, in order to avert from Independents the suspicion of dense obtuseness or of blind and slavish admiration of their successful candidate. Undoubtedly the President has been misled by his advisers from this State, and we still are justified in attributing his errors to no bad intention. Mugwumps still believe in his honesty of purpose, but they may well begin to doubt his ability to carry out his intentions.—Yours respectfully, Wm. E. H.

Detroit, Mich., December 27, 1886.

SECRET SYMPATHY WITH CRIME.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have a psychological question to propose. What is the exact state of mind, under analysis, of the small newspaper writer who always speaks of crime jocosely? Everybody must have observed it as one of the many ways in which the vulgar newspaper tends to vulgarize the public. For example, why "boodle" Aldermen? Certainly nothing is gained by slang terms for criminal offences; and it is noticeable that well-bred people are not in the habit of using them. The humorous or jocular view of any occurrence commonly implies a kind of careless, good-natured sympathy with the actor. What does this habit of jocose and slangy reference to criminals indicate in the third-rate newspaper writer, if not a secret and constitutional sympathy with crime? E. R. S.

THE EFFECT OF OIL ON STORMY WATERS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: An account of Prof. Thurston's discussion of this subject in the Nation, November 25, 1886, page 437, ends, after mentioning Prof. Thurston's hope that the sea may thus lose many of its terrors, with the curious statement that "it would do much to undermine one of the chief arguments against thought-transference, namely, that it is impossible that it should be true, for it is impossible that if it were true it should not have been discovered before."

A belief in such an action is, however, of ancient date, and towards the end of last century special attention was attracted to the subject. There is a long memoir in the Transactions of the Brussels Academy (about 1780), in which the subject is treated both historically and experimentally. The author traces the history back through the Dutch and Norwegian whalers, if I remember rightly—I have not the volume at hand—to Pliny.

Among others, B. Franklin wrote "of the stilling of waves by means of oil" (Phil. Trans. Abr. xiii. p. 568, 1774). Thomas Windsor.

Manchester, England.

Notes.

The Century Co.'s war book, to be called 'Battles and Leaders of the Civil War,' will be published early in the spring, by subscription. In addition to all the war papers by Gens. Grant, McClellan, Pope, Buell, Beauregard, Longstreet, and other prominent leaders on both sides which have appeared in the Century, the book will contain many papers heretofore unprinted, and will form a continuous illustrated history of the civil war, written by the chief participants. The Century Co. will endeavor to make it one of the handsomest subscription books ever published.

Ginn & Co., Boston, have decided not to import the sheets of Minto's 'Manual of English Prose Literature,' but to manufacture it themselves and to publish it at a reduced price.

Cupples, Upham & Co. will publish at once 'The Creed of Andover Theological Seminary,' by Rev. D. T. Fiske, D.D.—a pamphlet which has been more than once printed.

Miss Kate Hillard, who has for some years been making a special study of Dante, and who is now residing in Rome, has in preparation a translation of the 'Convito.' The edition will include translations of the notes and comments of the best Italian editors, and of the dedicatory epistle to Can Grande, and also all the references found in the 'Convito' to the other writings of the author. Full consideration will also be given by the translator to the different theories concerning Beatrice. The work is expected to be in readiness in about a year's time.

The articles of Mr. David A. Wells on Mexico, noticed by us at the time of their appearance in the Popular Science Monthly, have been collected and published under the title, 'A Study of Mexico' (D. Appleton & Co.). The revision and expansion given to the original papers have increased their value, and they now present, we believe, the best information accessible in any single English book regarding the economic situation of Mexico. One of Mr. Wells's additions is misleading, however, where he speaks (p. 110) of the "only 12,361 votes" cast at the Presidential election of 1872. Aware, as it is evident that he is, of the system of indirect voting, he should have made it clearer that these 12,000 votes might have represented the suffrages of 1,200,000 citizens. To what he says of the problem of the drainage of the valley of Mexico (p. 202), he might have added some account of the plans adopted and the work actually accomplished by the Mexican Government. These plans involve the digging of a canal some thirty miles long, leading from the city to Lake Zumpango, whence a tunnel 30,000 feet in length is to be forced through the mountains, emptying into the cañon of Tequisquiac, in which a cut has to be made for a distance of over 8,000 feet. This cut is now reported to be entirely finished, together with about 2,500 feet of the tunnel. After such an unaccustomed burst of activity, the Government is now resting, and proposes to let the remainder of the work by contract, with the probability that the Bucyrus Construction Company of Ohio will be the successful bidder.

It is interesting to note how a wrong date once given in books of reference tends to reappear in other books long after the right date has been settled. Mr. George C. S. Southworth illustrates this in his recently published 'Six Lectures Introductory to the Study of English Literature,' where he gives the date of George Eliot's birth as 1820. Had he referred to Mr. Cross's 'George Eliot's Life' he would have found the right date, 1819. In stating, as he does on page 174 of his book, that "The wife of Prof. George Lilie Craik (who wrote the excellent 'History of English Literature') was long known as Miss Mulock," Mr. Southworth makes an original erroneous statement, which we hope will not be copied by other writers on English literature. The husband of the author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman' is a nephew of the late Prof. Craik.

The project of erecting a statue to Gustave Flaubert has given rise to many comments. Few men were more averse to the reproduction of their person in any way than the author of 'Madame Bovary.' Now that he is dead, his portrait may be seen in the complete edition of his works, but he would not have allowed it to appear there. He courted seclusion, and feared nothing more than the indiscretions of the press in regard to his personality. Fortunately for him, he died before the full bloom of the interviewer. The petty curiosity of the public annoyed him. He wrote to George Sand in 1871, "Has not modern criticism abandoned art for history? The intrinsic value of a book is nothing with the Sainte-Beuve-Taine school. . . . Hence in the minor papers the abuse of personalities, biographies, diatribes. Result: disrespect on the part of the public." And, later, he is exasperated by the gossip in regard to his home, "his slippers, his dog." He certainly was the last man to choose for exposure in a public square. Luckily the intimes will spare him this ignominy. They have agreed on a commemorative monument forming an allegorical group in which a medallion or bust of Flaubert will find its place. The monument will be erected at Rouen.

We remark the appearance of a summary of the course of lectures given at the University of Brussels in 1884-85, by Count Goblet d'Alviella, under the title, 'Introduction à l'histoire des religions' (New York: Christern). In the appendix is urged the necessity of introducing the history of religions in public instruction.

Les Lettres et les Arts for December (Paris: Boussod, Valadon et Cie.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons) contains a long article, "Le Château de Chantilly," by M. Maurice Tourneux, to which the number owed the honor of being presented to the French Academy at its session of December 7. M. Tourneux relates with much grace the history of Chantilly and its dependencies, especially during the long period of its transformation from a feudal fortress into one of the marvels of the Renaissance in France by the Constable de Montmorency and his descendants, and later by the Grand Condé into "un séjour unique au monde," where all the magnificences of the siècle de Louis XIV. were lavished. The history of Chantilly under the later Condés and its restoration by the Duc d'Aumale, still in progress, are sufficiently indicated, as well as the artistic wealth which will fill it when, by his gift, it passes into the possession of the five Academies which form the Institut de France. The paper is illustrated with photogravures of the present château, and by reproductions of old maps and engravings of the former buildings and dependencies. The brilliant success of 'L'Incendie des Folies-Plastiques,' the amusing volume of stories recently published by M. Abraham Dreyfus, promised more than is made good by the little comedy which he gives in the present number of the Revue. M. Anatole France is most happy, however, in his story of "Marguerite," which deserves the place of honor given it at the beginning of the number. There is a charming head of a little girl among the illustrations, and another picture of a boy still younger building castles of dominoes, which is delightful; but the pictures M. Anatole France himself leaves in the memories of his readers are far more delicate and exquisite in execution than any that the artists have drawn to accompany his story.

Among recent foreign scientific publications are the 'Chemistry of the Sun,' by J. N. Lockyer, F. R. S., containing a full statement of the hypothesis put before the Royal Society by the author some years ago, that the so-called elementary bodies are in reality compound, in which Mr. Lockyer attempts to show that the spectroscopic phenomena of both the observatory and the laboratory are simply and sufficiently explained on the view that the chemical elements behave after the manner of compound bodies; an elementary 'Treatise on the Differential Calculus,' by the Rev. Joseph Edwards, both these works being published by Macmillan; and a 'Treatise on Optics,' by R. S. Heath, Professor of Mathematics in the Mason Science College, Birmingham, published by the Cambridge Press.

The infrequent award of medals of the Royal Society to American scientists lends no little interest to the following paragraph in the recent anniversary address of Prof. Stokes, the President of the Society: "The Rumford Medal has been awarded to Prof. Samuel P. Langley for his researches on the spectrum by means of the bolometer. A better knowledge of the ultra-red region of the spectrum, which includes the larger part of the energy of solar radiation, had long been a desideratum when Prof. Langley commenced his work upon this subject. Finding the thermopile insufficiently sensitive for his purpose, he contrived the bolometer. This instrument depends upon the effect of temperature upon the electrical resistance of metals, a quantity susceptible of very accurate measurement; and, with its aid, Prof. Langley has been able to explore a part of the spectrum previously almost inaccessible to observation. A result of Prof. Langley's work, very important from the point of view of optical theory and of the ultimate constitution of matter, relates to the law of dispersion, or the dependence of refrangibility on wave-length. Cauchy's formula, which corresponds well with observation over most of the visible spectrum, is found to break down entirely when applied to the extreme ultra red. Prof. Langley has given much attention to the important question of the influence of the atmosphere on solar radiation. The expedition to Mount Whitney, successfully conducted by him in face of many difficulties, has given results of the utmost value, pointing to conclusions of great interest and novelty."

We learn from the Academy that the Council of the Senate at Cambridge has recommended the adoption of the University of New Zealand as an affiliated institution. In many respects this is in the nature of a new departure, for hitherto the privileges of affiliation have been limited to colleges in England which cannot themselves confer degrees. Besides, it has always been stipulated previously that Cambridge should be represented in the governing body of the affiliated institution, with a view to exercising some control over the examinations—a stipulation waived in the present case. It is also announced that Oxford and Cambridge have in preparation a joint scheme for the affiliation of the Indian universities.

—The January Century is a remarkably able number. The first place in interest continues to be held by the Life of Lincoln, which advances rapidly into the period of early manhood, occupied by his law apprenticeship, Whig campaigning, and marriage. The well-known incident of his attachment to a young lady who died is told without new details, and the rejection of his suit in a second instance is cleared up and the peculiar account he once gave of it in a private letter explained. His half-hearted courtship of the one who was to become his wife, and the singular depression of his spirits during the year previous to his marriage, make the most interesting subject of the whole paper, but the treatment of it is vague. If the biographers have been perfectly frank, it is plain that they do not entirely understand this curious episode, which remains an enigma. Their reserve in respect to the character of Mrs. Lincoln and the circumstances of the union of the two amounts almost to total silence. Second in importance is Mr. Atkinson's tabular and statistical view of the growth of our country, substantially the address delivered by him at Buffalo last August before the American Association for the Advancement of Science. It is full of solid information made easily intelligible, and is studded with those novel condensations of a multiplicity of facts in sentences of epigrammatic point which are characteristic of his writings. It is impossible to condense further what he says, but his tendency is towards showing that the distribution of our increased wealth is more equitable, and the share of labor in the general product is gaining to a greater degree than is commonly believed. He reckons the improvement to be such that the workman, maintaining the same standard of living as in 1860, could now lay up one-third of his wages. The facts and conclusions of this article have a wide reach, and are apparently to be set over against the economic state of Europe, in a future number, as the balance of democracy vs. dynasties et al. Other articles of note are Henry James's on "Coquelin," a very full sketch of Bancroft's life, the continuation of the admirable criticism on French sculptors, and Prof. Langley's popular account of comets, meteors, and shooting stars. Cable and Stockton furnish fiction.

—The fourth number of the publications of the American Economic Association is a very good example of what such publications should be. It is entitled 'Coöperation in a Western City,' and is the work of Mr. Albert Shaw, one of the editors of the Minneapolis Tribune, a writer who has already devoted attention to topics of this class. He treats of a variety of subjects, several of which are not of sufficient importance to justify our notice; but the accounts of coöperation among the coopers of Minneapolis, of the building societies of St. Paul, and of profit-sharing in the Pittsburgh mills, are exceptionally interesting and suggestive. The enormous production of flour at Minneapolis occasions a corresponding demand for barrels, several millions a year being required. Coopering, therefore, is a considerable industry, employing between 700 and 800 men, more than half of whom belong to the coöperative shops. These establishments are of several years' standing, and have been very successful. It seems, therefore, that coöperation in productive enterprise is in America no longer a theory, or even an experiment, but an accomplished fact. A whole trade has been revolutionized. Hundreds of men who were mere journeymen, liable to be discharged at any moment, are now capitalists, owning their own homes, owning stock in profitable companies, and subject only to the vicissitudes to which all men engaged in business on their own account are liable. The details of this remarkable economic change are told in a clear and spirited manner by Mr. Shaw, and this essay will repay whatever attention those who are interested in coöperation can give it. "The indigenous character of this coöperative movement; its remarkable exemption from the aid, patronage, or praise of social reformers, political economists, hobby-riders, or persons of the literary habit; its entire freedom from the self-consciousness and premature thirst for fame that characterize almost every social experiment, however insignificant," are all features of especial attractiveness. The stories of the Rochdale Pioneers and of the Godin Familistère have been repeated until they are wearisome. The story that Mr. Shaw has to tell has never been told before; it presents novel conditions, and for Americans is peculiarly instructive.

—The building associations of Minneapolis have not had a long career, and have to show so far about a thousand homes secured to working people. This number will probably be increased by 250 this year, and the ratio of increase is likely to be still greater in the future. But in the city of St. Paul the work of these associations has been simply astonishing. There are forty of them, and their monthly receipts are estimated at $80,000. They have collected altogether more than $10,000,000, and the general testimony is that by far the greater part of this money would have been wasted but for the inducement to saving which they have offered. It is calculated that one-fourth of the families in the city are represented in these societies, and more than a thousand loans a year are made by them, chiefly for the construction of dwellings. From eight to ten thousand homes in St. Paul have, either in whole or in part, been thus secured to their owners. Of this work, also, Mr. Shaw says that it has hardly before been so much as mentioned in print; and yet there is no doubt that "the building society is above all things to be commended as a conservator of the home and family institutions that underlie all our national greatness and power." It must be borne in mind, however, with reference to all these enterprises, that the community in which they originated has been exceptionally prosperous. Business, population, and land-values have increased together, with a rapidity sufficient to make almost any investment profitable.

—On the 15th and 16th of December M. Léon Say had the rare good fortune to distinguish himself within twenty-four hours in two very different fields, in the Senate and in the French Academy. His speech in the Senate, pressing the new Goblet Ministry to define its position, gratified the conservative Republicans whose opinions are expressed by the Journal des Débats, to which M. Say is a frequent contributor. The next day he read his Discours de réception, which, though aiming to be purely literary, was not calculated to conciliate his political enemies. He had to speak of two predecessors, a thing which occurs rarely. Edmond About, who had been elected to fill the place of Jules Sandeau, died before his official reception could take place, leaving to the new recipiendary the task of praising two Academicians. M. Say spoke of them both, simply and with no exaggeration of eulogium, with all the reticence of academic panegyric. After just one sentence about the "liaisons heureuses mais agitées" of the youth of Sandeau, he passed on to his first independent work, 'Madame de Sommerville,' not even mentioning his collaboration with George Sand in 'Rose et Blanche,' signed Jules Sand, although that was really the starting point of his literary career. As to About, his successor praised his esprit, of course, and he showed his own by the skill with which he managed to present this multifarious petit Voltaire, novelist, archæologist, critic, dramatist, pamphleteer, chronicler, and, in his own opinion, agronomist, even political economist. He was very courteous to him in this last capacity. M. Rousse answered M. Say in the name of the Academy. At the conclusion of his speech he alluded to the unoccupied seat (without mentioning the name) of the Duc d'Aumale, who, "upon leaving us, nous a fait de si magnifiques adieux." The next reception but one (of Leconte de Lisle, namely, who succeeds Victor Hugo) will be that of M. Hervé, who, as Paris gossip says, was elected mainly through the influence of the exiled Academician. But the mildly Republican element in the Academy will surely express itself when their latest choice, M. Gréard, takes his seat.

—M. Émile Deschanel resumed on Wednesday, December 10, his brilliant course in French literature at the Collège de France. He began by a general summary of the lectures of the last five years, which were intended merely as an introduction to the Modern Literature of France, upon which he now enters. Five volumes have appeared, giving the substance of his lectures, and a sixth is announced. These are published under the general title, "Le Romantisme des classiques." The first four have been fully noticed in the Nation. The fifth is 'Le Théâtre de Voltaire' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof). Like its predecessors it is pleasant, rather chatty, never very deep, and will serve to recall to mind a series of plays now seldom read in spite of the occasional revivals they have at the Comédie-Française. Voltaire's tragedies (his comedies are not worth mentioning) have all the artificialty of the French classic drama, and they unfortunately make the reader think of a much greater writer. Orosmane and Zaïre shine with a pale reflected light by the side of Othello and Desdemona. The subject of M. Deschanel's lectures last winter was "Les Origines du Romantisme et du Réalisme," Jean Jacques Rousseau, Diderot, etc. This year he announces as his subject the history of the "École romantique," to be followed by that of the "École réaliste." The first authors he will study are Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, Mme. de Staël, Chateaubriand, and Senancour.

—To the student of classical history no subject ought to be more interesting than the survivals of old beliefs and old legends under more recent forms. And yet the investigation is not without its difficulties and its perils. As the horizon of folk-lore expands, we find so many startling coincidences in myth and legend and saga that we hesitate to pronounce on a pedigree which once seemed clear, and express ourselves with as much reserve as Telemachus did, when questioned as to the source of his being. Still, we cannot refuse to recognize the fact that the heathen nations that poured into the Church brought with them a stock of old beliefs, usages, ceremonies, which were incorporated into the new structure, lived with its life, and grew with its growth. Sometimes the new-comers seem to have influenced dogma, sometimes the "god in exile" seems to have cast his shadow, sometimes his mantle, on his successors; but doctrinal matters cannot be treated without apparent irreverence, and if we are to study the plastic adaptation of the figures of the Greek Pantheon, it is better to seek our examples among the legends of the saints than in the history of dogma. Indeed, we find that dogma had, at a comparatively early date, become so rigid as to allow little moulding from without, and the progress of doctrine is not a matter that concerns the classical student much. In other directions, however, a certain liberal policy was followed. Whatever could safely be tolerated was tolerated. There was no rude breaking with old traditions. The gods were banished, it is true, but wherever classical myths could be made to symbolize Christian life they were quietly kept up.

—The fair sinner with her penitential tears has been a favorite theme of the painters for centuries, and "maudlin," in our English vocabulary, is derived from the old pictures of the sorrowing Magdalen. The early Church had made the figure of the penitent conspicuous among her saints: no more absolute warrant for the forgiveness of sins than the woman that was a sinner in the house of Simon, that woman whom the Roman tradition identified with Mary Magdalene—than the woman who is still lingering in the outskirts of the Gospel according to St. John. No wonder that the sympathy felt with these Biblical characters expressed itself in the coinage of new types, and some years since Prof. Usener, in a charming monograph on the Legend of St. Pelagia, pursued that "archidiablesse" Venus, as Heine calls her, through all the Protean forms that she assumes in the chronicles of the saints. According to him, Pelagia and Marina, the Lady of the Sea, Margarito, the Lady of the Pearl, Porphyria, the Lady of the Purple, Anthusa, the Lady of Flowers, Euphrosyna, and Matrona are all reflexes of the one goddess, Aphrodite. To kill Aphrodite was impossible, but it was possible to disguise her and to convert her. What was pure in the figure of Venus found its incorporation elsewhere, and the soiled dove of Aphrodite, who is one with Semiramis, was washed in the laver of regeneration. Prof. Usener boldly maintained then that these various saints are only hypostatized surnames of Aphrodite, and in pursuance of the same theme he has recently given us the Acta S. Marinæ in a form for which those who sympathize with him, and those who do not, will be alike grateful. The use he has made of his learning may not be acceptable to most of those who delight in the legends of the saints. The use he has made of his MSS. is a matter of general satisfaction. The martyrology of St. Marina appears together with that of St. Christopher—most picturesque of saints—in an appendix to the congratulatory letter sent by the University of Bonn to the University of Heidelberg at its recent semi-millennium. Much of Prof. Usener's admirable work appears in similar sporadic forms, and those who wonder at an erudition which is as familiar with the labors of the Bollandists as with the remotest recesses of classic mythology, are becoming impatient to see the complete cycle of which we have had only an arc here and an arc there. We can only add that the story of Marina is, to our thinking, much less interesting and dramatic than that of Pelagia, which is admirably told by the monkish chronicler.

ARTISTIC IMAGINATION.

Imagination in Landscape Painting. By Philip Gilbert Hamerton. Boston : Roberts Bros.

MR. HAMERTON again offers a contribution to the science of the most difficult, because least tangible, subject of study to which great importance can be attached at our present stage of intellectual development. We have reached at last a scientific basis for every branch of investigation into things subject of positive knowledge except art, which, while it goes on filling the earth with its results, gives us no demonstrable hold on its vital principle. De gustibus non est disputandum is the conclusion behind which all differences of opinion take shelter; and in fact the personal element so thoroughly dominates all others in criticism, that the standards of excellence and the position of the individual artist are more influenced by the judgment of a single critic of accepted authority than by all the essays of a scientific tendency ever written. We accept the judgments of Reynolds and of Da Vinci, not because we follow any reasoning they have left us, but because we know that they understood art, and therefore ought to be able to give an opinion. It is peculiarly a case of possumus quia videmur posse, and we have seen in this generation public opinion controlled, as far as the English language goes, by a critic who was demonstrably wrong (whether any other may be found demonstrably right, remains another question) in many principles of criticism which he laid down, partial and passionate in exegesis and inaccurate in observation, because he had acquainted himself with certain scientific facts, and with unsurpassed eloquence and profound self-conviction asserted those facts and that conviction to be the foundation of art, and therefore the standards by which it should be judged, though no thoroughly qualified artist has ever accepted his premises or his conclusions.

In the necessary work of clearing away the erroneous system of ideas which Ruskin, with an unflinching air of authority and contagious passion, has imposed on his peculiar public, no one has been so influential as Hamerton. Trained in a broad school of art, judicial and scientific in his temperament, he has attacked the questions involved in a true standard of criticism with a deliberation and breadth of judgment curiously in contrast with the Oxford Professor's, with the advantage that though he builds slowly and with a truly Caledonian prudence, his work stands destructive criticism better than that of any previous writer on art. Comparing this his latest study into the springs of artistic activity with that of Mr. Ruskin on the same subject, the qualities of the rival critics may be seen more clearly grouped, if more favorable to the latter, than in most of their parallel studies. Ruskin's essay on the Imagination is, taken with that on Beauty, the most valuable part of his 'Modern Painters'; but it will be noticed that at the basis of his entire theory of art there lies an element of mysticism, a remote metaphysical strain, largely derived from his personal emotions before nature. His theory had a fascinating theological value, perhaps a scientific one, if there were any method of measuring emotion by a scientific standard, but necessarily remains a mere suggestion for a complete and profound metaphysical investigation. Its analysis is ingenious and overwrought, and fails, perhaps more than from any other reason, through his attempt to include under his definition of Imagination faculties which are only associated with it or allied to it. Hamerton is more practical in his method of approaching the subject, and accepts the fact of imagination as we do that of thought, as a mental phenomenon of which metaphysical explanation is not to be profitably studied.

But in his turn Hamerton follows too far the lead of Ruskin, whose treatment he seems to have had in mind, and commits, in our opinion, another error in taking too little for understood in the minds of his readers. To take the last objection first, he becomes trite in his opening chapters, where he deals with the peculiarity, or want of peculiarity, rather, in the imagination of landscape painters—which seems to us to go without saying. He attempts to bring his argument down to the level of minds which, if they read him at all, will apprehend without this elementary discussion all that he bases on it; and if they do not, will take him at his word and accept it without the discussion. Nobody who is capable of following his investigation would maintain that landscape imagination is a separate faculty from figure imagination; and this minuteness gives the essay at the outset an air of commonplace, which weakens its general effect. Even here, however, there occur occasional observations which have a characteristic common-sense value, as when Mr. Hamerton says, speaking of unprofessional taste:

"There is good evidence, even, that a large proportion of the outside public is really more imaginative than some of the landscape painters themselves: for accurate, unimaginative landscape painting is never widely popular, and the lowest popular forms of the art, as well as the highest, invariably appeal far more to the spectator's imagination than to any supposed accuracy in his knowledge. The views of places painted on the panels of steamboats, or the colored prints that are bestowed gratuitously on the purchasers of certain groceries, or the sketches of landscape on screens and trays, are probably the lowest forms of the art that deserve to be taken into consideration; and in all these you will find, I do not say any noble imaginative powers, but certainly far more the impulse to be imaginative than to be accurate. This is only in accordance with what we know of the popular imagination in other things. We owe the development of all early myths and legends to the common people, while the criticism which distinguishes between legend and history is always the product of a small, cultivated class. There is, indeed, such vigor of imagination in the popular mind that the artist who is destitute of it cannot satisfy the instinctive need of the people. They will be unmoved by his art, and however careful, however full of conscientious observation it may be, they will feel it to be unsatisfactory, and therefore reject it as untrue."

Rarely has a more important truth connected with the development of art been so plainly told in so few words. This passage contains the elements of a complete philosophy of art. The following chapter, on the two senses of the word Imagination, errs in both the senses we have pointed out, first in admitting to a certain extent Ruskin's divisions of the Imagination, and second in going to the lexicographers for the definition of a word of which no lexicographer can be competent to give a definition to the specialist. Webster and Littré can give the generally accepted definition of Imagination—that is their function; but when a finer distinction is to be drawn, it belongs to the imaginative man to give it, or, in default of his definition, we must recur to the specialist who deals with Imagination, i. e., to art in its various forms. Mr. Hamerton would have arrived at a happier and quicker conclusion had he not deferred so much to the common understanding of what the common understanding will always make a mystery of. Nor had Wordsworth any clear conception of how Imagination could be defined—probably he had never given himself any serious thought on the matter—or what might be the radical distinction between it and Fancy. And Mr. Hamerton himself seems to us not so much insensible to, as timid in essuming to define, the true distinction between the two ; for that the distinction exists, not even Ruskin's avowal (too late) of incapacity to distinguish between Fancy, Imagination, and Invention (p. 4) is sufficient to make one doubt. If we might venture to supplement, rather than correct, Mr. Hamerton, we should say that Invention means the finding out a way to do a thing which may be imaginative or may not—it is a purely voluntary act, with a definite purpose in view, viz., the doing something by a method not applied to that act before ; it does not imply Imagination, but may be moved by it. Fancy consists rather in charging an object with some unusual attribute, or associating it with some unexpected quality than in bringing up new images; while Imagination is the supreme creative faculty, bringing up to the mental faculties distinct mental images, recognizable and under certain circumstances communicable to the minds of others than the imaginer. But as to the grade or quality of the Imagination, there does not seem to be any distinction possible except that of more or less, and more or less pure from Fancy, from memory of actual objects seen, or more or less distinct as compared with actual vision.

Not only is a recollection (distinctly recognizable as such) not a part of an imaginative picture, but it is probably a drawback to its perfection, for while memory acts distinctly, what it recalls will be actual objects seen, while the value of the imaginative picture consists in the unity which is the consequence of its spontaneous creation. Memory feeds Imagination, but has no specific part in the production of the "imago" beyond having furnished all the material which, digested and recombined, forms its details; and while the Imagination may doubtless be more copious and clear for being coupled with an excellent memory, it will probably be crippled by that memory acting perceptibly. Probably the best example of pictorial memory in the records of art is that of our F. E. Church, in whom Imagination is so completely dissociated from memory that it may be said not to exist, except in the sense in which all people have it in a degree, by having mental vision—if all have it. This, indeed, is fully recognized by Mr. Hamerton in what he says in the chapter on "Images in the Mind" (p. 7), which makes his distinctions in the discussion of Memory vs. Imagination less clear than they should be.

In connection with this subject it should be understood that memory, as the artificial product of science, and with regard to which Mr. Hamerton has, in the chapter on Training of Memory, some very thoughtful considerations, is decidedly antagonistic to artistic imagination, and not even, like simple memory, nutritive to it, for it induces the mind to retain facts as they are scientifically known, not as they are really seen; and what the artist has to deal with is the appearance of things, with regard to which Hamerton himself has taught us in his 'Landscape' that illusions are often the best side of art. If (p. 13) the distinction between pinus sylvestris and other trees is not visible to the merely art-educated eye, then art should take no cognizance of it, nor should a landscape painter take notice of geological distinctions which do not appear in form and tint. To represent rocks as gneiss or sandstone in a picture when they could only be distinguished as such by a geological education, is no part of art.

A most important part of this study is that contained in the chapter on "Images Evoked by Feeling," in which it is pointed out that a vital distinction exists between actual and dramatic passion, in that while the first paralyzes art, the second (or what Hamerton calls "secondary emotion," i. e., a half-feigned or half-remembered emotion), develops it:

"This brings us to a most important conclusion, which enhances still more the great value of imagination in the fine arts. Not only are the images seen by the imaginative artist called up by emotion, but the emotion itself is imaginative. By the power of his imagination the artist enters into a state of emotion, and yet at the same time this emotion, which is only half real, leaves him sufficient mental liberty to attend to all the technical details of his work as versifier or painter. When a poet seems most deeply moved, he has still leisure enough to choose effective syllables and sonorous rhymes, as an actress, in the storm of simulated passion, assumes those attitudes which display her person to advantage."

A branch of his subject which we should have been glad if the author had elaborated more completely, is the relation between the imagining of a subject (landscape) and composition of the same; unimaginative painters often having great facility and felicity in composing, as, in a remarkable degree, our Church already alluded to. The chapter on "The Alteration in Images Produced by Feeling" seems to us to retraverse the ground occupied by imaginative conception, the true "feeling" or emotion being imaginative, and transforming the image derived from the natural scene to a different image. This is merely the case in which Imagination fuses the image without destroying its identity, so that it provides the soul or vital element without being concerned with the body or material element.

It is impossible in reasonable space to follow out in detail the development which Mr. Hamerton has given his subject, suggestive as it is of grave thought in every page; and if redundant in argument, it is without verbiage, and is full with the earnestness of a writer saturated with his subject and conscious of its gravity. There is here and there, however, a passage which does not seem to fit the frame, as when, in dealing with "The Alteration in Images Produced by Feeling," he says, "What is still more remarkable is that the history of past ages whose account seems closed with the death of all those who belonged to them, is constantly presented to us in new aspects by the selecting imagination of new historians." This we believe to be a mistake, and that the "new aspects" belong not to the selecting imagination, but to materials brought to light by profounder research and the subsidence of partisan passions; Imagination having no part in historical research. The Imagination gains nothing by getting the credit of what does not belong to it.

The distinction of a "sympathetic imagination" we should regard as false in theory and confusing in study, for the quality known as sympathy (like Mr. Ruskin's "imagination contemplative," etc.), we should recognize as not a form of imagination at all, but a mental faculty which corresponds to imagination as the feminine intellect does to the masculine. We shall never attain a scientific nomenclature if we include under the same terms such diametrically opposed faculties as production and appreciation, creative and receptive; nor is the appellation of reverie as passive imagination more happy. In both these it seems to us that Mr. Hamerton has been unconsciously influenced by his reading of Ruskin to abandon the true logical consideration of the subject which is his more fitting temper. But apart from nomenclature, both these chapters are extremely valuable. The definition of Invention as "imagination that can be made to work," while open to the same objection as to nomenclature, involves some consequences which are important equally if the definition be true or not true, and therefore the definition seems superfluous if not incorrect. Invention and Imagination are not synonyms in any case, though Invention may be imaginative or the reverse. It may be objected that nomenclature is a matter of minor importance so long as a thing is clearly designated; but the establishment of any science, as such, begins with a just and exact nomenclature, without which no precise identifications or distinctions can be made. In Ruskin's theories of Beauty and Imagination the entire fabric is askew for the want of correct nomenclature, thus forbidding the logical application of the theories. Mr. Hamerton is much nearer the truth, but his formulas are capable of reduction to much simpler and therefore more correct and comprehensive terms.

We have left no space to speak of the illustrations, which add to the worth of this important book by their artistic value more than by their relevancy. The process prints in the text, reproductions of engravings, show how far the English are behind in this matter.

RECENT NOVELS.

A Step Aside. By Charlotte Dunning. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Katy of Catoctin; or, The Chain-Breakers. A National Romance. By George Alfred Townsend. D. Appleton & Co.

Roland Blake. By S. Weir Mitchell, M.D. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The Silence of Dean Maitland: A Novel. By Maxwell Grey. D. Appleton & Co.

Necæra: A Tale of Ancient Rome. By John W. Graham. Macmillan & Co.

Francis: A Socialistic Romance. Being for the most part an Idyll of England and Summer By M. Dal Vero. Harper's Handy Series.

The Psychologist. By Putnam P. Bishop. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

A Bachelor's Blunder. By W. E. Norris. Henry Holt & Co.

The Marquis of Peñalta. By Don Armando Palacio-Valdés. From the Spanish by Nathan Haskell Dole. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.

Agnes Surriage. By Edwin Lasseter Bynner. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

MISS DUNNING'S work shows a gain in steadiness, and a quickened sense of proportion, without which 'A Step Aside' would not seem an improvement upon her first novel; for in workmanship alone does this novel reach the level of 'Upon a Cast.' The characteristics of the two books are sufficiently identical to mark in them a common authorship. The same quick, nervous style, the same accurate perception of values, the same artistic handling which are here combined to make interesting the slight story of Pauline Valrey's brief lapse from the highest bent of her nature, made 'Upon a Cast' such a pleasant reading. One cannot help feeling, however, that the story of Pauline and her weak lover is a poor one—almost trivial in some respects, in spite of Miss Dunning's art and her skill in selecting and arranging. The characters are true and lifelike enough; the interest, which is a personal rather than a dramatic one, is evenly sustained. The surprises are brought about, it is true, by the most commonplace incidents, but they are not old or worn out, and there is now and then a touch of elevation in Pauline's character that will reach women especially. But, after all this is said, there still remains a feeling of dissatisfaction, as if something were lacking. Hugh Langmuir may have been a lovable fellow, and his passion for Pauline may have been very intense and sincere; but it is too much to ask us to forgive his weakness, or to look upon Pauline's final attitude towards him otherwise than as one partly of atonement—since she had been his temptation—and partly of self-sacrifice.

The period of the war is just now very productive of literature, and the newspaper humorists are not altogether to be blamed for having their fling at the tendency to needlessly swell the bulk of material which some future historian will have to overhaul. Fiction, of course, listens as closely as any other branch of literature to the popular cry. But the value of a novel as a repository for historical facts is always doubtful. An earnest historian would hesitate long before hampering himself with the needs and restrictions of a narrative wherein the necessity for adapting square facts to the rounded outlines of romance would be a constant temptation to distortion and inaccuracy. And while the sincere novelist may often find his advantage in history, the question of epochs in the world's progress will at last be found to be with him—as with Bulwer, or Thackeray, or Scott—a means rather than an end.

Mr. Townsend has possibly meant to do his work in this way. His first object, as he states in his preface, was writing a romance upon the conspiracy of Booth; his next, painting the more picturesque portions of Maryland, from the old tide-water counties to the German valleys and mountain battle-fields. But he has been overweighted with the burden of his facts. The romance is weak and straggling when he is painting picturesque Maryland, or broken and confused when he is developing the plot of Booth. Beginning on the eve of John Brown's raid, the thin thread of Lloyd Quantrell's story is spun out through almost endless scenes of martyrdom, battle, and conspiracy to final peace with innocent Katy of Catoctin. It is all done with the volubility of the journalist, to whom all facts, however slight, are precious, and the imagination a thing to be, at least generally, judiciously suppressed. Neither the immense amount of information nor the great labor of collocation shown by the book can be dismissed lightly; but as one reads and grows tired through the five hundred and more pages, one cannot help thinking how good the story might have been by itself, and how concise and valuable a history might have been made by leaving out the story altogether. Mr. Townsend says, not boastfully at all, that no natural scene is sketched that did not dwell upon his sight, and of one such scene he gives the date of the study in a foot-note. William Black is also said to make a study of his scenes while actually beholding them; and one is thus led—empirically, perhaps, but nevertheless irresistibly—to a comparison in which Mr. Townsend has nothing to gain.

In 'Roland Blake' the war plays an entirely different part. The scenes and incidents of camp-life and battle form a mere background for the action of the story; which, however, is in all respects so unworthy of praise that it is not a fair sample to set up beside 'Katy of Catoctin' for the sake of making noticeable the difference between methods. The whole plot of the story, in the first place, hinges upon an absurdity, for had Richard Darnell been a character with the intelligence and the feelings which the author has ascribed to him, he would never have allowed his true name to appear in the transaction by which he traitorously sold his knowledge to Union officers. Yet the climax turns upon the possession of his name by Roland Blake—the only man who knew of his connection with the Union Bureau of Information. Mr. Mitchell's stories are readable; the memories of the war are very actual and living with him; but his conceptions are too hasty and too carelessly worked out to deserve more than a careless reading.

In considering just here 'The Silence of Dean Maitland,' it is curious to notice that while the scene, at least in its first two parts, is laid contemporaneously with both that of Mr. Townsend's novel and that of Mr. Mitchell's, there is absolutely no reference to the rebellion in its pages. One appreciates a little more keenly, even in dwelling on so little a thing, how small a part our great war really plays in the thoughts and interests of foreigners. But though this may strike one in reading Mr. Grey's novel, one will realize on the other hand that our men of letters have not been ignored—at least by Mr. Grey. Hawthorne's influence can be too closely and continuously traced throughout the long and depressing history of Dean Maitland's crime to prevent one from being constantly reminded of both 'The Marble Faun' and 'The Scarlet Letter.' The story is much more complicated than either of Hawthorne's; its scope is wider and more extended. There is nothing that recalls the close artistic treatment, the completeness and finish of Hawthorne's work; there is only here and there a flavor, a touch that is none the less real by being so hard to name. The old truth that remorse is the heaviest punishment for sin is the theme. And for the sake of a full-length picture possibly—and possibly for the sake of filling three volumes—Mr. Grey has described the life of Cyril Maitland as he passed from the innocence of youth through the stages of deceit, seduction, and murder, to allowing his dearest friend to suffer unjustly for twenty years in prison, while he himself, who should have been there, was steadily gaining the highest dignities of the Church; until finally remorse grew stronger than fear, and he confessed his crime from the pulpit. The book is liberally conceived; there is a generous largeness in its proportions, and a slow, thorough-going style in the method of their development, that is pleasant to meet with in this day of dashed-off stories and novelettes. But one would like the length of it better if the matter were more cheerful.

If reading a book without having to consult at the same time three or four others is, as Godwin says, an unalloyed pleasure, one can have no fault to find with Mr. Graham's tale of ancient Rome, but can pursue the fortunes of the beautiful Neæra and her brave Pretorian, and, satisfied with the purely human interest of their story, leave the annals on the shelf. Sejanus and Tiberius were only men after all, and one may learn all of them that is pertinent to Neæra's tale without going outside the cover of Mr. Graham's book.

The lack of earnestness, together with the light and careless tone of 'Francis,' deprives the book of any value or influence in the socialistic literature of the time. A socialistic romance cannot be "for the most part an idyll of England and summer." The misery and degradation that wrought Kingsley to such heights in 'Alton Locke' cannot be smiled away by pleasant love tales, nor hidden by a little innocent masquerading.

There is material enough in 'The Psychologist' for two or three good novels; but, as Mr. Bishop has put it together, it falls somewhat short of making one. By close attention one can find a continuous thread of interest; but it is so obscured by the jumbled mass of incidents, characters, and philosophic and religious discussions that to keep track of it is hardly worth the trouble. The commercial traveller as a leading figure in fiction will strike many as an innovation, but a religious drummer will strike more as an unusual type, and one that cannot by any means be descended from 'L'illustre Gaudissart' of Balzac.

There is less to distinguish Mr. W. E. Norris's latest effort in fiction from the general mass of well-written stories of English life than is usually the case with him. He seems to have borrowed some of "Ouida's" puppets for the nonce, and to have pruned away that writer's over-luxuriant upholstery, together with as much of the impropriety and suggestive innuendo as is compatible with the conditions of society in England at the present time. Nearly all the characters and incidents are of the most conventional type—the beautiful young girl, suddenly converted from a great prospective heiress into a penniless orphan, immediately after her first ball, where she not only meets the quiet man of unattractive exterior who is destined to marry her and win her love afterwards, but the handsome young officer who fancies himself in love with her, and makes trouble between husband and wife later on; the vain attempts to earn her own living; her acceptance of, and marriage to, the very desirable "catch" above mentioned: the uneventful country life, diversified only by the interminable visits of the young officer, who courts the heroine's sister-in-law, when not otherwise engaged in courting the heroine herself or the married woman who gives him good advice, tarnishes both their names, and urges him on to marriage with a wealthy woman who adores him, although she knows his ways; and the eventual reconciliation of all parties when the heroine has sent the young officer about his business and discovered that she loves her husband. The novelty in the plot is the manner in which this desirable end is brought about. Jacob Stiles, the instrument, is a character who would have repaid more extended study. He plays his peculiar part admirably, but the complexity of his situation and emotions hardly receives due attention in view of the importance of the results. The heroine is one of those perfect and thoroughly charming English girls of whom it is always a pleasure to read, especially when handled by a master of easy narrative and natural conversation like Mr. Norris. But his strength lies rather in depicting perverse characters, and his women of that class are certainly more interesting than his simply good ones. Carry Herbert in this volume is a mild illustration of this point. Mr. Norris shines with particular brilliancy in the difficult field of narration in the first person singular, and his best work is accomplished on that model. The present story is not so narrated, and therefore, clever and agreeable as it is, it lacks much of the sparkle and individuality which usually distinguish his work.

It was a pity to rechristen Don Armando Palacio-Valdés's delightful novel of Spanish provincial life 'The Marquis of Peñalta.' It places that unfortunate young man under the necessity of living up to the responsibilities of a hero, whereas Marta and Maria are deservedly accorded the preëminence by the author. A more really vital and comprehensible contrast of the two great themes of Spanish literature, love and religion, it would be hard to find. The romantic school still makes itself felt, to a great extent, in Spain, particularly in the treatment of feminine character. The distinctive merit of the novel now under consideration lies precisely in its departure from the conventional types, which possess but little power to move the reader. Marta has at length let us into the secret that Spanish girls are made of flesh and blood, much like the girls of other nations, instead of being very beautiful, very perfect, but very dim abstractions. If Maria impresses us somewhat less forcibly, it is because she voluntarily withdraws from the scene and deserts her lover for religion. The manner in which prominence is at first given to her gradual immersion in purely religious preoccupations, her increased severity towards herself, and her estrangement from the Marquis, followed by her absence from the story for many pages, her abrupt reappearance in the character of a Carlist plotter, and her retirement to the convent—all this is finely graduated and artistic, so that, although the reader is, at first, disappointed at not seeing more of her, he finally realizes that the effect produced upon his mind is precisely that which her conduct must have produced on her lover and her family. The touch of humor, at times approaching sarcasm, which lightens up the other portions of the story, is new but very welcome from a modern Spaniard. Marta's housewifely labors, wherein she is assisted by the Marquis, furnish not only a series of charming love scenes, but food for thought on the subject of Spanish manners and customs in the wealthy classes. The Marquis's way of examining the beds, and peeping into Maria's bureau drawers, in that famous hunt for the canary (during which the house grows from a one-story building to a thing of staircases, towers, and unlimited apartments, in spite of the fact that the head of the family sleeps in the library), is surprising, to say the least. Marta sweeping the dining-room in a ripped gown is as irresistible as she is when helping the Marquis to fold the sheets; but whether those sheets were rough-dried or starched and ironed, is a question which will harass the souls of housekeepers. Marta, too, would be called bold in some latitudes. But, in spite of these peculiarities, and an over-insistence now and then on points which are not proportionately developed later on, the life, truth, and spirit of the book must commend it to the novel-reader in quest of a fresh sensation. The translation is excellent, on the whole. Exception might be taken to a number of small mistranslations, but since they do not materially affect the sense of the book, they may be left for the author to quarrel with, if he should ever chance to meet with the volume.

There is a charm about Mr. Bynner's historical romance of colonial times which engages the reader's sympathies at the outset. The story is the familiar one of Sir Charles Henry Frankland's love for a beautiful girl whom he first saw busily scrubbing the stairs in the inn at Marblehead. He brought her to Boston, had her educated, made her his mistress, and finally married her ten years later in Lisbon, in performance of a vow that he would do so if he escaped from the great earthquake. It is a story which offers fine opportunities to a writer endowed with an abundance of imagination, and the chief exception which can be taken to Mr. Bynner's treatment of it is that his powers of invention were hardly equal, at all times, to the task imposed upon them of filling out certain portions of the tale where historical data were lacking. This is particularly noticeable in the passage which refers to the life of the pair in Hopkinton, and applies, more or less, to the remainder of the book. It is true that there was a long period of time to cover, and that the addition of incidents would have lengthened the story, but the lapse of time is hardly indicated, and there is a certain abruptness in the manner in which the scene is shifted. Up to the day of the elopement, however, there is no criticism to make, and Agnes is, throughout, an ideal character, with the one necessary limitation. But the author evidently does not feel quite sure of his ability to do justice to strong situations and passionate love-making, which surely ought to occupy a prominent place in such a plot, if anywhere. He cleverly avoids any dilemma of that sort on several occasions, and, in one notable instance, he distinctly shirks the responsibility, though the manner in which it is done almost disarms the reader. The evening on which Agnes definitely unites her fortunes with Sir Henry's is the occasion in question. Her change of feeling and the way in which it is effected are left entirely to the reader's imagination, while, for the scene which properly belongs there, an extremely good scene between close-fisted Widow Ruck and her equally close-fisted suitor is substituted, thus bringing to the front, at the most critical moment in the drama, two secondary personages, who have had next to nothing to do with the development of the plot up to that point, and who thereafter instantly vanish into oblivion. Agnes's sailor lover plays the part of a conventional puppet, with his opportune appearances. But if the author does not always rise to the situation, his book is good, and possesses in a rare degree that quality of atmosphere of the period which is so difficult of attainment, in addition to an agreeable style, which is suitably stately, but never heavy.

A BLOCKADE-RUNNER.

Sketches from My Life. By the late Admiral Hobart Pasha. London: Longmans & Co.; New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1886.

THE "late Admiral Hobart Pasha" was not in possession of an attractive reputation while he lived. A soldier of fortune never can be. It would be a difficult matter in casuistry to decide how far a soldier, even in the service of his own country, is justified in fighting in a war which he holds to be unjust. But there can be no difficulty about the case of one who hires himself out to be used as a piece of homicidal machinery by a foreign state. A man who, without the pressure of some overwhelming necessity, consents to do this, must plainly be altogether indifferent to the cause for which he may be called on to fight. The case presents itself in a very aggravated shape when, like Hobart Pasha, he renounces the service of a free country to enter that of a corrupt and barbarous Oriental despotism. But the human mind possesses an infinite capacity of self-deception, and the reader of these pleasantly written 'Sketches' will rise from them not without a considerable liking for their author.

Hobart Pasha, it is plain from these pages, was one of those men—not by any means uncommon in the "services" of all nations—whose ethics were permanently in a topsy-turvy condition. He spent sixteen years in the service of the Porte, and not only did he never regret for a moment the time thus spent, but he records, evidently with genuine conviction, that he has always been a lover of freedom, a champion of the weak against the strong. We are not, therefore, at all surprised when he inveighs against the "philanthropists" who carried on an agitation against the beneficent institution of slavery. The "philanthropist" is, in fact, in a general way, the root of nearly all the evil that affects humanity; and holding, as he seems to do, this view, it must be acknowledged that when he enlisted under the Constantinople Pashas, Hobart Pasha got into an atmosphere quite untainted with the malaria of philanthropy. The truth really is, that Hobart Pasha was a man born out of due time. His ruling passion was for a life of excitement and adventure. He would have made a conspicuous name for himself among the sailors of Great Britain, had it been his fortune to live during the great revolutionary wars. As it was, he flung himself with eagerness wherever hard knocks were going and danger of any kind was to be encountered, and he had a most cordial and sympathetic admiration for the brave man, to whatever race or country he belonged. It is, indeed, this hearty relish for manliness that constitutes the great attractiveness of these 'Sketches.' Southerner or Northerner, Russian, Greek, or Turk—let but the man show that he does not fear death, and he is secure of Hobart Pasha's applause. But in addition to this, the Admiral wields an effective pen. The sailor's trained habits of observation are here combined with a faculty of expression which seems to seize, by a sort of instinct, upon the right words to embody what he has seen. And he is never prolix. When he quits a subject, the reader feels inclined to quarrel with him for dropping it so soon.

The part of his book which Americans will read with the liveliest interest is his account of blockade-running during the war of secession. He took to this work because, on receiving his rank as post-captain, he found himself, as it were, shelved for four years, until his time came for a command. Blockade-running was just the thing to chime in with the instincts of a free lance. It was exciting, adventurous, and, if successful, highly gainful. "I trust," writes the Admiral, "that our American friends will not be too severe in their censures on those engaged in blockade-running; for (I say it with the greatest respect for and admiration of enterprise) had they been lookers-on instead of principals in the sad drama that was enacted, they would have been the very men to take the lead." The vessel that Capt. Hobart—or Roberts, as he called himself—had charge of, "was one of the finest double-screw steamers that had ever been built," and the following passage describes how she was prepared for her work:

"This was done by reducing her spars to a light pair of lower masts, without any yards across them; the only break in this sharp outline being a small crow's nest on the foremast, to be used as a look-out place. The hull, which showed about eight feet above water, was painted a dull gray color, to render her as nearly as possible invisible in the night. The boats were lowered square with the gunnels. Coal was taken on board of a smokeless nature (anthracite); the funnel, being what is called 'telescope,' lowered close down to the deck. In order that no noise might be made, steam was blown off under water. . . . While speaking of the precautions used, I may mention that among the fowls taken on board as provisions no cocks were allowed, for fear of their proclaiming the whereabouts of the blockade-runner. This may seem ridiculous, but it was very necessary."

Notwithstanding all his precautions, Capt. "Roberts" very narrowly escaped capture on his first venture. The run was from Bermuda to Wilmington, a distance of 270 miles, with Federal cruisers scattered about in all directions. Twenty-four hours after leaving port they were sighted and chased by a large Federal cruiser, which, however, they succeeded in outsailing:

"Night came on, and I had hoped that we should have made rapid progress till day-break unmolested. All was quiet until about one o'clock in the morning, when, suddenly, to our dismay, we found a steamer close alongside of us. How she had got there without our knowledge is a mystery to me even now. However, there she was, and we had hardly seen her before a stentorian voice howled out, 'Heave to in that steamer, or I'll sink you!' It seemed as if all was over, but I determined to try a ruse before giving the little craft up. So I answered, 'Ay, ay, sir, we are stopped.' The cruiser was about eighty yards from us. We heard orders given to man and arm the quarter-boats, we saw the boats lowered into the water, we saw them coming, we heard the crews laughing and cheering at the prospect of their prize. The bowmen had just touched the sides of our vessel with their boat-hooks, when I whispered down the tube into the engine-room, 'Full speed ahead!' and away we shot into the darkness. I don't know what happened; whether the captain of the man-of-war thought that his boats had taken possession, and thus did not try to stop us, or whether he stopped to pick up his boats in the rather nasty sea that was running—some one who reads this may know. All I can say is, that not a shot was fired, and that in less than a minute the pitch darkness hid the cruiser from our view. This was a great piece of luck."

The Captain had another narrow escape when making the return voyage from Wilmington, heavily laden with cotton:

"Daylight broke with thick, hazy weather, nothing being in sight. We went on all night till half past eight o'clock, when the weather cleared up, and there was a large paddle-wheel cruiser (that we must have passed very near to in the thick weather) about six miles astern of us. The moment she saw us she gave chase. After running for a quarter of an hour it was evident that with our heavy cargo on board the cruiser had the legs of us, and as there was a long day before us for the chase, things looked badly. We moved some cotton aft to immerse our screws well; but still the cruiser was steadily decreasing her distance from us, when an incident of a very curious nature favored us for a time. It is mentioned in the book of sailing directions, that the course of the Gulf Stream (in the vicinity of which we were) is in calm weather and smooth water plainly marked out by a ripple on the inner and outer edges. We clearly saw, about a mile ahead of us, a remarkable ripple, which we, rightly as it turned out, conjectured was that referred to in the book. As soon as we had crossed it we steered the usual course of the current of the Gulf Stream, that here ran from two to three miles an hour. Seeing us alter our course, the cruiser did the same; but she had not crossed the ripple on the edge of the stream, and the course she was now steering tended to keep her for some time from doing so. The result soon made it evident that the observations in the book were correct; for until she too crossed the ripple into the stream, we dropped her rapidly astern, whereby we increased our distance to at least seven miles. It was now noon, from which time the enemy again began to close upon us, and at five o'clock was not more than three miles distant. At six o'clock she opened a harmless fire with the Parrot gun in her bow, the shot falling far short of us. The sun set at a quarter to seven, by which time she had got so near that she managed to send two or three shots over us, and was steadily coming up.

"Luckily, as night came on, the weather became very cloudy, and we were on the dark side of the moon, now setting in the west, which, occasionally breaking through the clouds astern of the cruiser, showed us all her movements, while we must have been very difficult to make out, though certainly not more than a mile off. All this time she kept firing away, thinking, I suppose, that she would frighten us into stopping. If we had gone straight on, we should doubtless have been caught; so we altered our course two points to the eastward. After steaming a short distance we stopped quite still, blowing off steam under water, not a spark or the slightest smoke showing from the funnel; and we had the indescribable satisfaction of seeing our enemy steam past us, still firing ahead at some imaginary vessel. This had been a most exciting chase and a very narrow escape; night only saved us from a New York prison."

At the close of the war the blockading vessels turned the tables on the blockade-runners:

"Fort Fisher was at last taken unbeknownst, as the sailors say, to the blockade-runners at Nassau or Bermuda, at which places the blindest confidence was still felt in everything connected with the fortunes of the South, and where to whisper an opinion that any mishap might happen to Wilmington was positively dangerous. The crafty Northerners placed the lights for going over the bar as usual. The blockade-runners came cautiously on, and, congratulating themselves on seeing no cruisers, ran gayly into port. The usual feastings and rejoicings were about to commence when a boat full of armed men came alongside, and astonished them by telling them that they were in the lion's mouth. This happened to four or five vessels before the news had reached the islands. It was hard lines, no doubt, but quite fair play. It was the blockaders' turn to laugh now."

These lively accounts of blockade-running—of which our quotations are no more than a sample—are interspersed with as lively descriptions of Charleston and Richmond under the abnormal conditions created by the war. And there are, besides, other chapters devoted to a chronicle of the writer's adventures when engaged in the suppression of the slave traffic, to his experiences in the Baltic with the British fleet under the command of Sir Charles Napier, to sport in Turkey, society in Constantinople, and the performances of the Turkish fleet, which was under his personal command, during the last Russo-Turkish war. Nowhere does the interest of the narrative flag; and the facts and anecdotes recorded are so many side-lights thrown on the main current of great historical events, rendering these at once more intelligible and a great deal more interesting.

Eminent Authors of the Nineteenth Century. Literary Portraits by Dr. Georg Brandes. Translated from the original by Rasmus B. Anderson, U. S. Minister to Denmark, etc. T. Y. Crowell & Co. 1886.

THE volume here offered to the American public is a translation of the collection of essays published in 1882 under the name of 'Moderne Geister.' To the eight essays contained in the German book Mr. Anderson has, however, added one upon Henrik Ibsen, which was written by Brandes in 1883. This last portrait is eminently worthy of the splendid gallery in which it appears. The German volume 'Moderne Geister' was noticed in the Nation of July 6, 1882, in a review which began with a brief sketch of the author's career, and closed with these words: "The works of Brandes eminently deserve to be translated into English, and when they are we predict for them an Anglo-American popularity second only to that which they enjoy in Germany, which is saying much." It is unnecessary to repeat here what was said then in praise of these delightful essays. They represent their author's best work, and Brandes at his best is the peer of any living critic. A few words concerning him in addition to what was said before may perhaps be appropriate.

Brandes is emphatically a son of the present age. Years ago he chose the modern spirit as his special field; his great work deals with the "main currents of the literature of the nineteenth century," and it is among these currents, as forming the great stream of the intellectual life of to-day, that he finds his true element. He is a man of cosmopolitan temper, of wide knowledge in half-a-dozen modern literatures, and of a singularly alert and penetrating mind. His style, which, years ago, showed signs of a tendency towards the dangerous brilliancy of his friend Taine, has of late become more chaste and classical, and may now with much truth be said to combine French lucidity with German carefulness. In tone these later essays are eminently calm; they show little trace of the ancient fureur de guerrier with which the author long ago entered the arena of Danish literature. Now he seldom takes sides at all, and when he does it is with the composure of a magistrate who does not feel himself called upon to amplify or to defend his decision. In other words, the critical art has come to be for Brandes essentially the art of depicting, and it is with good reason that he employs the word "portraits" in the sub-title of the volume before us. For portraits these productions are, and not essays as Macaulay, for example, understood the word. The merits of Brandes's work are those of portraiture. On this point some words of his own are interesting:

"For the critic too," he observes (that is, for the critic as well as the painter), "the individual is an especially alluring object; to him, too, the execution of a portrait is a singularly fascinating occupation. . . . After we have gradually become familiar with an author, have come to feel ourselves perfectly at home in his writings, to perceive dimly that certain of their characteristics dominate others, and then [sic, in Anderson's translation; read: if then we] happen to be by nature of a critical turn of mind, we can find no peace until we have rendered ourselves an account of our impressions, and made clear the indistinct image of the character of another ego that has arisen within our soul."

But we should do injustice to this great critic if we conveyed the impression that he is merely a portrait-painter in the sense most naturally associated with that word. Much of his art consists, it is true, in the skilful choice of interesting matters to talk about, in the carefully managed, but always apparently unstudied sequence of his topics, and in the nicety of his analysis. And these excellences at least have their analogies in the art of portraiture. But Brandes is at any rate no seeker after the picturesque and the striking; the truth is sacred to him before all things. Also, he offers enough to think about. At times he even becomes profound, and evinces the fact that he knows his Hegel as well as another man. But he never remains long in the deeps of metaphysic, and when he emerges it is usually with a pearl worth diving for. Take this illustration. He has been dissecting psychologically the genius of Hans Christian Andersen, and is busy with the fact that the great story-teller appeals most powerfully to children in whom the sense of sex is not yet developed. "The whole secret," he concludes, "lies in the fact that he is exclusively what he is—not a man of learning, not a thinker, not a standard-bearer, not a champion, as many of our great writers have been, but simply a poet. A poet is a man who is at the same time a woman."

The following will illustrate our author's skill in comparisons:

"The criticism that can with justice be made upon his [H. C. Andersen's] 'Story of My Life,' is not so much that the author is throughout occupied with his own private affairs (that is quite natural in such a work); it is that his personality is scarcely ever occupied with anything greater than itself, is never absorbed in an idea, is never entirely free from the ego. The revolution of 1848 in this book affects us as though we heard some one sneeze."

A word or two now with regard to the translation. Mr. Anderson's general fitness for the task he has undertaken cannot be doubted, and does not need to be advertised. Although not to the manner born in the use of English, he has acquired, through long residence in this country and through much experience in authorship and translating, a good command of our idiom. His translation of Brandes reads in the main well. At times his work is even brilliantly done. All the verse quotations of the original are done into metrical English, and these versions are uniformly good as such things run. All this being so, we were somewhat surprised to find upon close examination that the translator trips now and then in ways that are unaccountable. We do not refer to trifling slips which the reader can mend for himself; such, for instance, as the one noticed above, or the use of "will" for "shall," or a failure now and then to find the very best English word. Nor do we refer to occasional unsuccessful struggles with the intricacies of German syntax, like the one on page 12, where the greater part of the page is taken up with a single sentence the meaning of which is absolutely past finding out, unless one turns to the original. What we call unaccountable trips are such as the following, all of them from the essay upon Heyse: Page 3: "At home in south Germany, he yet feels constantly drawn to Italy as the land where the human plant has attained a more beautiful and luxuriant growth than elsewhere, one that is less disturbed by reflex action, and where the voice of the blood speaks most distinctly, most powerfully." The original has "Reflexion," which means 'ratiocination.' Page 6: "[The enjoyment of life in his youth] was lost to Franz through his premature struggle for self-consciousness." The original has "Selbstgewissheit," i. e., 'self-assurance.' Again, page 6: "He [Heyse] here portrays the sleeplessness of the mind which is as dangerous for the health of the soul as actual sleeplessness is for the welfare of the body, and shows how one in whom the reflex faculty is maimed loses that mysterious," etc. The original has "Reflexionskranke," which means 'one who thinks too much.' Page 8: "The peculiar kind of epicurean philosophy expressed in them . . . is in fact the poet's conclusive conception of life." The German has "schliessliche," i. e., 'ultimate.' Page 10: "How powerless is all comprehension of minds." The German has "Einverständniss der Geister," i. e., 'concord of minds.' Page 11: "blissful madness" is made to translate "seliger Unsinn." Page 17: "In order to be convinced of the thrilling significance of this characteristic." The German runs: "von der durchgreifenden [not ergreifenden] Bedeutung," i. e., 'the essential significance.' Page 31: "Where in one of his 'novellen' he introduces himself as a youth, he sings in Eichendorf's [read: Eichendorff's] own key, and we recognize [read: we learn] that very early in life he has been in the habit of whistling with rare skill the melodies of romance." Page 33: "He did not long continue to carol forth the music of romance"; and further on: "He is too thoroughly a child of the sun to be able to linger in the twilight of romance." The italicised phrase is each time a translation of romantisch, i. e., 'romantic,' in the sense of 'pertaining to' or 'characteristic of the Romantic school.' This misunderstanding reaches its climax in the following sentence on page 33: "A lyric poet he is not, in the main, and the strength of romance, conformably to its nature and of necessity, lies in lyric poetry." This last is a proposition which would puzzle a very wise man, but what Brandes says is entirely clear and eminently true, and that is, that "the strength of Romanticism lay in lyric poetry"—"die Romantik hatte naturgemäss und nothwendig ihre Kraft in der Lyrik."

Registers of the Births, Marriages, and Deaths of the "Église Françoise à la Nouvelle York," from 1688 to 1804, edited by the Rev. Alfred V. Wittmeyer. New York. 1886. [Collections of the Huguenot Society of America. Vol. 1. 8vo.]

THE Huguenot Society of America has very appropriately begun its publishing work by printing the early Registers of the first French church in this city. The volume is edited by its present rector, the Rev. A. V. Wittmeyer, who is also the secretary of the Society. In an introduction he gives a brief account of its ecclesiastical history, from which we learn that the first French service on Manhattan Island was held in 1628, but that there is a great uncertainty as to the manner in which the religious needs of the French were supplied during the next fifty years. In 1682 the Rev. Pierre Daillé, "the Apostle of the Huguenots in America," gathered a congregation which held its services in the Dutch church within the fort. Six years later, the number of the French having increased on account of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes to about a fourth of the population, a second congregation was formed with the Rev. Pierre Peiret for its minister. This body immediately built a meeting-house in Petty-Coat-Lane on the site now occupied by the Produce Exchange. Here they continued to worship, being soon joined by M. Daillé's people, until 1704, when a new building was erected in Pine Street. From this place they removed in 1834 to Franklin Street, and again in 1863 to their present church in West Twenty-second Street, having united with the Episcopal Church in 1808. Pictures of all but the first of these buildings are contained in this volume. It is hardly necessary to say more of their history during their independent existence than that it was marked by the ordinary incidents in the life of a church. At first it was very flourishing, but by the end of M. L. Rou's pastorate of forty years its membership was "reduced to an inconsiderable handful," partly from natural and unavoidable causes, partly from an unfortunate dissension between its two ministers. A few years later another struggle for the possession of it by rival parties in the congregation still further reduced its strength, and at the beginning of the Revolution the building was closed for a period of twenty years, being used for a part of the time by the English "for the reception of ordnance stores." In 1796 the church was reorganized and maintained a feeble life for a few years, when it joined the Episcopal Church "under the corporate name of The French Church du Saint Esprit."

The registers now printed comprise the baptismal, marriage, and death records from 1688 to 1804, consisting of about a thousand entries. They are very incomplete, the baptisms being most numerous, the burials least so. The editor has very properly endeavored to print them exactly as they stand; "even evident mistakes . . . have been scrupulously followed." Most of the entries are without interest except to the genealogist, and only a few have a slight historical value. One of the earliest notes the fact that the church held an "extraordinary" thanksgiving service on Wednesday, July 17, 1689, for the accession of William and Mary. The following marriage entry differs somewhat from the others, but will serve as an illustration of them all: "Mariage—Le 23 Aoust 1763 entre midi et une heure, jay marié par Licence dans la Maison de Mr. Paystre située dans la borée [Bowery], et tenue a louage par le Sieur Moore; Pierre l'oreillard et Catherine Moore; en presence des familles l'aureillard et Moore, de mr. de Paystre et sa Soeur, Made. dilo, et Madlle. fanchon Moyon. enregistré par moy Pasteur Soussigné, ce 12e 9bre 1763. Jean Carle Pasteur." Following this is a similar entry of the marriage of "Jean l'Aureillard et Anne Moore," at the same place and time. The baptismal records all follow the same general form, the names of parents and sponsors being given. In one instance, at the baptism of a child born "hors le mariage," there is added, "Fils, autant qu'on l'a pû decouvrir de," etc. A child of two unmarried slaves in 1760 is presented by the mistress of the mother, the godparents being baptized slaves. About the same time, the minister, having entered a child as illegitimate, notes, "Naturel selon l'Evangile," because the mother had another husband living in Europe, but "legitime selon les lois de ce Pais, parcequ'il n'ont eu aucune Nouvelle du Mari de Marguerite Sando, depuis plus d'année que la loy de ce Pais ne demande pour permettre le Mariage a ds gens ds ce Cas ce que je déclare P. servir comme de Besoin sera." There are also several interesting entries of abjuration of the Roman Catholic faith. At the end of the volume are given some historical documents relating to the French Protestants of New York during the period covered by the registers, the most of which have been printed before.

The value of such a work as this depends largely on the character of its index, and here, we regret to say, we find it wanting. There is no index whatever of the names of persons and places mentioned in the introduction and historical documents, nor of the names of places in the records. The names of some persons given in the records are omitted entirely, while few are referred to in every instance in which they appear. It is difficult, also, to find some names, as they are entered under an orthography entirely different from that which may be in the entry; for instance, Fiton1 is to be found only under Guiton, while the Lorillards are all entered under Leaureillard, a spelling which does not appear anywhere in the records as printed. In every case of marked varied spellings, cross-references should have been given from the less to the better known. With this exception, we have only praise for the manner in which this initial volume of what we trust will be a long and valuable series of publications has been issued, both as regards the pains taking labors of its editor and the beauty of its typography and general appearance. Though its importance to the historical student will be comparatively slight, to the genealogist it will prove a mine of great value, containing as it does the records of families closely connected with the annals, not only of this city, but of the nation.

Chronicle of the Coach. Charing Cross to Ilfracombe. By John Denison Champlin, Jr. Illustrated by Edward L. Chichester. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1886.

THERE is no pleasanter "outing" than a long coach-drive in England; and the narrator of this particular excursion was happy both in his party and in his route. The names of his companions are disclosed pseudonymously, if one may say so, for the disguise of the false name is easily penetrated in the case of those members who may be considered public men; but it would be unfair to withdraw the veil further than the author has chosen to do. There can be no objection, however, to saying that the "Mæcenas" of the party, who is engaged in sowing American sedition along the roadside with so much cheerfulness and in so humorous a way, is Mr. Andrew Carnegie, for whom one gets to have some warmth of regard as he is represented on this journey; and the rest of the company, which includes both sexes, are, whether distinguished or undistinguished, excellent acquaintances, though they are pale and shadowy creatures beside the genial and always triumphant democrat. The route lay due west from London to the sea, through Guildford, Winchester, Salisbury, Old Sarum, Stonehenge, Wilton, Sherborne, Axminster, Exeter, Dartmoor, Bideford and Clovelly. These names tell their own story, and apprise the reader of what he will find in the volume as a book of travel. The writer is stronger in the historical than in the descriptive portions; he renders a good account of his studies of the antiquities of the old cities and towns, and he relieves the dryness of these tourist facts with a goodly spice of the tourist banter, the slight incidents of travel which are nothing in themselves, but which light up a whole afternoon and make it eventful at the time, and he keeps the reader "on the go," as he would say, with the party without any pause. The account of the look of the country, on the other hand, is very meagre and general, perhaps because it is already made familiar to us by such able and glowing pens, and the author prefers to quote rather than compose. Once his selection, Cobbett's account of his return to his boyhood home at Guildford, is a true felicity. The narrative is very readable, and contains the story of a good time, independently of its cathedrals, plains, and inns, its Tors and moors of many prænomens, and its odor of literary reminiscence; and the illustrations are of the simple, sketchy kind which seem like artist's notes by the way, and they adorn and enliven the pages. The whole affords a happy instance of aggressive democracy abroad in a pleasant setting of English country and English friends.

The Mahogany Tree. By William Makepeace Thackeray. With illustrations by Frank T. Merrill. Boston: S. E. Cassino. Large 4to.

THIS Christmas song, reprinted from Punch, is given here complete, including a stanza which is generally omitted from the volumes of Thackeray's ballads and from collections of verse. There are, then, eight stanzas; and by dint of giving each stanza once in sober typography and again in fantastic letters mingled with figures and arabesques, and to each stanza still a third page of appropriate decoration for one suggestive line, with preliminary and final illustrations, and head and tail-pieces to preface, and the like, the artist and his publishers have made up a volume. The pictures are not very beautiful: there is a certain perfunctory look about them, as if neither the designer nor his public could get up much interest in the subject. This for the figure-pieces, where the punch-drinkers and smokers of long pipes are trying to be merry; as for the decorative adjuncts, they do not greatly adorn the book, and the drawings of natural scenery and details of plants and the like are peculiarly unsuccessful. But what a task is this that was set the artist! No man need be ashamed if his invention fails in a so long and so unaided effort. The poem is one which does not promise many separate motives of design.

Irish History for English Readers. By W. Stephenson Gregg. Harper & Bros. 1886.

THIS is an admirable handbook of Irish history, and would be an assistance, especially at present, to any person in considering the vexed politics of Ireland. The balance of the narrative is well preserved, 80 of the 207 pages composing the book being devoted to the period since the Union, really the most important of all to understand in its bearings upon present politics, and too often disposed of in a few pages. The blemishes are not such as to detract from its general usefulness. We miss from the "List of Authorities" some works without which no one should face the study of Irish history—such as Richey's 'Lectures' and Prendergast's 'Cromwellian Settlement'—although we trace their influence upon the narrative. No Irish scholar or antiquarian qualified for research has since Petrie's time refused his assent to the theory that the Round Towers are Christian erections. We do not think there is ground for the continuance of the assertion that Cromwell slaughtered every man, woman, and child in Drogheda and Wexford after their capture. We should like to know the name of the unhappy compositor who first mistook for a turned comma (') the "c" in the contraction of "Mc" for "Mac." Considerable confusion, if not family feuds, has ensued from that simple error. Either Mr. Gregg or his printer has gone a step further and altered the turned comma (') into an apostrophe ('). However, this is all beside the merits of the book. Mr. Gregg's is a valuable short history of Ireland, and a worthy addition to "Harper's Handy Series."

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Baker, J. John Westacott: A Novel. Harper's Franklin Square Library. 20 cents.
Canfield, C. W. The American Annual of Photography and Photographic Times Almanac for 1887. Scovill Manufacturing Co. $1.00.
Laurie, Prof. S. S. The Rise and Early Constitution of Universities. With a Survey of Mediæval Education. D. Appleton & Co.
Macray, Rev. W. D. The Pilgrimage to Parnassus, with two parts of the Return from Parnassus. Three Comedies Performed in St. John's College, Cambridge, MDCXCVII—MDCI. Macmillan & Co. $3.25.
Matthews, B. Ballads of Books. George J. Coombes.
Mayor, J. B. Chapters on English Metre. London. C. J. Clay & Sons. $1.00.
Nichols, J. M. Perry's Saints; or, the Fighting Parson's Regiment in the War of the Rebellion. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co. $1.25.
Prévost, L'Abbé. The Story of Manon Lescaut, and of the Chevalier des Grieux. From the edition of 1753. F. T. Jones & Co.
Shaw, G. B. Cashel Byron's Profession: A Novel. Harper's Handy Series. 25 cents.
Stephen, L. Dictionary of National Biography. Vol. IX. Canute—Chaloner. Macmillan & Co. $3.25.
Weildon, J. E. C. The Rhetoric of Aristotle. Translated. Macmillan & Co. $2.00.
Woods, M. A. A First School Poetry Book. Macmillan & Co. 75 cents.
Woodward, P. H. The Secret Service of the Post-office Department. Hartford, Conn.: Winter & Co.
Woolson, Constance Fenimore. Castle Nowhere: Lake Country Sketches. Harper & Brothers.
Woolson, Constance Fenimore. Rodman the Keeper: Southern Sketches. Harper & Brothers.

"The 'Young Folks' Cyclopædia' should be in every juvenile library."—From a Report of the Connecticut Board of Education.

YOUNG FOLKS' CYCLOPÆDIA of { Common Things.....$2.50 / Persons and Places... 2.50

 Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.

HENRY HOLT & CO., Publishers, New York.

THE TIFFANY GLASS COMPANY

333 & 335 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

STAINED AND MOSAIC GLASS

LOUIS C. TIFFANY, Pres't and Art Director — PRINGLE MITCHELL, Vice-Pres't and Manager
JOHN DUFAIS, Secretary — JOHN CHENEY PLATT, Treasurer

DIAMOND HAMS.

S. DAVIS, Jr.'s Brand, Cincinnati.

For forty-six years this brand has given satisfaction for the evenness and richness of its curing.

Obtain circulars "How to Cook the Diamond Hams." Sold by Park and Tilford, Acker, Merrall & Condit, Macy & Co., and A. T. Albro.

TAUCHNITZ & JOUAUST LIBRARIES

(ENGLISH AND FRENCH NOVELS AND CLASSICS).

Beautiful books, printed in clear type and handsomely bound, at low prices.

SEND STAMP FOR CATALOGUES TO

DUPRAT & CO., dealers in Rare and Modern Books, 5 East 17th Street, New York.

Advanced Course for French Students.

FRENCH EUROPEAN MAGAZINE, for school and family; 26 numbers a year, post-paid, for $1.10. Specimen number mailed to any address.

E. ROTH, 337 S. Broad St., Philadelphia.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, NEWS-DEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

To Librarians and Book-buyers.

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, AND IMPORTERS,

27 and 29 West 23d St., New York, and 27 King William St., Strand, London.

GIVE PROMPT AND PERSONAL ATTENTION TO orders for American or foreign books and periodicals of any description, whether for whole libraries or for single volumes. Importations for public institutions made free of duty. Periodicals and volumes of moderate compass can be mailed direct from their London office to the address of American customers. Information in regard to books and prices will be promptly given.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Lord Tennyson's New Book,

LOCKSLEY HALL:

SIXTY YEARS AFTER, &c.

By Alfred Lord Tennyson, P.L., D.C.L. Fcap., 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

"A work absolutely indispensable to every well-furnished library."—London Times.

The Ninth Volume Now Ready of

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY. Edited by Leslie Stephen. Vol. IX. Canute—Chaloner. 8vo, $3.25. Vols. 1-8, in cloth, $3.25 each, can also be had in half morocco, price, $6 each.

Among the more important lives in this volume may be mentioned Carlyle, by the Editor; Casaubon, by Canon Overton; Catherine of Arragon, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr, by James Gairdner; Caxton, by S. L. Lee; Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, by Rev. Dr. Jessopp; and Thomas Chalmers, by the Rev. Prof. Blaikie.

"As important and interesting to Americans as to Englishmen. . . . It is perfectly safe to predict, therefore, that this dictionary will find as ready acceptance here as in England. It is quite as necessary to an American as to an English library's completeness."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

LORD TENNYSON'S COLLECTED WORKS. Miniature Edition. The Poetical Works, 10 volumes in a box, $6. Ready. The Dramatic Works, 4 volumes, in a box, $3. Immediately.

"An exceedingly pretty edition of the Lauriate's poetical works, in ten volumes. The good taste which usually characterizes Messrs. Macmillan's publications is conspicuous in this new venture of theirs."—Athenæum.

Jubilee Edition of the Pickwick Papers.

THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF THE PICKWICK CLUB. By Charles Dickens. New edition. With Notes and numerous illustrations. Edited by Charles Dickens, the younger. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth, $5.

"It is just such a book as book-lovers delight in. Here, at least, is the ideal 'Pickwick.' . . . No edition could be more attractive, none more useful than this one."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

EARLY LETTERS OF CARLYLE. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. With Two Portraits. Crown 8vo, $2.25.

"Here in this volume is presented Carlyle in all his noble and heroic young manhood, eager to carry the message of purpose into life; fired with the zeal of uttering the true word to humanity; full of ideal dreams and noble conceptions. . . . It is the real Carlyle we see here, not the victim of transient circumstances and the ills that pass away, but the real spirit of the man, and it is a beneficent service that is thus performed to literature and to life."—Boston Traveller.

THE CHIEF PERIODS OF EUROPEAN HISTORY. Six Lectures read in the University of Oxford, 1885. With an Essay on Greek Cities under Roman Rule. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., Hon.D.C.L., Regius Professor of Modern History. 8vo, $2.50.

CONTENTS: Europe before the Roman Power.—Rome the Head of Europe.—Rome and the New Nations.—The Divided Empire.—The Survivals of Empire.—The World Romeless.—Greek Cities under Roman Rule.

A DEFENCE OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AGAINST Disestablishment. With an Introductory Letter to the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P. By Roundell, Earl of Selborne. 12mo, $2.25.

THE ODYSSEY OF HOMER. Books 1–12. Translated into English Verse by the Earl of Carnarvon. 12mo, $2.

"The translation, on the whole, is worthy to take rank with the late Lord Derby's 'Iliad.'"—G. D. A. Morshead in the Academy.

Price, 15 Cents. Annual Subscription, $1.75.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE.

NO. 40. - - - - JANUARY, 1887.

CONTENTS: News from the Front—Missing, from a Drawing by Herbert Gandy.—An Unknown Country. Part I. From Antrim to Cushendall. By the Author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman.' Illustrated.—Jacquetta. By the Author of 'John Herring.'—By the North Sea. By D. J. Robertson.—The Daughters of George the Third. By W. Outram Tristram. Illustrated.—Undine. By Julia Cartwright. Illustrated.—A Secret Inheritance. By B. L. Farjeon.

MACMILLAN & CO., 112 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1124. THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

Lord Tennyson's New Book,

LOCKSLEY HALL:

SIXTY YEARS AFTER, &c.

By ALFRED LORD TENNYSON, P.L., D.C.L. Fcap, 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

"There is not a page in which this volume has not upon it the stamp of the great poet, the man of the world, the representative of whatsoever is aristocratic in England. It is for this reason that Americans should study this volume. They may not accept its politics; they cannot but honor its sentiment, its high-mindedness, its poetic power, its beauties, and its touch with the realities of modern England. The volume is not likely to excite popular enthusiasm; yet it is the work of a great poet and a representative utterance of permanent importance."—Boston Beacon.

The Ninth Volume now ready of

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by Leslie Stephen. Vol. IX. Canute—Chaloner. 8vo, $3 25.

"Among the more important lives in this volume may be mentioned Carlyle, by the Editor; Casaubon, by Canon Overton; Catherine Arragon, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr, by James Gairdner; Caxton, by S. L. Lee; Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, by Rev. Dr. Jessopp; and Thomas Chalmers, by the Rev. Prof. Blaikie."

"A work absolutely indispensable to every well-furnished library."—London Times.

"As important and interesting to Americans as to Englishmen. . . . It is perfectly safe to predict, therefore, that this Dictionary will find as ready acceptance here as in England. It is quite as necessary to an American as to an English library's completeness."—N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

The Miniature Tennyson.

THE WORKS OF LORD TENNYSON. Miniature Edition. The Poetical Works, 10 volumes in a box, $6. The Dramatic Works, 4 volumes, in a box, $3.

"An exceedingly pretty edition of the Laureate's poetical works, in ten volumes. The good taste which usually characterizes Messrs. Macmillan's publications is conspicuous in this new venture of theirs."—Athenæum.

Jubilee Edition of the Pickwick Papers.

THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF THE PICKWICK CLUB. By Charles Dickens. New edition. With Notes and illustrations. Edited by Charles Dickens, the younger. 2 vols. Crown 8vo, cloth, $5.

"It is just such a book as book-lovers delight in. Here, at least, is the ideal 'Pickwick.' . . . No edition could be more attractive, none more useful than this one."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"The pictorial scheme is in excellent keeping with the typography on the one hand and the half-century-old atmosphere of the book on the other. Altogether the result is extremely satisfactory, and the new edition will doubtless give point to the English wanderings of many an American tourist hereafter."—Nation.

"It is pretty certain that every collector of Dickens will elect to add this to his library. . . . The edition should have a large sale . . . as a test of Baedeker to 'Pickwick' pilgrims. The notes are valuable."—Pall Mall Budget.

The Carlyle Letters.

EARLY LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. With Two Portraits. 12mo, $2.25.

"The whole effect is cheering, wholesome, and gratifying. . . . The reader scarcely needs further assurance of the peculiar and absorbing interest and importance of these Carlyle letters. They show the better side of their author and certainly for the period covered they show the true side of him."—New York Times.

"It is the real Carlyle we see here, not the victim of transient circumstances and the ills that pass away, but the real spirit of the man, and it is a beneficent service that is thus performed to literature and to life."—Boston Traveller.

Randolph Caldecott's last work.

JACK AND THE BEAN-STALK. In English Hexameters. By the Hon. Hallam Tennyson. With 40 illustrations by Randolph Caldecott. 4to, bds., $1.50.

"The drawings are each in the peculiar humor which Caldecott brought to the illustration of such stories. Mr. Tennyson's hexameters have a swing and force about them which make an excellent vehicle for this familiar story."—Guardian.

THE CHIEF PERIODS OF EUROPEAN HISTORY. Six Lectures read in the University of Oxford in 1885. With an Essay on Greek Cities under Roman Rule. By Edward A. Freeman, M.A., D.C.L., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History. 8vo, $2 50.

CONTENTS: Europe before [illegible] Roman Power.—Rome the Head of Europe.—Rome and the New Nat[illegible]e Divided Empire.—Survivals of Empire.—The World Romeless.—G[illegible]ies under Roman Rule.

A DEFENCE OF THE CH[illegible]H OF ENGLAND against Disestablishment. With an Int[illegible]y Letter by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P. By Roundell [illegible] of Selborne. 12mo, $2.25.

A HISTORY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1550. By H. C. Maxwell Lyte, M.A., F.S.A. 8vo, $5.

LESSONS OF THE CROSS AND PASSION. WORDS FROM THE CROSS.—The Reign of Sin.—The Lord's Prayer. Four Courses of Lent Lectures By C. J. Vaughan, D.D., Dean of Llandaff. New Edition. 12mo, $2.75.

NEW BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

ALICE'S ADVENTURES UNDERGROUND. Being a Facsimile of the Original MS. Book afterwards developed into Alice's 'Adventures in Wonderland.' By Lewis Carroll. With 37 Illustrations by the Author. 12mo, cloth gilt, $1.50.

THE LITTLE LAME PRINCE AND HIS TRAVELLING CLOAK. A Parable for Young and Old. By the Author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman.' With Illustrations. New Edition. 16mo, $1.25.

"Two Valuable Primers of Politics."—SCIENCE.

Elementary Politics.

By THOMAS RALEIGH, A.M.

16mo, paper, 25 cents.

"Mr. Raleigh's able volume should attract much attention and find numerous readers in this country. . . . As the author himself allows, his book will stimulate rather than satisfy inquiry; and for just that reason it is capable of becoming, in the hands of a competent teacher of civics or politics, an invaluable text-book. . . . We must unreservedly commend the book as a clear, strong, and healthy primer of politics, and heartily wish that it could be studied and appreciated in every high school and by every citizen of the United States."—Science.

"Is a political primer which ought to be carefully studied by every man or woman who would enter understandingly into the multiform discussions of social problems which are peculiarly characteristic of our time."—Chicago Times.

"The book is calculated to arouse thought and discussion. The author starts out by giving a history of the origin of society. He then portrays the characteristic features of modern society, both political and social. The book merely pretends to be an elementary treatise, but it is as profound as it is elementary."—Christian Union.

Our National Institutions.

A Short Sketch for Schools.

By ANNA BUCKLAND. 18mo, 30 Cents.

"The careful reader will obtain from the book a very thorough knowledge of the workings of English governmental institutions; and it is just such a book as a teacher should use for a few weeks with a class that has completed the study of English history, in order to enable the pupils to follow and discuss intelligently current English politics."—Science.

Clarendon Press Series.

The Wealth of Households.

By J. T. DANSON. 12mo, $1.25.

"One of the most valuable of the large number of volumes which this recent widespread interest in economic questions has called forth is Danson's 'Wealth of Households.'"—Boston Evening Traveler.

"One might go on quoting to the end of the work and still find something tersely and vigorously stated to transcribe, and there is no aspect of the current labor problem which is not handled, and the handling based upon inexorable laws of our nature. It is a book written primarily for the conditions of labor in England, but the principles upon which it is based are as wide as civilization in their application, and it may be as profitably studied in this country."—Chicago Times.

"The various topics discussed are viewed from the standpoint of reason and common sense, and are specially commended to the attention of capitalists and laborers. The amount of good that such a book as this can do is immeasurable. We sincerely hope it will gain the wide reading it deserves."—New York Observer.

MACMILLAN & CO., 112 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 23

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 26

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Sugar Bounties and Socialism 28
A Shameful Business 28
Decline of the Mormon Theocracy 29
A Doubtful Remedy 29

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
The First Madame Guizot 30

CORRESPONDENCE:
Discrimination against Silver 31
Greenbacks and Silver 31
The Real Railroad Evil 32
Legislation for the Working Classes 32
How to Control Immigration 32
The People Not Hostile to Civil-Service Reform 33
Domestic Service 33
Literary Morality 33
History and the Group System 33

NOTES 34

REVIEWS:
Seeley's Napoleon 37
Carlyle's Early Letters 37
Bancroft's Conquest of California 39
A Muramasa Blade 40
Memoirs of the Rev. J. Lewis Diman, D.D. 40
The Book Fancier 41

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 41

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.

Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

	Scale of Agate lines.
On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.
A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27.	5
A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.
Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top.	10
Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding.	15

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gillig & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CALIFORNIA, San Diego, Pierce Place.

THE SOUTHWEST INSTITUTE.—Health and Education for Girls and Boys in the finest climate in the world. Girls received into the family.
For circulars address MRS. E. C. DERBY.
Refers by direct permission to Rt. Rev. Wm. I. Kip, D.D., Bishop of California; General Geo. Stoneman, Governor of California; General W. T. Sherman, General George Crook, U. S. A.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE.—A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls.
MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887.
Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

*PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI*tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School.
ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY-HALL SCHOOL (50th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the Institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

*HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT AD*mits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

*ADAMS ACADEMY.—PREPARA*tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886.
For all information address
WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

*GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE*paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

*HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI*tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course.
HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal,
Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

MASSACHUSETTS, Worcester.

QREAD INSTITUTE (FOR YOUNG Ladies), established in 1848. Second half of present school year will begin 26th Jan., 1887.

NEW HAMPSHIRE, Portsmouth.

MISS A. C. MORGAN'S SCHOOL FOR Young Ladies. Second term begins Feb. 1, 1887. J. G. Whittier says a better, healthier, and pleasanter location for a school could scarcely be found in New England."

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address
REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys.
WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. C. M. WILKINSON'S HOME School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Refers to Miss Louisa M. Alcott, Hon. John Lowell, Geo. Wm. Curtis, Esq.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill.
WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies.
Students prepared for College.
ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

Teachers.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

*JOHN W. DALZELL, PRIVATE TU*tor, 15 Appian Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

School Agencies.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free.
E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

Wants.

*WANTED.—POSITION ON NEWS*paper or periodical as book reviewer or literary editor. Address
CRITIC, 85 Prospect Street, Cambridgeport, Mass

TO PUBLISHERS AND AUTHORS.— The undersigned, having lately read several books published by prominent houses, and found them very incorrectly printed, offers his services in detecting errors overlooked by the printer. Has had a long experience as proof-reader and press corrector. Would also revise Authors' MSS., and prepare them for the printer. For terms and particulars, address READER, care Nation.

A NET SIX PER CT. INCOME

FROM DEBENTURES OF THE
FIDELITY LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY,
STORM LAKE, IOWA. CASH CAPITAL, $150,000.

The New York Tribune of Oct. 20, 1886, in its financial article, says: "The 6 per cent. debenture bonds of the Fidelity Loan and Trust Company of Storm Lake, Iowa, are secured by deposit with the Metropolitan Trust Company of New York of mortgages on improved property in the West—principally in Iowa. The Fidelity Company is endorsed by some of the best-known bankers in this city."

A superior investment for Savings and Trust Funds, where safety is the first consideration. Address
WILLIAM G. CLAPP, Treasurer,
7 Nassau Street, New York.

INVEST THROUGH THE SOUND AND RELIABLE
Western Farm Mortgage Co.

F. M. PERKINS, President. LAWRENCE, KAN. L. H. PERKINS, Secretary.
PAID UP CAPITAL, $250,000.00.
The choicest 1st Mortgage Farm Loans, also the Company's Ten Years Debentures based upon its paid up Capital and Assets of over $650,000. No Losses. Eleven Years Experience with absolute satisfaction to over 1,500 Investors. Send for circulars, forms, and full information; Branch Offices in N. Y. City and Albany; N. Y. Office, 137 Broadway. C. C. HINE & SON, Agents.

4 to 8% INVESTMENTS Municipal BONDS
And other Securities. Call or send for Lists.
S. A. KEAN & CO., BANKERS,
UNITED BANK BUILDING,
Broadway and Wall Street, New York.
MAIN OFFICE: CHICAGO.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.
Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars.
Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

7 2/3% CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures. Capital $600,000. Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets.
AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

F. W. CHRISTERN,
39 West Twenty-third Street, New York,
Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

SALE OF AN OLD VIRGINIA HOME AND PLANTATION of About 3,600 Acres of Land, by Order of the Circuit Court

OF

ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

The plantation is divided into eleven farms, ten of which contain from 150 to 250 acres each of cleared land with suitable woodland attached. On each are four (4) buildings, namely, a cottage-home of four (4) rooms, a kitchen, a meat-house; and one containing corn-house, barn, and stable. Each is divided into six (6) fields, well fenced, and with one or two exceptions all the fields of all the farms are watered by living streams. The old homestead farm of about 800 acres contains all necessary outbuildings, such as barns, stables, corn-houses, etc., quarters for laborers, bath house and dairy, a four-roomed office, and the old mansion rebuilt and added to since the war—the last two in a lawn of 8 acres. The garden of four (4) acres falls in terraces from the house to a brook that runs through a dell at the foot of a hill which is about 40 feet high, filled with shrubbery, wide, grassy roads and walks, and is altogether a fairy spot. The old mansion has a cellar under the whole, contains 8 rooms and wide halls, with closets, dressing-rooms, etc.

The lands are in the famous County of Albemarle, in the grape growing district, of which the Monticello Wine Cellars are the centre, and are specially adapted to the culture of the other fruits, including the celebrated Albemarle pippin, and to corn, wheat, oats, tobacco, and especially to grasses. They are in the midst of a refined society, with church and school facilities, 16 miles from Charlottesville and the University of Virginia, 3 miles from Gordonsville, with a station and post-office of Chesapeake and Ohio R.R. on the plantation, 2 miles from the homestead. At this station are two residences and a country store-house (belonging to the estate), the latter of long standing and established business. These lands present a rare opportunity for investment to a capitalist desiring a delightful country home with large possessions, or to a company of settlers to divide among themselves. The railroad runs for 2¼ miles through the place.

In addition to all this, these lands lie at the base of the Southwest Range of mountains, a part of the plantation running up on Peter's Mountain, the highest peak of the range, the climate being as healthy as any in the world. Besides these advantages, there is, for 2½ miles through the plantation, a vein of hematite iron ore, accompanied by one of limestone, vertically projected, 80 ft. wide, and running parallel to the iron vein at a distance of about 200 yds. A great bargain can be had in these lands. For further particulars, apply to JOHN M. PATTON, Commissioner of Circuit Court of Albemarle County, at Ashland, Hanover County, Virginia.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical, costing less than one cent a cup. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

JUST READY.

THE

Separate System of Sewerage:

ITS THEORY AND CONSTRUCTION.

BY

CADY STALEY

AND

GEO. S. PIERSON, C.E.

8vo, cloth, with numerous illustrations and tables. Price, $2.50.

D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,

23 Murray St. and 27 Warren St., New York.

 Copies sent by mail on receipt of price.*

French, German, Spanish, Italian.

You can, by ten weeks' study, master either of these languages sufficiently for every-day and business conversation, by Dr. RICH. S. ROSENTHAL'S celebrated MEISTERSCHAFT SYSTEM. Terms, $5.00 for books of each language, with privilege of answers to all questions, and correction of exercises. Sample copy, Part I., 25 cents. Liberal terms to Teachers.

MEISTERSCHAFT PUBLISHING CO.,

Herald Building, Boston, Mass.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANguages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

Standard Educational Publications.

MENTAL SCIENCE.

THE SCIENCE OF MIND. By John Bascom, President of the University of Michigan. 8vo, $2.

"A clear and strong presentation of the intuitional philosophy."—Christian Intelligencer.

ÆSTHETICS, or, The Science of Beauty. By the author of 'Science of Mind.' New edition, revised and enlarged. 8vo, $1.50.

"Clearly written; . . . interesting and instructive."—Utica Gazette.

ETHICS; or, The Science of Duty. By the author of 'Science of Mind.' 8vo, $2.

"An excellent manual of morals. Attractively written, and very judicious as an exposition of practical duty."—Popular Science Monthly.

THE SCIENCE OF ÆSTHETICS; or, The Nature, Kinds, Laws, and Uses of Beauty. By Prof. Henry Day. Second edition. 12mo, $2.

THE SCIENCE OF ETHICS. An Elementary System of Theoretical and Practical Morality. By the author of 'The Science of Æsthetics.' 12mo, $1.50.

"Admirably adapted to beginners in metaphysical study."—Evening Mail.

THE ELEMENTS OF PSYCHOLOGY. By the author of 'The Science of Ethics.' 12mo, $1.50.

"A work that is clear and impressive both in style and matter, and one that will tend greatly to the elevation of the study of mind."—Chicago Times.

NATURAL THEOLOGY; or, Nature and the Bible from the Same Author. Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute, Boston. By P. A. Chadbourne, late President of Williams College. 12mo, $1.50.

"In diction, method, and spirit, the volume is attractive and distinctive to a rare degree."—Boston Traveller.

ECONOMIC SCIENCE.

ECONOMICS; or, The Science of Wealth. A Treatise on Political Economy, for the use of High Schools and Colleges, and for the general reader. 8vo, cloth, $1.75.

"As a text-book of political economy, we think it will take precedence of all others."—Troy Whig.

LECTURES ON THE HISTORY OF Protection in the United States. By Prof. W. G. Sumner of Yale College. 8vo, cloth extra, 75 cts.

"There is nothing in the literature of free trade more forcible and effective than this little book."—N. Y. Evening Post.

AN ALPHABET IN FINANCE. By Graham McAdam. With Introduction by R. R. Bowker. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"It is the kind of book that should be heartily welcomed, as it presents facts and unfailing laws relating to the principles of money, without dictating harsh means to carry out personal views."—Pittsburgh Commercial.

SOCIAL ECONOMY. Revised and edited for American Students. By Prof. James E. Thorold Rogers, of the University of Oxford. 16mo, cloth, 75 cts.

"We cannot too highly commend this work for teachers, students, and the general public."

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

NEW YORK.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s

NEW BOOKS.

Ready Saturday, 15th:

The Emancipation of Massachusetts.

By Brooks Adams. 1 vol, crown 8vo, $1.50.

CONTENTS—The Migration: The Antinomians; The Cambridge Platform; The Anabaptists; The Quakers; The Scire-Facias; The Witchcraft; Brattle Church; Harvard College; The Lawyers; The Revolution.

Mr. Brooks Adams is convinced that certain important objects of the early settlers of Massachusetts have been hitherto very inadequately stated. In this book he attempts to point out these and to show the steps and agencies by which Massachusetts was emancipated from the ecclesiastical and political narrowness, bigotry, and intolerance, which he claims dominated the colony down to the Revolution. His book is vigorously written and challenges careful study.

The Golden Justice.

A Novel. By William Henry Bishop, author of 'The House of a Merchant Prince,' 'Detmold,' etc. 1 vol. 16mo, $1.25.

This is unquestionably the most striking novel Mr. Bishop has yet written. While appearing serially in the Atlantic Monthly it attracted marked attention by its plot (which has been pronounced worthy of Hawthorne), its dramatic incidents, its fine discrimination of character, and its excellent narrative style.

The Heart of the Weed.

A Volume of Poems. 16mo, parchment paper, $1.00.

"Let no one whose ears are not deaf to the charms of sweet singing pass by without listening for a moment to the simple but alluring melodies of the 'Heart of the Weed.'"—Boston Transcript.

Shakespeare's Insomnia,

And the Causes Thereof. By Franklin H. Head. 1 vol., 16mo, parchment paper cover, 75 cents.

"A clever little brochure, in which the writer quotes copiously from Shakespeare's works to prove that he was a victim of insomnia, and then undertakes to account for it by showing that at the times when these particular plays were written the author was harassed by importunate creditors and heartless attorneys who were trying to make him pay debts which it was beyond his power to pay. Specially interesting to lovers of Shakespearian bibliography."—Chicago Journal.

 For sale by all booksellers. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price by the publishers.*

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,

BOSTON;

11 East 17th St., New York.

MANON LESCAUT

From the French of ABBÉ PRÉVOST.

A new translation by

ARTHUR W. GUNDRY.

Over 300 photogravures, wood, and process illustrations, by MAURICE LELOIR, and others. Small 4to (in box), cloth, $3.00.

It has all the beauties of illustration of the $20.00 French édition de luxe, and the translation far excels any other. It loses none of the esprit, piquancy, sprightliness, and vivacity of the original.

F. T. JONES & CO., Publishers,

9 Washington Place, New York.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, NEWSDEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

STANDARD EDUCATIONAL PUBLICATIONS.

FRENCH CLASSICS FOR STUDENTS.

I. TABLEAUX DE LA REVOLUTION Française. Edited, with Explanatory and Critical Notes, by Profs. T. F. Crane and S. J. Brun of Cornell Univ., with Introduction by Pres. A. D. White. 400 pp., 16mo, cloth, $1.50.

"Admirably adapted for its purpose."—Prof. Bingham, Davidson College.

"I like the plan and execution of the book, and am using it in my classes."—Prof. Montague, Amherst.

"An admirable book."—N. Y. Nation.

II. LE ROMANTISME FRANCAIS. A Selection from Writers of the French Romantic School, 1824-1848. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Prof. T. F. Crane of Cornell University. 16mo, 412 pp., $1.50. Just ready.

GERMAN CLASSICS FOR STUDENTS.

Carefully printed and handsomely bound volumes, presenting not only a set of standard text-books for the student of German, but an attractive collection for the Library of the masterpieces of German literature. Each volume contains an introduction, a running commentary, and critical and philological notes.

GOETHE'S Hermann und Dorothea. Edited by Hart..$1.00
SCHILLER'S Die Piccolomini. " " " .. 1.00
GOETHE'S Faust. First part. " " " .. 1.00
GOETHE'S Ausgewählte Prosa. " " " .. 1.00
SCHILLER'S Ausgewählte Briefe. Ed. by Buchheim. 1.00
LESSING'S Ausgewählte Prosa. Ed. by White..(In press.)

"The only properly edited German texts yet issued for the use of students."—Prof. Willard Fiske, Cornell.

"Prof. Hart's editions meet with unqualified approval."—Prof. C. A. Eggert, Iowa City.

*A GRAMMAR OF THE GERMAN LANG*uage for High Schools and Colleges, designed for Beginners and for Advanced Students. By Prof. H. C. G. Brandt of Hamilton College. 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

"The most scientific grammar of German now before the American or English public."—Prof. A. S. Cook, Univ. of California.

"The only book of its kind, within my knowledge, which is abreast of the latest philological research."—Prof. H. H. Boyesen, Columbia Coll.

"Ranks with the best works yet written."—Prof. Kennedy, Brooklyn Polytechnic.

*THE STUDENTS' MANUAL OF EXER*cises for Translating into German, with Vocabulary, Explanatory Notes, and General Suggestions for Teachers. Compiled by Prof. A. Lodeman, and arranged to accompany Brandt's Grammar. 16mo, cloth, 50 cents.

"Excellent in every particular and exceedingly practical. I have introduced it in my classes."—Prof. Atwood, Bowdoin Coll.

*A READER OF GERMAN LITERA*ture for the use of High-School and College Classes. Edited, with comprehensive Notes (75 pp.), by Prof. W. H. Rosenstengel of the Univ. of Wisconsin. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

"By far the best work of the kind I have seen."—Prof. W. T. Harris.

"An admirable selection of real masterpieces."—Prof. H. H. Boyesen.

"Fills a want I have long felt."—Prof. W. H. Appleton, Swarthmore.

MATERIALS FOR GERMAN PROSE Composition; or, Selections from Modern English Writers. With Grammatical Notes and Grammatical Index. By Prof. C. A. Buchheim. 16mo, 263 pp., $1.25.

"An exceptionally valuable volume for advanced students."—Prof. Johnson, Bowdoin Coll.

POESIE FÜR HAUS UND SCHULE. A Collection of Standard German Poetry, selected and arranged, for use in schools and the home circle, by Prof. L. R. Klemm. 16mo, cloth extra, $1.25.

"One of the best collections of German poems we have seen. A model of dainty typography."—Journal of Education.

"An admirable collection."—Churchman.

Descriptive prospectus of the above works sent on application. Specimen copies will be forwarded by mail, paid, to teachers for examination on receipt of half the published prices, and if the work is introduced, or the copy submitted is returned, the amount paid will be refunded. Liberal terms for first introduction.

LITERATURE.

AMERICAN LITERATURE, 1607-1885. By Charles F. Richardson, Professor of English Literature in Dartmouth College. Part 1 (complete in itself). The Development of American Thought. Octavo, cloth, extra, $3.00.

"A book that is a credit to the writer and to the nation, and which has a grand future."—Hartford Post.

*PROSE MASTERPIECES FROM MO*dern Essayists. Comprising single specimen essays from Irving, Leigh Hunt, Lamb, De Quincey, Landor, Sidney Smith, Thackeray, Emerson, Arnold, Morley, Helps, Kingsley, Ruskin, Lowell, Carlyle, Macaulay, Froude, Freeman, Gladstone, Newman, Leslie Stephen. 3 vols., 16mo, bevelled boards, gilt top, in box, $3.75.

"A most admirable collection, which presents not only specimens of the best English style, but the methods of thought and characteristic modes of expression of the several writers."—Magazine of American History.

REPRESENTATIVE ESSAYS. Being selections from 'Prose Masterpieces from the Modern Essayists,' comprising papers by Irving, Lamb, De Quincey, Emerson, Arnold, Morley, Lowell, Carlyle, Macaulay, Froude, and Gladstone. Octavo, half bound leather, cloth sides, 395 pp., $2.

"In no other such small space can be found the masterpieces of modern essayists."—Hartford Post.

HUMOROUS MASTERPIECES FROM American Literature. Edited by Edward T. Mason. Three volumes, printed uniform with 'Prose Masterpieces from Modern Essayists.' The editor covers with his selections American literature from the times of the first writings of Washington Irving to the present day.

3 vols., 16mo, cloth neat, $3.75.

"Real masterpieces . . . selected with admirable skill and taste."—Newark Advertiser.

*THE HISTORY OF FRENCH LITERA*ture. By Henri Van Laun. 3 vols. in one. 8vo, beautifully printed and bound in extra cloth, $3.50.

"Full of keenest interest for every person who knows or wishes to learn anything of French literature or of French literary history and biography."—N. Y. Evening Post.

*A READING BOOK of ENGLISH CLAS*sics. Edited, for use in schools, by the Rev. C. W. Leffingwell, D.D. 12mo, $1.50.

"For beauty, utility, diversity, and general excellence, we prefer it to any other."—J. B. Southworth, Vermont Conference Seminary.

POETRY FOR HOME AND SCHOOL. A collection of short pieces selected from the best standard English and American authors. Edited by Anna C. Brackett and Ida M. Eliot. Square 16mo, cloth extra, $1.25.

"An idea carried out with discrimination and intelligence."—Nation.

"No more charming and refining collection of poetry can be put into the hands of children."—New Bedford Mercury.

THE SCRIPTURES—HEBREW AND Christian. Vol. I (complete in itself). The Hebrew Story from the Creation to the Exile. Large 12mo, cloth extra, red edges, $1.50. Vols. II and III in preparation.

"Admirably conceived and admirably executed. It is the Bible story in Bible words, with just such omissions and insertions as to make consecutive and understood the entire narrative. It is the work of devout and scholarly men, and will prove a help to Bible study."—Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D.

HISTORY.

AMERICAN ORATIONS; from the Colonial Period to the Present Time. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Alexander Johnston, of the College of New Jersey. 3 vols., 16mo. Uniform with 'Prose Masterpieces.' $3.75.

"The idea, the plan, and the execution of the work are admirable, and we highly approve of it."—Boston Advertiser.

BRITISH ORATIONS. A selection of the more important and representative Political Addresses of the past two centuries. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Charles K. Adams, President of Cornell University. 3 vols., 16mo. Uniform with 'American Orations.' $3.75.

"Representative orations which illustrate the whole course of history."—Portland Transcript.

THE STORY OF THE NATIONS. A series of historical studies, intended to present in a graphic manner the stories of the different nations that have attained prominence in history. In the story form the current of each national life is distinctly indicated, and its picturesque and noteworthy periods and episodes are presented for the reader in their philosophical relations to each other as well as to universal history. The "Stories" are printed in good readable type, and in handsome 12mo form. They are adequately illustrated, and furnished with maps and indexes. They are sold separately at a price of $1.50 each. The following are now ready: CHALDEA, by Ragozin; ASSYRIA, by Ragozin; GREECE, by Harrison; ROME, by Gilman; CARTHAGE, by Church; THE JEWS, by Hosmer; GERMANY, by Baring-Gould; NORWAY, by Boyesen; HUNGARY, by Vámbery; SARACENS, by Gilman; MOORS IN SPAIN, by Lane-Poole; SPAIN, by E. E. and Susan Hale; THE NORMANS, by Jewett. Nearly ready: ALEXANDER'S EMPIRE, by Mahaffy; EARLY EGYPT, by Rawlinson; PERSIA, by Benjamin.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, 27 and 29 West 23d Street, New York.

Liberal terms to teachers and classes. Full classified catalogue, 130 pp., sent on receipt of stamp. Educational lists on application.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1887.

The Week.

THE debate on the Inter-State Commerce Bill on Monday was important and valuable. The speech of Senator Stanford of California was a very clear and useful statement of facts relating to the long-haul and short-haul clause. Mr. Stanford is undoubtedly an interested party, being a large owner of railroad property, but that fact takes nothing from the force of his argument. He maintains that the clause in question will lessen the forces of competition and thus prove detrimental to the public interests. We have not the smallest doubt that this will be its effect. That which causes the long haul to get the lower rate, and sometimes a lower aggregate charge, than the short haul is competition solely. Nobody complained that the Union and Central Pacific Companies did not charge enough for through business so long as they had the only line of rails to the Pacific. It was only when other lines were built, and their monopoly was broken, that there was any occasion for complaint on the part of intermediate stations. Mr. Stanford says truly that the adoption of the clause in question will not level down the short-haul charges, since, if the railroads are to make a living at all, they must charge to non-competing points what the law takes away from them by loss of business at competing points. The resolutions passed by the New York Chamber of Commerce a few days ago embody the soundest business reasons for postponing the enactment of this clause, until a report can be had from the proposed national railroad commission after a suitable investigation, for it must be remembered that this Inter-State Commerce Bill deals with terra incognita. We have had investigations and reports in plenty from State railroad commissions, but never anything but private and ex-parte investigations in the wider field of national railway transportation.

The steel-rail monopolists, having been enabled, by virtue of a duty of $17 per ton on foreign rails, to advance the price to about the cost of English rails, plus duty, freight, insurance, and commissions, have now fallen foul of the railroads for charging too much for carrying their precious products to market. One of the consequences of the great advance in price that has taken place within a year has been to start up the works of a Colorado concern at Pueblo, which had been for some time closed, The Colorado concern began to compete vigorously with the three mills in and near Chicago for the supply of the "home market." Then the Chicago concerns, through Mr. H. H. Porter, an ex-railroad official of great experience, made a request that the Colorado pool railroads should reduce the freight rates so that they might compete on better terms with the Pueblo rolling mill. It was charged that the rate from Chicago to Colorado points, $16.40 per ton, was excessive. The whole freight charge from Chicago to Colorado, it will be noticed, is sixty cents per ton less than the "protection" on steel rails.

The controversy has latterly taken on new phases, partly ethical, partly political. Mr. Porter, finding himself unable to alter the rates of the Colorado pool, appealed to President Adams of the Union Pacific. Mr. Adams replied that "if the President of a railroad corporation were to undertake, in each matter which may arise, to lay down his views without regard to the views or action of his associates or the heads of the commercial department, the business of his road would soon be in a condition which may properly be described as chaotic," and that he had accordingly referred the matter to the general traffic manager of the Union Pacific Railway. To this Mr. Porter replied, first by a judicious reference to his past services to the Union Pacific Company in the way of explaining matters to Senators and Representatives in Congress, "to help your company to accomplish what they wanted, when injury, as they thought, was being done to them in Washington." As though Mr. Adams were a dull person, or hard of hearing, Mr. Porter added that "great stress has been lately laid on your position before the public." He insisted, in conclusion, that Mr. Adams should say what he personally considered to be the duty of the Union Pacific Railroad in the premises, and not refer his (Porter's) communication to any one else. The advantage of getting an opinion on abstract principles of justice from the president of the company, to be used first in bearing down upon the traffic manager and then upon the other companies in the Colorado pool, is obvious at a glance. Not getting this, Mr. Porter announced his purpose "to thoroughly contest this position of the Union Pacific Railroad to large shippers, and do it through the general Government at Washington." So we expect to learn very soon of Mr. Porter's arrival at Washington in the interest of large shippers, which of course requires a combat on his part with the anti-discrimination clauses in the Inter-State Commerce Bill. But perhaps he will give more of his time toward defeating the Pacific Railroad Funding Bill.

We called attention a short time ago to Consul Mathews's "collecting agency" in Tangier, by means of which his "protégés," a lot of vagabonds who hang around the consulate claiming to be naturalized American citizens, obtained many peculiar privileges, and are, by Mathews's own admission, the instruments of frightful oppression. We are glad to learn that the Department of State has issued orders which will put a stop to many of these practices, and, what is more to our point at present, exclude from all consular protection those residents of the East who drive a thriving trade as American citizens, unless they produce their naturalization papers or other evidence equally as convincing, and are entered upon the Consul's register. This is just as it should be. The wonder is that the precaution has not long since been taken. The problem heretofore presented for our solution has been touching aliens on our shores. Now we are, on account of our growth, called upon to deal with the two questions, What are the rights of our citizens domiciled abroad, and what evidence shall be required to prove the fact of American citizenship and its non-abandonment? The Department of State demands, as we have said, strong proof, where the circumstances are suspicious, of naturalization, and it may be that in some instances it would now hold that a naturalized citizen, who had entered upon a business career of a seemingly permanent character in the land of his birth, should not be allowed to claim the privileges of an American citizen.

Last June the National Congress of Mexico enacted a law, which has lately been promulgated, declaring that all foreigners who may have acquired real estate or had children born to them within the republic, would be considered Mexican citizens, unless, within three months from the publication of the law, they officially made known their intention to retain their own nationality. Immediately after the publication of this law, our Minister to Mexico endeavored to secure compliance with its requirements by all Americans residing in that country, and called upon all of our consular officers stationed there to aid him. But it has been learned that many of our citizens, notwithstanding these active precautions, have omitted to conform to the provisions of the law, and they are now alarmed lest, in consequence of this negligence, they have become Mexican citizens. Fearing that this would happen in some cases, our Minister was instructed to protest against the enforcement of the law so far as our citizens were concerned. This he did about a month ago, claiming as the ground of his protest the rule always adhered to by the United States, "that the loss of citizenship cannot be imposed as a penalty, nor a new national status forced as a favor, by one Government upon a citizen of another." The Secretary of Foreign Relations, to whom this was addressed, refused to discuss the validity of the law in the absence of an actual case arising under it. Thereupon he was requested to have the time extended for compliance with the law, upon which request no action has yet been taken.

The maxim De minimis non curat lex does not apply to the United States tariff. It appears, on the contrary, from an answer sent by the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a House resolution, that the smallest things are those that require the most care. The resolution called for information in regard to the construction given by the Department to the clause of the tariff which admits free of duty "fish fresh for immediate consumption." This might seem to be a question easily answered. Far from it. In the first place the same law which put fresh fish on the free list contained a clause taxing "all foreign-caught fish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half-barrels, whether fresh, smoked, dried, salted, or pickled, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, fifty cents per hundred pounds." This contrariety in the act was got over because "fish fresh for immediate consumption" was specially enumerated and provided for, being made free of duty. Fish might be imported in a fresh state for manure, in which case it would be taxed at the rate of fifty cents per hundred pounds, although it is not probable that Congress had fish manure in contemplation when the bill was passed. It is more likely that the Congressman or clerk who drew the bill took an old bill for the foundation of his work, and made the new one by clipping and adding, forgetting, however, to erase the word "fresh" in the clause taxing fish fifty cents per one hundred pounds, after it had been decided to put fresh fish on the free list.

The real difficulties in construing the fish clause are of a more serious nature. What is fresh fish? What is immediate consumption? It was contended on the part of our gallant fishermen that frozen fish were not "fresh" within the meaning of the law, or that even if fish caught in the winter and frozen by the cold weather could be considered fresh, the same classification would not apply to fish frozen by artificial means. The Treasury Department held that freshness must be construed in this case as the opposite of the words in the context, namely, "smoked, dried, salted, or pickled." Since frozen fish is none of these things, and since it possesses no quality opposed to freshness, it was ruled that it must come in free of duty. But what is immediate consumption? Looking to precedents for aid in answering this conundrum, it was found that in a former law the words used were "daily consumption" instead of immediate consumption. Under this phraseology a ruling had been made twenty years ago that it meant consumption "within a short time." But how was a collector of customs to know, when a man bought a frozen fish, whether he meant to eat it within a short time or not? Who could follow him to his kitchen and verify his intentions by his acts? This was a puzzling situation. It led to a decision by the Department, however, that the free list applied to fish imported for consumption in the fresh state, but did not include fish imported fresh, but afterwards smoked, dried, salted or pickled for future use. An interesting recital is given of the contentions that have arisen over the words "immediate consumption"; and the law being in this unsatisfactory state, why, one may ask, is it not changed so as to meet the intentions of Congress, supposing that Congress knows what its intentions are? The answer is two-fold: First, Congress is hardened to the ambiguities of the tariff, as Pharaoh was hardened to the warnings of Moses. Second, it does not dare to open one section of the tariff for amendment, lest 325 members spring to their feet with amendments to other sections. It is like the colored preacher who, when asked whether the fruit of the forbidden tree was an apple or something else, replied: "Hold on dar; now yer attacking de whole basis ob modern theology."

Matthew S. Quay has been nominated almost unanimously for United States Senator by the Republican members of the Pennsylvania Legislature in caucus assembled. He received 153 votes to 9 for Galusha A. Grow. This fulfils all expectations, for there has been practically no doubt of Quay's success. He elected the Legislature, carefully picking out as candidates men who would do his bidding. The large vote in his favor shows what a powerful boss he is, and how completely he holds the Republican party of Pennsylvania in his grasp. That he has any fitness for the office of Senator nobody seriously claims. But he may have as much as or even more than Don Cameron. He is a boss pure and simple, with those elements of force which are possessed by all successful bosses. It is customary now for the Republican press of Pennsylvania to endeavor to surround him with something of dignity by speaking of him as Matthew Stanley Quay, instead of the familiar "Matt," by which he is always called in private life; but "Matt" he is and always will be. His election marks the lowest level yet reached in the protective-tariff Republicanism of Pennsylvania.

The election of an Independent Democrat as Speaker of the North Carolina House, by a combination of all the Republicans with the few Democratic members who were elected over the regular party nominees last November, is a noteworthy event. The successful candidate announced that he is a Randall Democrat in national politics, but opposed to the rule of the Democratic Machine in State affairs. As the upper branch of the Legislature has a clear Democratic majority over the combined Republican and Independent vote, it does not seem probable that any measures to which the Democratic party is opposed can become laws; but the willingness of a prominent Democrat to come out against his old associates must strengthen the revolt against the Machine. A Raleigh despatch says that the disappointed Democrats complain that "Cleveland is breaking down the color line," and there is no doubt that this is an important element in bringing about the changes in political relations which this event illustrates. However parties may be temporarily affected by this gradual disappearance of the race line, it is the most fortunate thing possible for the South, for nothing worse could be imagined than the permanent division of men in politics according to the color of their skins.

The organization of the Tennessee Legislature, like the election of Governor, illustrates the advent of a new political generation. The new Speaker of the House, like the new Governor, is a young man, each of them having been born in 1850. Both were mere boys during the war, and neither has any political associations which go back to the slavery era. What is still more important and significant, the elevation of such men by the dominant party in Tennessee shows that the people of the State are weary of the issues of the past, and that their attention is now fixed upon the future.

The message of Gov. Luce to the Michigan Legislature contains one paragraph which describes a state of things more appropriate to a half-civilized community than to a long-settled commonwealth. "We are reminded," he says, "by an almost every-day occurrence, that the habit now so prevalent of carrying concealed weapons brings to our attention the news of murder, manslaughter, and accident." He says that not only men but boys of all ages are ready upon the least provocation to use the deadly weapon, and makes the astonishing statement that "school-teachers and school-boys go to their duties and lessons armed." The Governor recommends that the custom should be prohibited by the most stringent legislation, and he might have suggested that until Michigan teachers and pupils stop carrying revolvers to school and using them "upon the least provocation," it would be only seemly for Michigan newspapers to intermit their lectures to Southerners upon the wickedness of shooting people without due cause.

If "the city of Collins and O'Brien is not quite the city of Winthrop and the Pilgrims," neither is the Massachusetts of 1887 quite the Massachusetts of 1630 to 1649. No more striking proof of this latter fact could be furnished than the paragraph of Gov. Ames's inaugural address devoted to the subject of the Sunday laws. He begins by characterizing these laws in their present form as "of unequal, if not unjust, operation," and as liable to become, through partial or irregular enforcement, "an annoyance to the people and a reproach to the State." "With all respect for the ancient faith of the fathers," he continues, "and with every desire to perpetuate their goodly customs and sound morality, we must admit that these laws are no longer suited to the times, or capable of regular or uniform execution. In some particulars they are constantly violated, without heed and without scruple, by practically the whole body of our citizens. Such a spectacle cannot but tend to bring all law into contempt, and to excite an increasing animosity against the institutions which these laws were originally designed to secure." The Governor, therefore, recommends that these laws should be thoroughly and carefully revised without delay, declaring his belief that "it is possible to frame such legislation as will permit the doing of acts which, in the present state of society, are generally approved as practically necessary on all days alike, and will remove from our law the reproach of being an aid to fraud and an encouragement to the violation of just obligations; and that this can be done with due regard to the quiet and sanctity of the Sabbath, and without offending the feelings of any class of our citizens." Such advice from a Massachusetts Governor would probably startle the departed Puritans as much as the discovery that Boston has an Irish Mayor—or that a man like the Rev. Dr. Heman Lincoln is permitted to teach such heresy as the doctrines of the Baptists.

The first half-year of prohibition in Rhode Island ended with December, and the Providence Journal has compiled an interesting and valuable summary of the results. When the new system went into operation, there were 444 places in the city licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, which paid an annual revenue of $131,618. For several days after the 1st of July it was very difficult to buy liquor at any of these places, and a number of the dealers went out of the business; but, as time went on, the traffic began to revive, until now, the Journal says, "intoxicating beverages can be procured in any quantity, and in any locality, without much trouble or secrecy." The number of places where liquor was formerly sold and is now to be obtained, is 288, to which must be added enough so-called "club-rooms," opened by former saloon-keepers for the benefit of their customers, to make the total number 404 under prohibition, or within 40 of the number under license. The arrests for drunkenness and crimes like assaults, which are largely attributable to intoxication, fell off very largely during the first weeks after the change—only 150 of the former and 8 assaults in July, 1886, against 404 and 25 respectively in July, 1885; but during the last three or four months the difference has steadily diminished, until in December last arrests for drunkenness reached 238 against 380 in December, 1885, while there was an increase in arrests for assaults from 11 in December, 1885, to 22 in December, 1886. The conclusion of the whole matter appears to be that, at the rate things are now drifting, there will soon be no material difference in Providence between the workings of license and prohibition, except in the fact that the community now derives no revenue from the traffic in drink, and the even more important fact that respect for all laws is diminished by the contempt shown for the law which is most talked about.

The imported Socialists, the Avelings, it seems, have too luxurious habits to suit the taste of the domestic variety of their kind. There is a row over the bills of these English missionaries, which, on being considered at a meeting of the Socialistic Labor party on Sunday, were found to contain such items as "$50 for cigars for Dr. Aveling and a smaller amount for cigarettes for Mrs. Aveling," "$100 for theatre tickets," "wine and board $42," $25 for corsage bouquets, etc. "Corsage bouquets, $25," one Socialist woman cried out. "Why, I have lived one month on that. What have bouquets to do with Socialism?" This is a pertinent question, and the more useful because it is likely to change into the larger question of the real use and value of the whole tribe of oral laborers, "organizers," editors of "organs," etc., etc., who make a living and something more out of such "movements;" and the cost of them, concerning which a good deal of useful truth is beginning to come out.

It seems to be understood that the Rev. Dr McGlynn will not obey the summons of the Propaganda to go to Rome, because he believes that his case is already prejudged. Exactly what his case is, nobody knows except the highest dignitaries of the Church. It may be a breach of discipline, or it may be unsoundness of opinion, or it may be partly one and partly the other. The public can form no opinion of the merits of the case until they know what it is; but they will be apt to say that no man can tell beforehand whether his case is prejudged or not. A summons to Rome to a Catholic priest is like the summons of any tribunal which the party acknowledges to have authority over him. If he neglects to obey it, he cannot expect to gain sympathy by saying that the tribunal is prejudiced, because that is the very thing which the public cannot know beforehand, even if we allow that he knows it.

Mr. Charles A. Dana, the editor of the Sun, is reported as having said, in his speech at the dinner of the Business Men's Democratic Association on Jackson's birthday, that a commission had some years ago reported, as regards this city, "that it would be better for people to own so much property in order to be allowed to vote," and that, "under the Civil-Service Law, only those who can answer questions in history, logic, theology, and God knows what—only those who are possessed of literary intelligence—can hold office." Mr. Dana will be pleased to learn that there is not a word of truth in either of these statements. No such report was ever made by any commission in this city, and no such examinations are prescribed by the Civil-Service Law or conducted under the regulations. Mr. Dana has evidently been imposed on by some smart scoundrel, and he owes it to himself to ferret him out and expose him. What a smart scoundrel he must have been, is shown by his success in deceiving a man of Mr. Dana's intelligence with regard to matters on which the fullest information is attainable by anybody who chooses to seek it.

Col. Wentworth Higginson has been treating with incredulity the statement we made some weeks ago as to the mischief done by the Normal College here, in providing us with too many female teachers. But his only reason for doubting seems to be that in his part of the country—Massachusetts—no such surplus of female teachers exists; overlooking the fact that in our article we said nothing about Massachusetts, or any part of the country except New York. There are, we feel sure, numerous places in which there is a scarcity of female teachers. What we said was that in this city there are sadly too many candidates for every vacancy in the public schools, and that in turning out so many the Normal College does harm and not good. No contradiction of this has come from anybody who knows anything about the matter, while we have received much hearty confirmation of it from those who are interested in "the labor problem" as it affects women in this city. The same phenomenon is showing itself in all the thoroughly democratic countries. In France the Journal Officiel published statistics the other day which the Temps calls "really mournful," showing that in the Department of the Seine (that is, Paris and its environs) alone there are 1,506 young men and 4,174 young women holding Government certificates, seeking places as teachers of primary schools, for whom there is not only no employment, but no prospect of employment. There, however, the situation is somewhat worse than it is here, for Frenchwomen as well as Frenchmen are apt to suppose that if the Government examines them, and gives them a diploma of fitness for any Government place, it is bound to find them the place, or, in other words, that it owes them a living. Another danger in France is, that this annual crowd of candidates, after wearily and vainly waiting for some months, or some years, for Government work, will finally join the ranks of those who are in France called, with a certain horror, the "déclassés"—that is, the somewhat educated people belonging to none of the regular callings or occupations, and living in a greater or less degree by their wits, and who, in the case of the men, in Paris, furnish a large contingent to the revolutionary or anarchical element in the population.

The origin of the evil is much the same in Paris as in New York. Whenever a girl at a primary school shows signs of more than ordinary aptitude in learning, the teacher and her parents and friends go to work to turn her mind away from all industrial occupations, and to mark her out for a scholastic career of some kind. The family makes extraordinary exertions to enable her to get a Government diploma, or, as we should call it, send her to the Normal College, and thus probably to raise her a peg or two in the social scale. The effects of all this on her and on them are pretty much what we described when writing on this subject. The Temps sounds the strongest note of warning touching this tendency in our modern society to rush into the cities in search of clerical or scholastic work, which women have begun to display in nearly as great a degree as men. It says: "Primary schools are intended to open people's minds, those of the workingmen as well as of the teachers. They ought not to disgust the pupils with manual labor, or trade, or any honorable calling. . . . The workingman will be a better worker, a better citizen, and a better man through his schooling, if this, and this only, be what he aims at. When will this idea thoroughly penetrate the heads of our democracy? It would certainly be a useful enterprise to try to spread it. The wonderful growth of primary instruction ought not to be allowed to become a source of danger to the community."

There have been several protests published in recent magazines against the amusing business known as "literary log-rolling," which exists now, and always has existed since literature became a profession, in this and all other cities large enough to be called "literary centres." The recent protests are not especially strong, but they are entertaining, because as usual they contain a great deal of more or less thinly disguised truth. They are interesting chiefly because of the dead earnestness with which their writers discuss the subject. In fact, the most amusing aspect of both the log-rollers and their denouncers is this same seriousness. The former appear to believe that their amiable advertising and puffing of one another is "fame"; and the latter are so afraid that this may prove to be true that they devote valuable time and energy to proving what a positively vain and foolish effort it all is. Of course, it is vain and foolish, and, being so, why get so troubled about it? All the puffing in the world will not make poor work excellent, or give it a standing beyond its merits; and all the detraction in the world will not hurt really good work, or prevent its merits from being recognized.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[Wednesday, January 5, to Tuesday, January 11, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

President Cleveland on Wednesday sent to the Senate the nomination of James Curran for Inspector of Steam Vessels for the district from Baltimore to the Gulf of Mexico. This is a severe rebuff for Senator Gorman, the Maryland Boss. Mr. Curran, who was appointed to this position a year ago or more, is a very competent man, has had long experience in his business, and gives satisfaction to the Treasury Department, and has the confidence of the business community. But Mr. Gorman has not been able to induce Mr. Curran to appoint two deputies whom he has designated, and it is generally understood among Maryland politicians that Mr. Curran was notified that he could not be confirmed until he did appoint a certain deputy. Mr. Curran refused to appoint that deputy, for the sufficient reason that he did not think that a Baltimore ward striker, who knew practically nothing about steam boilers, was a proper person to inspect them. Mr. Curran was not confirmed, but the President reappointed him, much to the chagrin of Gorman. The name, however, had not been sent to the Senate till Wednesday. Mr. Gorman persistently urged the President to withhold the nomination.

Contrary to expectation, the President on Thursday sent to the Senate the nomination of Thomas C. Manning of Louisiana to be Minister to Mexico.

The Secretary of the Treasury has appointed Herbert F. Beecher to be a special agent of the Treasury. He is a son of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and was formerly Collector of Customs at Port Townsend, Washington Territory.

The Senate passed on Thursday afternoon the bill to place the widow of Gen. Logan on the pension roll at $2,000 annually. Taking advantage of the kindly sentiment which has prevailed in the Senate, Mr. Vest of Missouri then secured the passage without opposition of a bill to give the widow of Gen. Frank P. Blair a pension of $2,000 annually, instead of the $50 a month which she now receives.

The Senate has voted to extend to May, 1888, the time within which the legislation to put in force the Mexican Treaty may be passed.

Senator Frye (Rep., Me.) has proposed an amendment to the Post-office Appropriation Bill, making an appropriation of $400,000 for the transportation of South American mails in American vessels. This differs from the bill of last season in that it relates to South American mails only.

At the Maine Republican legislative caucus on Wednesday night Eugene Hale was unanimously renominated for United States Senator. The Nevada Republican legislative caucus has nominated William M. Stewart for United States Senator. The Michigan Republican legislative caucus on Thursday evening nominated Col. Frank B. Stockbridge of Kalamazoo for United States Senator over Senator Conger on the tenth ballot. The Minnesota Republican caucus nominated ex-Gov. C. K. Davis of St. Paul for Senator, Senator McMillan retiring from the contest before the ballot. In Missouri the Democratic legislative caucus nominated Senator Cockrell for reëlection. All will be elected.

Gov. Ames of Massachusetts delivered his inaugural address on Thursday. In it he said: "Nearly 6,000 officers and laborers throughout the State are now subject to the Civil-Service Act and to the rules made in pursuance of its provisions. The system has become thoroughly established as a valuable part of the administration of our State and city governments. It is working well, and no change in its details seems at present necessary. I heartily recommend an adequate appropriation for its maintenance. To its moral support the people are already pledged. I would urge the advisability of a law restricting within narrow limits the number of licenses to be granted in any city or town voting for license, and I would also suggest that the fees for licenses be greatly increased. I earnestly recommend, as an act of simple justice, the enactment of a law securing municipal suffrage to women."

The Connecticut Legislature on Thursday elected P. C. Lounsbury (Rep.) Governor, there having been no majority on the popular vote.

Col. Robertson (Rep.) was sworn in as Lieutenant-Governor of Indiana on Monday, despite the noisy protests of the Democrats.

The North Carolina Assembly was organized on Wednesday by a union of the Republicans and Independents.

Attorneys for the owners of the American fishing vessel Highland Light have been instructed to take action against the Dominion Government for illegally seizing and selling the vessel for violating the fishing law. The act under which the seizure was made was passed in March by Parliament, but Lord Lansdowne, Governor-General, refused to make the act a law by signing the bill, and referred the matter to the Queen for royal assent. In consequence of this the act did not go into effect until November 27, long after the infraction complained of and the consequent seizure of the vessel.

The full bench of the Massachusetts Supreme Court has made a decision against the New York Sleeping-Car Palace Co., of which the following is significant: "A sleeping-car company holds itself out to the world as furnishing safe and comfortable cars, and when it sells a ticket, it implicitly stipulates to do so. The law raises the duty on the part of the car company to afford protection. While it is not liable as a common carrier or as an inn-holder, yet it is its duty to use reasonable means to guard the passenger from theft; and if, through want of such care, the personal effects of a passenger, such as he might reasonably carry with him, are stolen, the company is liable for it. Such a rule is required by public policy and by the interests of both the passenger and the company."

In the City Court of New Haven on Saturday, Judge Pickett rendered a decision in the cases of William H. Wallace, Assistant Superintendent of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroads, and Stacy B. Opdyke, Superintendent of the New Haven and Northampton Road, accused of conspiracy by Thomas F. Meany, who charged them with "blacklisting" him, and preventing his getting employment. The accused were fined $50 each. The Judge in his decision said that he was clearly of the opinion that a conspiracy designed to hinder any man from putting his labor on the market, when, where, and for such compensation as he may agree for, is equally criminal with any conspiracy designed to hinder the sale of the merchandise of any producer or dealer, and is more disastrous in effect than any other form of conspiracy, except that to take life. An appeal will be taken.

Judge Barrett of this city on Monday in Supreme Court Chambers rendered an exhaustive opinion denying the motion recently made by the counsel for Jacob Sharp to change the place of his trial from this to some other county, upon the ground that he cannot secure a fair and impartial trial here.

At the meeting of the Chicago Trades Assembly on Sunday the Socialist element won a decided victory, electing a full set of officers who are in sympathy with the condemned Anarchists.

It is reported that the Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn has decided not to obey the summons to Rome to answer for his conduct in relation to the candidacy of Henry George, and that his permanent suspension from the priesthood will follow. Some of Dr. McGlynn's friends, however, still believe that he will make submission to his spiritual superiors.

John Roach, the well-known ship-builder, died on Monday morning at the age of seventy-three. He was a native of Ireland, but when sixteen years of age he came to this country. He had neither money nor friends, and earned his first wages in a brick-yard. He learned the trade of an iron founder, saved money and lost it through the failure of his employers, and was finally able to open a small foundry, employing four men. He was industrious and shrewd, and accordingly prospered. Gradually Mr. Roach increased his foundry, putting all his available profits into the extension of his business, until at last he possessed the best facilities in the country for building ships and marine engines. In 1867 he bought the Morgan Iron Works, extensive though they were, and made them complete. As a ship-builder Mr. Roach stood without an equal in this country. He saw the demand for American ships, and that led him, in 1871, to establish his large ship-yard at Chester, Pa., which is known the world over. Mr. Roach built there eighty or more iron ships, their aggregate tonnage being 210,000 tons, and their rating, at Lloyd's and by the American Marine Underwriters, as high as that of any ships. The extent of business done by him in ships and marine engines amounted to $35,000,000. His ship-yard was probably the most complete in the world, and was the only one where iron could be received in the ore and converted into a finished ship. He built vessels for the Pacific Mail, Ward, Savannah, Mallory, and Old Dominion lines, and a number of cruisers for the United States Government, about which so much has been written. A complication of troubles led to the assignment of Mr. Roach about eighteen months ago, but on January 1 his difficulties with the Government were adjusted and the firm was reorganized with Mr. Roach at its head, under the name of the Morgan Iron Works. Mr. Roach was an ardent Republican, but never held office. He was popular with his employees, whose condition he was always watchful to improve. In a business career of nearly fifty years he had never been sued, nor had he ever found it necessary to sue a customer.

The Rev. Oliver S. St. John died in Brooklyn on Monday at the age of seventy-two. He was a pastor of Congregational and Presbyterian churches, professor of languages in Lafayette College, and for many years active in literary and religious work in this city. Before and during the war he was an active abolitionist, and has recently been a worker in the prohibition cause. In 1874 he was appointed Secretary of the Palestine Exploration Society. When overtaken by his last illness, he was preparing a mass of material relating to Biblical antiquities.

Dr. William Perry, the oldest person in Exeter, N. H., and the oldest graduate of Harvard College, died on Tuesday morning, aged ninety-eight. He was the sole survivor of the passengers on Fulton's first steamboat trip down the Hudson seventy-nine years ago.

FOREIGN.

The German Reichstag was crowded on Tuesday, the occasion being the calling up of the Government's Military Bill in its amended form for second reading. Gen. von Moltke opened the debate in favor of the second reading on behalf of the Government. He said he did not believe that any State should assume the responsibility of increasing the supply of combustible material which at present existed in greater or less degree everywhere. Strong governments, he contended, were the best guarantee of peace, while danger lay in the ambition of party leaders and their influence on public opinion. If any State, said Gen. von Moltke, can work effectively to preserve the peace, it is Germany, who acts solely on the defensive. For this she must be strong, and prepared for war. Should we, against our will, be involved in war, we shall be able to wage it. If this bill is rejected we shall most certainly have war. To-day's vote in the Reichstag on the measure will not fail to have its effect abroad. The army alone renders possible protection to all other political institutions, which must stand or fall with it. A grant for a short term will not be acceptable.

Prince Bismarck said: "A degree of intimacy and mutual confidence exists between Germany and Austria such as never existed at the period of German federation. We are bound to maintain peace for this quarter of the globe, but for this a strong army is required. I have firm confidence in the peaceful disposition of the French Government and a portion of the French people. Still, the past teaches us that we cannot count upon peace with France as permanent. A government may one day come into power at Paris which will make war upon us. This you must take into account. If we do not prepare—if you say to-day, 'When war comes we shall grant everything,' we should be laughed at. Is there in France a single paper or a single public person who says: 'We renounce our rights to Alsace-Lorraine?' The possibility of French aggression is, therefore, a sufficient motive for the bill. Our friendship with Russia is beyond all doubt, and places no obstacle in our way in this respect. Expressing myself thus frankly may alienate Polish votes, but I am bound to honor and truth, and I say that all the motives for the bill which the people sought to adduce from our relations with Russia, according to my political understanding do not exist. I have no need to refer to all the European Powers. I make no reference to England or Italy, because there is absolutely no reason why we should not have for both, and they for us, the greatest good-will. Our relations with both are such that I shall not touch upon them. In connection with the question of the increase of our army they are in every respect friendly." Bismarck several times asserted with warmth that the bill must be passed or the Reichstag dissolved.

The Russian Military Commission has decided to adopt a new repeating rifle for use by the army, and orders for large numbers of the weapon have been given.

There are rumors on the Bourse in St. Petersburg that Russia has occupied a portion of Afghanistan.

Prince Alexander of Battenberg has informed Count Kálnoky, Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, that he will not return to Bulgaria even if a powerful party should recall him.

France has advised Bulgaria to accept Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia as a ruler.

Lord Iddesleigh has informed the Porte that England cannot recommend Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia for the Bulgarian throne. The Bulgarian Government has rejected the Zankoff overtures.

Rustem Pasha, Turkish Ambassador to England, recently asked the Earl of Iddesleigh, British Minister of Foreign Affairs, whether the English Government inspired the articles in the London press urging the Porte to join England and Austria and not Russia on the Bulgarian question. Lord Iddesleigh has replied, referring the Porte to the liberty enjoyed by the English press, declaring that the articles made the basis of the inquiry had not been inspired, although, he added, the Government and the majority of the English people shared the views expressed by the press. The Porte believes that Turkey would make a false step if she acted with Russia alone, and is now seeking a solution of the Bulgarian difficulty that shall be in accord with the general wish of all the Powers. No definite action, however, will be taken until the return to Constantinople of Gadban Pasha, the special Turkish envoy to Bulgaria.

The British naval pensioners have been ordered to notify the Government of the names of the ships they would prefer to serve upon, or the ports they would prefer to be employed at, in view of being called into possible active service.

The British Admiralty has adopted Lord Beresford's advice to build a fleet of fast cruisers. The new fleet will be completed in two years.

Lord Northbrook and Lord Lansdowne have declined British Cabinet positions.

The British Cabinet changes have been completed as follows: Lord Salisbury, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Admiralty; G. J. Goschen, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Edward Stanhope, Secretary of State for War; and Sir Henry Holland, Secretary of State for the Colonies. Lord Iddesleigh repulsed Lord Salisbury's offer of the Privy Seal. He denies that the condition of his health debars him from accepting an onerous office, and he withdraws from official life under a strong sense of having been ill-treated. His personal friends explain that he proffered his resignation only to enable Lord Salisbury to form a coalition Cabinet. When the Prime Minister's efforts in that direction failed, Lord Iddesleigh considered himself entitled to hold the leading portfolio. Lord Salisbury's supporters respond that they are glad to get rid of Lord Iddesleigh, as "his health was of no benefit to the Foreign Office." Mr. Henry Stafford Northcote, son of Lord Iddesleigh, has resigned the office of Surveyor-General of Ordnance, worth $7,500 per year.

The greatest discord exists in the Cabinet upon the coming Local Government Bill, which was supposed to be an immense Conservative success. The difference of opinion is so great that influential Conservatives inside and outside the Government are urging Salisbury not to attempt to introduce it, as its introduction means the instant and complete collapse of the party.

Mr. Gladstone writes that Lord Randolph Churchill's resignation was justifiable, and adds: "I myself favor more economy in the army and navy expenditures."

With regard to the prospects of the forthcoming Liberal conference it is said that Mr Chamberlain's action is a direct result of pressure brought to bear upon him from Birmingham. When he returned from the East, he gave notice that he would address a public meeting on a certain day. Thereupon the political committee of his ward wrote to inform him that his first duty was to them, and they desired him to address them privately at an earlier date. He suspected nothing, and was immensely surprised and disgusted to find himself subjected to a process of heckling by the most direct and frank questions for over two hours. This has been a revelation to him. His position among even those in whose support he had most confidence, caused him to make a conciliatory speech and lend himself willingly to the conference proposal. He has expressed great satisfaction at the tone of certain letters which Mr. Gladstone has addressed to him privately. Nobody has yet discovered in what way a reconciliation is to come.

The negotiations between Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Morley are tending towards an agreement on the Land Bill on the basis of Mr. Chamberlain's former proposals, to limit the operations of the bill to the purchase of the smaller holdings, thus requiring a total capital, guaranteed by the Imperial Exchequer, of £25,000,000. The differences as to the functions and powers of the proposed Irish Parliament continue.

Mr. John Dillon has begun an action against Inspectors O'Brien and Davis to recover £2,000 damages for malicious prosecution and assault, and £1,000 damages for the seizure and retention of moneys and documents in connection with the arrest of himself and others at Loughrea for receiving tenants' rents.

The fifty-six men who were arrested last August, at the time when Father Fahey was taken into custody, for resisting the collection of rent and eviction on the Clanricarde estates, at Woodford, County Galway, were on Wednesday sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, ranging from twelve to eighteen months. The judge who delivered the sentences censured the inspectors of police and the local magistrates for allowing the rioting, and declared that no Chief Secretary for Ireland, no Under-Secretary, and no Inspector-General could be justified in giving orders to prevent the police from assisting the Sheriff in making evictions or carrying out the processes of law for the collection of rents due.

It is stated that the Pope recently wrote to the Archbishops of Dublin and Cork, instructing them not to support the Nationalist rent movement, but that the injunction has been disregarded.

The West End of London had another labor scare on Friday. Crowds of unemployed workingmen assembled in front of the offices of the Local Government Board and demanded relief. Mr. Ritchie, President of the Board, received a deputation from the crowd outside, but said he could promise nothing. When the crowd were apprised of this, they hooted the Government and marched to Trafalgar Square, where an indignation meeting was held and resolutions were adopted protesting against the apathy of the Government.

William Ballantine, the well-known serjeant-at-law, is dead at the age of seventy-five. He was born in London and admitted to practice in the Inner Temple in 1834. His reputation was first made as a criminal lawyer. In 1856 he was created a serjeant, and became one of the best nisi prius advocates at the English bar. Among his many large fees was the $50,000 received for the defence of the Guikwar of Baroda. Serjeant Ballantine was an original wit, and attained great social popularity. About five years ago he wrote a book entitled 'Experiences of a Barrister's Life,' dealing with the public men of two generations. In December, 1882, he visited this country, and was the guest of the Bar Association. He lectured in this city, Boston, and other places.

At a recent French Cabinet Council it was decided not to propose a new loan or tax, but to rely upon the temporary suppression of the sinking fund to balance the current budget, and to postpone making a financial report until next year.

The census of France for 1886 shows a total population of 38,218,903, against 37,672,048 in 1881. The population of Paris has increased only 75,000, against an increase of 280,000 recorded in 1881.

The Vatican has received a communication from France proposing to maintain good relations on the basis of the concordat liberally interpreted. The Vatican does not approve the proposals, and will soon explain its views formally and at length to France.

The Pope will present $100,000 to the Congregation de Propaganda Fide on the occasion of the coming jubilee.

The Danish Folkething (Lower House of Parliament) has been dissolved, owing to refusal to agree to the Government's financial proposals and army estimates. The elections for the new Folkething will take place on January 28.

The Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs has agreed to pay $25,000 to the American missionaries who suffered losses during the recent riots at Ching King.

At the meeting of the Canadian Cabinet on Saturday, dissolution of Parliament was finally agreed upon. John Costigan, Minister of Internal Revenue, and W. A. McLelan, Minister of Finance, have handed in their resignations.

SUGAR BOUNTIES AND SOCIALISM.

THE bill introduced by Mr. Hiscock to reduce the Treasury surplus proposes to take off one-half of the existing duty on raw sugar, and to compensate the Louisiana planters and the sorghum and beet-root growers by a bounty of $2 for each ton of cane or sugar beets grown (not necessarily worked), to be paid by the Treasurer of the United States. It provides in addition a scale of bounties for all kinds of sugar made—from cane, beets, or what not—amounting to about seven-eighths of a cent a pound. The surplus will thus be reduced in two ways, first by lessening the income, and second by increasing the outgo by a gratuity amounting to some five millions of dollars.

There is little likelihood that Mr. Hiscock's bill will come to a vote. Probably it is introduced merely as a "feeler" to enable the Republican politicians to judge how far they can go safely in the socialistic experiment of diverting public funds to private interests. That the bill is of the very essence of socialism, no one can doubt or deny. The protective tariff is a socialistic contrivance, although it is not so regarded by those who support it. By exciting prejudices against "foreign industry" and in favor of "home industry," thus keeping a pseudo-patriotic point of view uppermost, its advocates have managed to conceal its real character even from themselves. The aim of a protective tariff is to give to some people by law an advantage over others in matters of business, in dollars and cents. This is socialism, but, as we have said, the popular apprehension has not yet recognized it as such.

We are referred by the advocates of sugar bounties to the example of Germany. The Tribune "points with pride" to the remarkable development of the sugar industry in that country, secured by payments of money from the public treasury, and asks, "Why should not this country encourage the same industry by the same means?" Why not encourage every industry by the same means? That is exactly what the Socialists demand. Germany is the headquarters of socialism. The only difference between Bismarck's socialism and that of Karl Marx is in the detailed application of it. Bismarck has the advantage of physical power, but Marx and his followers have that of logical consistency. Brute force is a temporary and shifting element. Intellectual force is a permanent and growing power. If there were no other elements to be reckoned with in Germany but the socialism of Bismarck and that of Marx, the latter would triumph over the former in the course of time, as surely as chemistry triumphs over alchemy or astronomy over astrology. But the eventual salvation of Germany is to be found in the fact that both varieties of socialism are unscientific, pernicious, and destructive, and destined to a common burial, although they may work a great deal of mischief and some bloodshed before they are mutually effaced. Both take their stand on the principle that the Government can make a wiser distribution of the products of labor than natural laws effect. They differ only as to the mode of carrying this principle into practice. "Protection" aims at this result, and if we allow that protection is right, we shall not have much standing ground for opposition to sugar bounties or any other kind of bounties. Let it be understood that any trade (which means a certain number or class of producers) are not doing as well as they think they ought to, and their claims for appropriations of public money are as good as those of the sugar-planters and the beet-growers. The complete and perfect expression of the idea would be a bill granting pensions to all the people of the United States. The socialism of Marx would limit the pension to the needs of the pensioner. That of Bismarck and of Hiscock would limit it only by the judgment of the governing power.

Mr. Hiscock's bill provides in effect that there shall be no reduction in the price of sugar to the consumer. This proviso is found in the clause which says that sugars from all countries where there is an export tax shall continue to pay the present duty. This means that we are to discriminate in favor of Germany, which country has no export tax, but gives a bounty to her beet-sugar growers, and against all the countries for whose trade we are so anxiously struggling, and from which nine-tenths of our imports of sugar now come, viz.: Cuba, Brazil, the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, the English and French West Indies, etc., all of which, with two insignificant exceptions, collect an export tax as the only means of obtaining a revenue from the planter. In all such countries the only method available for the Government to collect taxes is to impose them at the shipping ports; hence all their revenues are from imports and exports. Is it any of our business how these countries collect their taxes? Has not Mr. Hiscock's experience as a Congressman taught him the immense difficulty of changing a revenue system? If so, why should he suppose that the sugar-growing countries could, at a moment's warning, even if they wished to do so, change theirs? Our enlightened Congress, which for years has been haggling over the worst revenue system in the world without accomplishing any change, proposes offhand to upset the revenue system of nearly every sugar country, by helping the planters to bring a pressure to bear on their own governments to relieve them from a tax which now comes out of their pockets. This is what cannot be done. The duties on imports in those countries are so high now that they cannot be increased. Consequently there is no source of revenue to make good the repeal of the export tax on sugar. The only effect of this clause in the Hiscock bill will be to give an advantage in our market to Germany and France — two countries which notoriously discriminate against our products.

A SHAMEFUL BUSINESS.

THE Old Dominion Steamship Company, which does perhaps a larger freight business than any other domestic line, and employs a large body of stevedores, has been in the habit of employing a number of them by the month in order to be sure of a steady supply of labor. This practice of employing by the month was recently forbidden by the Knights of Labor, but the company, of course, disregarded the prohibition, and found no difficulty in filling the places of the men who struck under it. The Knights, being foiled in this direction, bethought themselves of the plan of frightening the foreign steamship companies into a boycott, and have actually succeeded in doing so. They sent around notices on dirty pieces of paper requesting these companies not to take freight from the old Dominion Company, and the result was that several of them—we do not know exactly at this writing how many—have not only refused to accept new freight from that line, but have broken contracts already made with it—that is, have refused to honor through bills of lading given by their own agents.

When one considers that nothing has yet happened to these companies, that they are not yielding after actual experience of the loss or danger of resistance, that their discreditable conduct is the result of what is called in England "sheer funk"—that is, of the kind of terror which destroys shame—and that some of them are Englishmen, representing English honor and manliness in a foreign port, it is, it must be admitted, a very extraordinary affair. When we call to mind the great amount of business the foreign steamship companies do at this port, it would seem to be a matter of ordinary comity that they should aid their American customers in defending private rights against mob violence or intimidation. In other words, they owe it to the Old Dominion Steamship Company and to all the decent and intelligent people of America to aid them in resisting the scamps and ruffians, who are trying to ruin this city as a centre of trade and commerce by their lawlessness and disorder. Foreigners who live here for the purpose of soliciting American custom, certainly have duties as well as rights. They have no business to claim the protection of the American law, and then, when the occasion comes, not only refuse all assistance in upholding the law, but make common cause with the law-breakers against members of their own calling. It would have been bad enough if in this case they had simply allowed themselves to be frightened into refusing to receive, as common carriers, any honest man's goods; but to break their contracts openly and brazenly, and have nothing to show in excuse or extenuation except dirty postal cards from unknown persons, is still worse. They ought to be made to suffer for it in some way, and we trust they will be. If the law cannot reach them, we trust the reprobation of the mercantile community both here and in Europe will.

The Knights of Labor have, during the past few months, been rapidly losing their hold on the skilled labor of the country. The trades-unions of the artisans are rapidly breaking away from them, because they do not care to have their trade interests managed by the votes of the unskilled laborers who compose the vast majority of the Knights. The stevedores, coal-heavers, and miners are, wherever they are concentrated in large bodies, still under control. The Knights have 3,000 of the coal-heavers of the Pennsylvania lines now on strike in New Jersey, and their activity among the stevedores and 'longshoremen is incessant. Most of the steamship lines have for some time past found their business seriously interfered with by the Local Assembly and the Walking Delegates. There is no difficulty in getting plenty of unknightly labor, as the Old Dominion Company has found. The difficulty is in protecting the men from mob violence. Unless there is a large force of police present, the Knights attack them on the wharves and pursue them to their homes, and keep them in terror of their lives. But of course the police protection is not always at hand, and, before it can be obtained, half days or whole days are lost in loading and unloading. The shipping business at this port is already suffering seriously from this cause. It had already enough to contend with in the shape of corruption and extortion among harbor-masters and other officials. It might stand extortion, or it might stand violence, but it can hardly stand both. If there be no improvement here, New York must lose its commercial supremacy.

In view of this state of things, it cannot be too strongly impressed on the business community that their only hope of salvation lies in united resistance. Those who fancy, like these timid ship-owners who are breaking their contracts through "funk," that there are limits to the extortion and interference of the kind of men who control the Knights of Labor, are living under a delusion. The spirit which animates these men is precisely that which animates Macedonian brigands. They think they have got a lot of rich men in their power, and they mean to get all they can out of them—not all at once, but from time to time, as convenience or necessity dictates. The more easily they find their behests obeyed, the sooner they will issue fresh ones. Nothing can be more absurd than the idea that they have a maximum of extortion or violence in their heads beyond which they will not go. What they seek, and almost avowedly seek, is the money of all who save, and they enjoy the power which comes from terrorizing the peaceable and industrious. They like frightening a big ship-owner, and making him cringe and wheedle, particularly as they make a living out of it. Therefore resistance is not only the manliest and most public-spirited course, but the cheapest. It is expensive, doubtless, to carry on the shipping business in a series of rows with Walking Delegates and striking mobs, but it will prove in the long run by far the least expensive course open to people in any business in this city which involves the employment of large quantities of unskilled labor. We predict that if these foreign companies do not repent of their cowardice, they will soon find out that in troublous times it is the costliest vice of which a man or corporation can be guilty.

DECLINE OF THE MORMON THEOCRACY.

After thirty years of stubborn conflict between the Government and the Mormon Church, and after five years' enforcement of the Edmunds law, though it can by no means be alleged that victory is achieved, the evidence is conclusive that the Church begins seriously to suffer, and that, if the campaign continues with vigor, the end is not far off.

True, no intelligent observer can deny the existence of such unpalatable facts as the following: Several scores of missionaries are sent out each year to proselyte; they bring back converts at the rate of some 2,000 annually, while every twelve months not less than 5,000 recruits are born. Colony after colony is drafted to occupy the best lands in Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, and Nevada. The church machine is yet in capital running order. The priesthood is possessed of strength and zeal sufficient to make a vigorous fight both in the Great Basin and upon the Potomac. The people as a whole are sunk deep in ignorance and superstition, are in the main sincere and ready to suffer indefinitely for their faith, and hug their shackles and bless the hands which enslave them. Without doubt as many polygamous marriages are celebrated as ever, and the population is practically a unit in resisting Congress and the courts. And so abundance of toil and trouble is ahead.

But other facts are just as certain and significant. The number of baptisms in foreign regions is steadily falling off. Time was when they reached threefold or fourfold the present figure. It was demonstrated long since that Mormonism has no mission at all for the heathen, or for the adherents of the Greek and Romish Churches. Ever since Nauvoo days, probably 90 per cent. of recruits have been derived from the British Isles and Scandinavian countries, and of late from the Southern States. And, even in this limited area, the source of supply diminishes year by year, while the quality is falling off even more seriously. It has come to this pass, that the only class approachable is of those who are in such amazing ignorance as never to have heard of the fame of Joseph Smith or the wonderful Utah gospel.

The fanatical element in the Mormon Church also grows less and less, and is confined mainly to those who joined when the religious craze or frenzy was on, who endured the fiery persecutions of Missouri and Illinois in 1834-46, and so are far past their prime. The rising generation, especially of the young men, is largely indifferent, or at least half-hearted, their faith being a matter of mere education or prejudice, while of thousands the adhesion is but superficial and formal, to save trouble, or for social or business considerations.

The Federal Government is making continual encroachments upon the political sphere at first claimed and fully occupied by the church, and is able at length to compel respect for its representatives and its commands. Early Mormon assumptions and defiance were astounding, and the degree of forbearance has been shameful; but progress, though slow, has been steady. Since the advent of District-Attorney Wm. H. Dickson and Judge Charles S. Zane, the will of the nation has begun to be felt in fear and trembling. In spite of the utmost of organized resistance by means and methods most unscrupulous, it is now easy to indict and convict polygamous saints, and to send them to prison. More than 200 have already received sentence in three Territories, some 350 more await their trials, and it is estimated that not far from 1,000, including almost every man of note, have fled and hid from the face of the marshals. As showing that legal retribution moves on with accelerated speed, up to July of 1885 but nine had been sentenced in Utah, while a year later the number had increased to ninety-three, and during the last six months seventy-five more have been added. Still further, fines, costs, forfeited bonds, and lawyers' fees have entailed most burdensome expense. Ruinous derangement to business is another result, and payment for the services of such advocates as Curtis, and Boutwell, and Black, has made savage inroads into the church tithing-fund.

Then, at many points, the priesthood has been thrown upon the defensive, and concealment is in order. Thus, statistical reports of accessions and of divers church doings are no longer made. Teachings and practices once boasted of and everywhere heard (and also, unfortunately for Mormonism, put in print by their own pens) are now stoutly denied—such, for example, as "blood atonement," and the right of the priesthood to "dictate in everything, to the setting up of a stocking or the ribbons on a woman's bonnet." Besides, certain desperate measures are set on foot every now and then which indicate that cataclysm and catastrophe are apprehended, and that panic and despair may be near. Moreover, things once strictly forbidden and visited with ecclesiastical vengeance are now ignored or even favored, like selling land to "Gentiles," trading with them, or resorting to their churches and schools. Nor are cases at all unknown of out and-out rebellion against church domination and meddling, and of determination to follow the individual reason and conscience. But even yet theocratic tyranny is such as to fill the mind of the true American with astonishment and indignation.

Nor should the fact be ignored that denominational schools are rapidly gaining place and popularity in all the larger settlements. Already about 20 per cent. of the children in Utah are thus under anti-Mormon influences, are receiving American ideas and ways, and so are spoiled for polygamy and theocracy, while Christian churches will soon follow and further the good work. A few years hence a new and far better civilization will have been planted and become widespread.

A DOUBTFUL REMEDY.

The English newspapers are having a somewhat amusing public washing of their own dirty linen since the conclusion of the Campbell divorce case. The Pall Mall Gazette, which one of its contemporaries now always calls the "Gutter Gazette," suffered so much from the attempts made by its editor to reform British morals by means of "startling exposures," that it has kept a very sharp watch on their reports of the Campbell case, and now castigates them all in a bitter article, with the heading "Pecksniff and Poison." In this it protests furiously against the "flooding of the town with fetid filth," in which it says they have been engaged. It has compiled, too, a table showing the number of columns they have each given to the report, including the Evening News, "an obscure sheet, unhonored and unknown beyond the London gutters," and gives a facsimile of the columns of the Eve- ning Standard, those devoted to the Campbell case being printed in dead black. There is no doubt that it is able to make out a very dark case against them, but it does so in somewhat "journalistic" fashion, for it entirely overlooks the difference between the reporting of something which takes place in a court of law, and the voluntary collection for publication of filth from brothels and "dives." The effect on the reading public is doubtless the same in both cases, but there is a distinction between the position of the law reporter and the sexual reformer, which every candid man must recognize.

The evil worked by publications of this kind, however, is acknowledged on all sides as frightful. The disgusting revelations of the Pall Mall Gazette made their way into the hands of the young all over the world, wherever the English language is spoken. So have the reports of the Campbell trial. It makes very little difference, as far as the moral effect is concerned, whether "the fetid filth" flows from a court of law or from the inflamed brain of a fanatical reformer. Nobody reads such stuff for the purpose of making himself better, and nobody is the better of reading it. It is a sort of literature which used to be confined to books which were expensive because they were necessarily scarce and hard to get at, being in every country under the ban of the police, of the clergy, of parents and teachers. In our day, however, it has, through the newspaper press, broken loose from the old bounds, and goes to every house along with the morning bread and the milk, and is bought and sold in the streets like matches or cigars. It reaches men, women, and children in our day just as if it were mixed with the flour, or butter, or coffee, because the newspaper has become an article of daily household necessity. Every editor can at least once fill thousands of homes with stuff which a hundred years ago had to be sought for with shame and fear, and concealed when found, and of which nobody acknowledged the possession but the old roués who made up libraries of what are called Ludibria.

This new and unlooked-for result of the appearance in the world of the cheap daily press is causing in England a great searching for means of prevention or cure. There was first of all a demand for the hearing of all divorce cases in private, but this did not bear discussion very well, for it was easily shown that the publicity of the proceedings does a great deal to keep people out of the divorce court; and that if the testimony were taken in secret, there would probably be an enormous increase of perjury. It was then modified into a demand for the non-publication of the testimony until after the case was over, and also for some sort of censorship or revision of the reports by the court; but the practical difficulties in the way of these arrangements would be very great. It must be admitted, too, that the present "spirit of the age"—we say "present" because, as Mr. Lowell has observed, we have known of several such spirits in our time—is hostile to having anything whatever kept back, or having any kind of knowledge which anybody is likely to relish confined to a select few. So that the only thing likely to be done by way of remedy is the signing of a very solemn appeal to the editors of the newspapers, by a number of eminent men and women, asking them to keep "the fetid filth" out of their journals.

This is now being done. What success it will have, it is difficult to say. If successful, it would impose on the virtue of an enterprising editor of a cheap newspaper a strain which, it is safe to say, not one in ten would bear. The very qualities which fit a man for the conduct of a thriving two-cent paper make it almost impossible for him to support unmoved the spectacle of a roaring trade done by a rival in news which he might have had, were he less pure and public-spirited. All his training and all his talents tend to unfit him for such an ordeal; and yet every one who suppressed filthy reports from high motives would be subjected to it. For, beside every good editor who is seeking the elevation of mankind, there exists a wicked editor, who takes a wholly humorous view of the elevation of mankind, and does not care what becomes of the race as long as his own dividends are good. And the savage joy with which the latter would ladle out the filth and rake the money into the till would fill the good editor's soul with bitterness, and finally, in most cases, drag him down into the pit. At least such is our impression, but it may be too dark a view.

THE FIRST MADAME GUIZOT.

PARIS, December 28, 1886.

MME. DE WITT, the daughter of M. Guizot, published a few years ago an interesting account of her father's domestic life. She gives us now two volumes, under the title 'Le Temps Passé,' which are a collection of critical essays written by M. and Mme. Guizot. The first Mme. Guizot was a Mlle. de Meulan, born in Paris in 1773. Her father was Receiver-General of Taxes in the generality of Paris. He was wealthy, and his salon was hospitable. M. de Rémusat, speaking of the Meulans, said: "The generosity of mind, so common then in Parisian society, gave them a leaning towards new ideas; they adopted them with confidence. They formed one of those families for whom M. Necker was the desired minister—that is to say, who prepared the Revolution without wishing it or foreseeing it."

The Revolution broke out when Pauline de Meulan was sixteen years old; her father was ruined, he became ill and died in 1790; her mother retired to Passy, and Mlle. de Meulan began to write novels in order to make a little money. In 1801, M. Suard founded a paper called the Publiciste, whose programme was the defence of the philosophical ideas of the eighteenth century. The papers of that period were like the magazines and the reviews of our time—they contained short essays, written with care, with literary preoccupations. Mlle. de Meulan became the theatrical and literary critic of the Publiciste, and her articles were soon remarked. They had a sort of feminine grace. She had evidently taken Addison and the English writers of his period for her model. Literary criticism was for her a means of studying human sentiments, and she based her judgments on philosophical and general ideas. Hence it happens that the value of her criticisms becomes completely independent of the value of the works which suggested them, and a collection of them can be considered a picture of polished society in France after the Revolution, of its ideas and prejudices, of its mental and moral peculiarities. The elegance, the grace of the eighteenth century was not quite destroyed by the Revolution, but it had been chastened by misfortune; there was less levity, less frivolity, and more gravity. What Rousseau called sensibility had become sentimentality.

In one respect the spirit of the nineteenth century at its beginning differs completely from the spirit of our own age. Nothing could show this better, I believe, than a comparison of these literary essays of Mme. Guizot and of the essays of some young critic of our time, for instance, M. Jules Lemaitre, the latest rising star in journalism, who has recently collected his reviews in two volumes, 'Les Contemporains: études et portraits littéraires.' There is a realistic force in Jules Lemaitre which is wanting in Mme. Guizot—a vitality (a coarseness, some would say), a cleverness, and total independence of all preconceived ideas, which contrast very much with the methodical and classic style of the old time. Sainte-Beuve may be said to be the father of the new school, the positivist school, which cares little for general ideas, and runs directly to the facts; which delights in exactitude, in small details, which shows life in all its complexity, which lowers greatness and extols humility. This positivist school does not pretend to be a school of morality, it is a mirror shown to the world, cold and brilliant. There is not much concern for style in such writers as Jules Lemaitre; their pen seems to run with their thought; as they do not wish to correct us, they don't care to correct themselves. A secret contempt for their readers makes them quite indifferent to their own work, so long as it procures them the amount of reputation they claim and gives them the pleasure of expressing their own thoughts as crudely, as brutally sometimes, as they conceive them. They imitate the familiarity of Montaigne, who seems always to be speaking to himself.

M. Guizot made the acquaintance of Pauline de Meulan in 1807. At a time when she was ill, and was obliged to interrupt her work, he offered, though he was unknown to her, to write articles for her. She accepted the offer, and, after a while, he made her acquaintance. He had been living in Paris for two years, quite unknown, lost in his studies. He had been drawn to Pauline de Meulan by a movement of generosity and by a caprice of imagination. When they knew each other, they became intimate friends; they were married on the 9th of April, 1812. She wrote many articles in a periodical which M. Guizot had undertaken to edit, the Annals of Education; and afterwards published her first collection of stories for children, 'Les Enfants.' She had all the qualities necessary for this difficult task of captivating the mind, the heart, and the imagination of the younger generations, and her 'Contes' have become almost classical.

Mme. Guizot, when she was still Mlle. de Meulan, had been obliged to write for her living. Her friends pitied her more than she liked, and she one day found an opportunity of answering them, in a "Letter from a lady journalist to a friend":

"I am criticised for the resolution I have taken to write for a paper, and especially to give an account of the theatrical novelties. . . . I am therefore reproached for being a woman, since it cannot be for being a journalist. My censors know very well, however, why I have become one; but would they not have to reproach themselves if they took away from me, or even rendered more difficult, the courage which I need in order to sacrifice, for what I consider a duty, considerations which my education and my habits had taught me to respect? I know well those proprieties which make the rôle of a journalist the most extraordinary, perhaps, which a woman could choose, if her choice were quite free. This rôle, I assure you, does not seem to me what it seems to them, as they have not seen things so near. If they knew, as I do, the grave interests which it is necessary to respect, the important considerations which weigh on the mind, the absurd accusations which must be answered, the most absurd homages which must be received, and all the turmoil of small passions, the noise of which reaches even the solitude of a woman; if they saw amid all this a work which has no attraction for the mind, with no compensation for vanity, then I would allow them to say what they like, and to think, if they like, that I have undertaken it for my pleasure."

"Ce que j'ai fait, Abner, j'ai crû le devoir faire."

Once married, she wrote more for her own satisfaction. M. Guizot had taken office, and his wife took the keenest interest in all his affairs. She was a sort of intellectual partner of his, and we see a proof of it in two essays, one "On the ideas of right and of duty considered as the foundation of society," and one on "Anarchy and Power." In 1820 M. Guizot resigned his post, as his opinions were no longer in the ascendant, and his wife began to write again. She published 'L'Écolier,' a novel on education; several "contes," and 'Domestic Letters on Education,' a book in which she treats of the highest questions of moral philosophy. "The excellence of this work," says M. de Rémusat, "is in the union of great severity of principle with a perfect liberty of mind; it thus offers a faithful image of the person who composed it."

It is interesting to know what Mme. Guizot thought on religion: she was still under the influence of the philosophical school, but she belonged to Rousseau more than to Voltaire. He was religious by sentiment. She did not like theology nor theological discussions. She did not like, she said, to meditate on any subject in which she had the slightest personal interest. She was afraid of doubt, and she felt instinctively that reasoning might lead to doubt; the smallest fear presented to her imagination made her unhappy. In one of her letters she writes: "In order to be happy, I can do nothing except fix my mind on subjects foreign to what agitates me. This is the art which has kept me up all my life, with the aid of the forced occupations which took me away from my personal interests." She places her faith implicitly in God; but she says:

"Whatever good I have done, I have not done it for God or with a view to becoming better: I have done it simply because I could not do otherwise. I have so little the habit of considering myself when I think of God, that I cannot easily understand that he could be offended by my faults; I ask his pardon less than his support. He is, in my eyes, a protector more than a creditor, and I confide in him more than I fear him. What more can I do? My religion is active like my character; it enters into the interests of which I have the care; it helps me to bear the burden of life rather than throw it aside. A time will come when these burdens may diminish; perhaps I shall some day obtain the calm which I have always tried to conquer, but which nothing can give in the midst of certain subjects of torment."

This is the letter of a very superior and of a really good person, good in the very highest sense of the word; and everybody who has any experience of life will appreciate its profound philosophy. It is the theory of action—"Act, act in the living present." Action is our only defence against misfortune, against regrets, fears, troubles, visions of death. The Greek philosophy said to man, "Know thyself"; the Christian philosophy says, "Forget thyself."

Mme. Guizot, after a long illness, died on the 30th of July, 1827. In the morning she asked her husband to read to her. He read her a letter of Fénelon's for a sick person, and began a sermon of Bossuet's on the immortality of the soul. In the midst of the sermon she expired. Sainte-Beuve places Mme. Guizot in the same rank with some of the best literary women of the eighteenth century; she had their grace, their natural elegance, and she acquired, in the society of M. Guizot, more serious qualities.

The great majority of the articles which appear under the title of 'Le Temps Passé' were written by Mme. Guizot alone. A few, however, are signed by her husband also, and for this reason the name of M. Guizot appears on the title-page with the name of his wife. Mme. de Witt wished to unite once more those who had been so closely united; but it is clear that the 'Temps Passé' is essentially the work of a woman. It has not the stern, the solemn form of the great works of M. Guizot. It is perhaps all the more interesting, as it has a clear individuality.

The critical articles on the theatrical representations of the time have not wholly lost their interest. The remarks of Mme. Guizot on "Othello," or "Tartuffe," or the pieces of Racine and Corneille, are extremely clever. I have read, however, with more pleasure the literary essays on Hugh Blair, on Brantôme, on the 'Confessions' of Saint Augustine, on Goldsmith, Beaumarchais, Alfieri, Mme. Riccoboni, Chateaubriand, Vauvenargues, Collé. The articles on education are particularly interesting, and might be isolated and form a special work. Then come small essays, which have much grace, on points of morals, on politeness and impoliteness, ignorance, hope, vanity, good manners, etc. Such articles can, of course, not be analyzed; it is enough to say that they are written by a woman of the world, and a virtuous woman.

Correspondence.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST SILVER.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You will confer a lasting favor by answering fully the following, which I clip from a newspaper article on the silver question:

"It is a fact that the law makes no discrimination against silver in the payments made by the Treasury. The officials of that department are guilty of all the discrimination. There is certainly no reasonable excuse for the notorious policy of the Treasury in hoarding the vast amount of silver dollars there accumulated. The gauzy excuse that they 'cannot get rid of it' is unworthy of a department of the Government, for it is a fact that when a person is paid by the Government he receives a warrant on the Treasury, and he cannot determine whether his payment shall be in gold, silver, or paper money. The cashier of the Treasury has an unquestionable right to do that, and can pay him in the kind of money of which he has the most. The vaults of the Treasury might be without a dollar in silver if the Administration should so desire. . . . It is true, this Administration, as well as the two preceding it, have shown a bitter hostility to the policy of our laws in regard to silver, and instead of putting it in circulation have uniformly hoarded the greater portion of it, offering as an excuse in the annual reports the insupportable statement that they 'cannot get rid of it.'"

Yours very truly, B. R. Goggins.

Grand Rapids, Wis., December 31, 1886.

[The writer of the newspaper article to which you call our attention has located the discrimination in the wrong place. If the Treasury should insist upon paying to the holders of warrants drawn upon it a kind of money that they object to and do not want, that would be discrimination. Nobody affirms that the Treasury does any such thing. On the contrary, the charge is, that it now and always pays exactly the kind of money that the holder of the warrant asks for. If, under such circumstances, gold is generally paid out instead of silver, it must be because the holders of the warrants discriminate against silver. Now, the holders of the warrants are the public—all persons who have any pecuniary claims against the Government, and all persons to whom they assign these claims by turning them over in payment of their own debts. Nobody pretends that he cannot get silver at the Treasury if he wants it. In point of fact, the Treasury did for several years transport silver certificates from place to place all over the country, free of express charges, at the request of private persons, and without limit as to quantity, in order to promote their circulation. It never did this for gold or for gold certificates or for greenbacks. In other words, the only discrimination the Government ever made as between silver and gold was made in favor of silver.—Ed. Nation.]

GREENBACKS AND SILVER.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It seems to me that you are in error in your comments on Mr. St. John's remarks on the silver question. It is quite true that, "for all purposes of expelling gold, the greenback dollar is quite as powerful an agent as the silver dollar under present conditions"; in point of fact, the Government standing ready to redeem a greenback in coin, but not in gold, a greenback dollar is just as good as a silver dollar—neither better nor worse—and plays precisely the same part as regards keeping out gold. So this comparison does not help us in the argument; it is the aggregate amount of silver and of paper redeemable in silver, with which we have to reckon. When the greenback was not redeemable in coin, it drove out coin most effectually; and the silver dollar, not being redeemable by a gold dollar, and being intrinsically far less valuable, will quite as surely drive out the gold dollar, if it, or its representative in paper, be issued in sufficient quantity.

If "the movement of gold to and from this country" seems to go on "regardless of the operations of the mint," this is only a fresh illustration of the dangers of inferring economic causes from effects. However much gold we may at any time be importing, it is impossible to doubt—silver being in circulation and a legal tender—that we should be importing still more were it not for the presence of the silver; whether the cause of the demand be the rapid development of the country, the diminished circulation of national banks, or what not, we are not here concerned to inquire. One thing is quite plain: though the movement of gold may now seem to be as indifferent to the issue of silver as to the production of Bessemer steel, a point can be distinctly named at which the difference between the two, due to the legal-tender quality of the silver dollar, will become evident to everybody. Whenever there shall have been issued an amount of silver, or paper based on silver, which is sufficient for carrying on all the exchanges of the country, people will have to choose whether they shall pay their debts with gold dollars and melt down their silver dollars, or the reverse. Unless a great many people make the first choice, gold will speedily vanish. F. F.

January 7, 1887.

[It is not clear what "F. F." means by the phrase "issuing" silver. It would appear that he has in mind the process by which the Government issued the greenbacks—paying them out for supplies and services during the war, and thus forcing them into circulation. But the Government does nothing of the kind with silver dollars. It buys $2,000,000 worth of bullion per month, and fashions it into coins.

It allows its creditors to take any kind of money they prefer from the Treasury in payment of their claims, but if they take silver dollars they must, of course, take them as the equivalent of gold dollars. This is not "issuing" in the sense that the greenbacks were issued. It is essentially a manufacturing operation. As the argument of "F. F." depends not upon the manufacture of silver dollars by the Government, but upon their "issue," i. e., their propulsion into business channels, he will see that his reasoning is thus far inconclusive. —Ed. Nation.]

THE REAL RAILROAD EVIL.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The discussion now raging on the Reagan-Cullom Inter-State Commerce Bill does not touch the real difficulty which is sought to be remedied. The Granger agitation of a few years ago was the natural result of an oppression which the farmers felt, and they struck at what seemed to them to be the trouble. "Pools" and discriminations by railroads in "long and short hauls" were the open acts which the people saw, and naturally enough they attributed to those acts the wrongs which were inflicted. Congress has fallen into a like error. I do not mean by this that there are not some good features in the Reagan-Cullom bill; but I do mean that, if passed, it will disappoint its advocates when put into practical operation. I conceive that the trouble which is sought to be remedied arises from a much more deep-seated and radical wrong than "pools" or "hauls." It is, in short, the faulty legislation of the States. Railroads as common carriers are of recent origin. The State Legislatures in the early days of railroads "ran wild" on the subject, and granted to these corporations rights, privileges, and immunities which are now returning to "plague the inventors" and those who come after them.

As an example: Railroads are confined to corporate existence. In this State nine subscribers may organize a railroad and subscribe articles of incorporation; $50,000 in stock subscriptions authorizes a corporate existence and bestows a franchise. The road is wholly a paper line. On this supposed line, without a dollar paid or a solvent corporator connected with it, a mortgage may be made, and corporate bonds and shares of capital stock without limit may be voted and issued. If the mortgagors succeed in getting money on the bonds secured by the mortgage, the road is built up under the mortgage. The scheme generally is to excite rivalry between competing intermediate points, and secure large local subsidies to the enterprise. When the railroad has been hastily and poorly constructed, and the first instalment of interest remains unpaid, the bonds generally fall into the hands of "wreckers," who foreclose them and cut off all floating debts, wipe out the original issue of capital stock, appoint a purchasing committee from among the bondholders, buy in the road at foreclosure sale, and reorganize a new corporation upon the dead carcass of the old, and reissue shares of stock in such amounts as suits the "sweet will" of the new proprietors, and thereupon, without reference to actual value, re-bond the new concern to such an amount as it will stand, and go anew into the markets to dispose of this new "stuff."

And now begins the era of the second great fraud. The new shares of stock, instead of representing the actual value of the road, are issued without regard to value. In fact, the stock remains wholly valueless, and the bonds represent all the value there is to the railroad. The management of the road strain every nerve to make the road pay the interest on the bonds. The shares of stock remain valueless till the road can be made to pay running expenses, and repairs, and interest on the bonded debt; and then, if there is a surplus, it goes to the shareholders. By this means, railroads become of uncertain value; railroad securities are simply "gambling stocks." Railroad management is to squeeze out of the shipper every dollar possible, so that the securities may have an apparent value. As the railroad is made to pay, so the securities fluctuate in the market, and form the bases of gambling contracts on the "Stock Exchange."

This is the real difficulty in the whole business. There is not a railroad bond or stock in this State that an orphans' court would allow a guardian or administrator to invest his trust funds in during the progress of the settlement of his estate. If railroads were prohibited from issuing shares of capital stock beyond the actual value of the railroad, calculated on a mileage basis, and prohibited from mortgaging their railroads and franchises beyond a point where the income of the road would certainly pay the interest, keep up repairs, make needful improvements, and yield a surplus besides to be distributed to the shareholders, there would be little or no agitation in the country over railroad monopolies.

You ask me how I would remedy the evils which have grown up.

In a word, I would provide for the honest valuation of all railroads. I would scale down the par value of the capital stock to that sum, and compel the surrender of the excess. I would in like manner provide for the payment of all outstanding railroad bonds, by compelling the railroads to keep a sinking fund for that purpose, and would prohibit all second or junior mortgages. I would fix a maximum for each railroad beyond which they should not encumber their roads. I would prevent the "watering" of capital stock, and bring these mortgage securities within the bounds of honest values. When they reach that point, I would hold them there with a firm grasp.

It may be said that this is radical and aggressive. I admit it. The times require bold and decisive action. W. H. Calkins.

Indianapolis, Ind., January 1, 1887.

LEGISLATION FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Schemes for aiding the poor by legislation are no doubt for the most part illusory, but there is one direction in which such interposition is much needed.

There is no possession which to the laboring man is more precious than his health, for in America sickness constitutes almost the only source (always excepting drink) of real poverty. It is therefore unjustifiable that a man, in the effort to support his family, should be required to expose himself, and perhaps his family also, to danger of disease; and here legislation might and should interfere. I can point out in the neighborhood of this city many situations in which health is impossible to the resident by reason of low-lying grounds, damp and badly drained, which have nevertheless been chosen for establishing factories, apparently because the ground, being undesirable, is cheap. It is painful to see such places crowded with workpeople at the same time that high and healthy ground near by may be wholly unoccupied and waiting for a purchaser. Factories are also often placed for convenience near water courses, even when such situations are known to be exposed to malaria. Here the law should step in and prevent the selection of such positions.

Many kinds of manufactures are known to act injuriously on those employed in them. For all such there should be State inspection, at short intervals, to make sure that everything that can be accomplished by good ventilation and proper arrangements is attained.

In manufactures of textile fabrics, the workpeople are often obliged to work in a stifling atmosphere, with closed windows in the hottest weather, because of some real or fancied advantage to the work; in some of these mill-rooms, a man unaccustomed to the air, though in good health, will be completely exhausted in half an hour. Here, too, the law should intervene.

In these matters it must be confessed that some other nations do far better than we. In France and Germany especially, all questions affecting the health of workpeople have been carefully studied by intelligent commissions appointed for the purpose, and employers are controlled in exposing workpeople to evils and dangers that can be avoided. The matter is one in which a reform is greatly needed. M. C. L.

Philadelphia, January 7, 1887.

[The idea of legal supervision of the sites of factories is novel and may have merit, but we do not see how a man could be fairly compelled to build his factory on dear high ground instead of low cheap ground unless the State paid the difference in price. We think, too, that if he should be compelled to build on costly high ground out of regard for the health of his operatives, the operatives should be compelled to keep healthy, by legal rules as to diet and clothes and exercise. Houses in healthy situations might be provided for them by the employer, but it would not be fair, after putting him to this expense, to let them go on drinking bad liquor, or eating too much pie or nuts, or wearing thin underclothing in bad weather, or sleeping in close rooms. There is evidently a great future in this world for "inspectors" and "guardians."—Ed. Nation.]

HOW TO CONTROL IMMIGRATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial comment last week on restricting immigration, apropos of Mr. Flower's second biennial report of the Wisconsin Bureau of Labor and Industrial Statistics, prompts me to make a suggestion derived from the policy pursued, as I am informed, by the Dutch in the island of Java. The dense population of that island, and its proximity to portions of Asia even more densely peopled, made it long ago necessary to find some effective check on immigration, and Dutch thrift and ingenuity furnished to the problem a solution which, though entailing no hardship on the individual, has proved a great boon to the country. The plan adopted was the following: Every foreigner arriving in Java may obtain on landing a permit which allows him to remain thirty days. When that time has expired he must either leave the island or deposit with the authorities forty dollars, a sum sufficient to pay his passage to the mainland. For this he receives a receipt, and, whenever he desires to depart, on surrendering the receipt his money is returned to him. If at any time he proves an undesirable visitor, his money pays his passage and the authorities have only to place him on board an outgoing vessel, and the country is rid of him. It has been found that this arrangement prevents an influx of undesirable immigrants, and secures without expense the removal of the obnoxious. If any one becomes a permanent resident, his forty dollars is considered only a proper contribution to the cost of improvements the benefit of which he enjoys.

If every visitor to our shores were required to deposit on arrival a hundred dollars, to be returned whenever he wished to leave, we should escape without trouble the element which now menaces, and have always at hand the means of returning all undesirable immigrants. The only possible objection can be that we should not thus make this the home of the oppressed of all nations. Two answers are ready for this objection. First, it is the evident duty of a country to protect itself rather than offer shelter to all comers. Secondly, it must be remembered that the countries of the Old World, almost without exception, have colonies to which they gladly would divert their surplus population. B.

THE PEOPLE NOT HOSTILE TO CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I was not a swift convert to the doctrine of civil-service reform, and even now I might draw the line up to which removals by an incoming Administration are justifiable beyond the point which most reformers would select; but I believe that the opposition to the adoption of the reform principle in making appointments is greatly exaggerated. The great mass of the people—even of intelligent and public-spirited people—take very little interest in the personal success of this or that applicant; but they are keenly alive to any increase of efficiency in the administration of an office. What percentage of the patrons of a post-office, for instance, care whether the postmaster be a Democrat or a Republican, so that his clerks are prompt and courteous, and the delivery of the mail be accurate and swift?

If my belief be correct, the application should be made by the appointing power. If the President should announce to-morrow that he would no longer consider the recommendations of Democratic committees as more influential than those of Republican committees in the appointment of postmasters, but would regard only the wishes of the constituency to be served and the records of the candidates as to business capacity, a great howl of complaint would go up from Democratic "workers," of course, and Flanagan's conundrum would be many times repeated; but the great mass of the Democratic party itself would make no complaint, and, after a couple of years, everybody would wonder how it was ever deemed possible to appoint postmasters after the old "spoils" principle.

The President and the Civil-Service Commissioners should not be too timid. Mr. Cleveland has done much already—more than any of his predecessors; the civil service was never so removed, as a whole, from active partisanship; but he might easily do more by putting his trust still more in the great mass of the people, who are now far from being animated by a spirit of bitterness towards political opponents, and, as I believe, ready to note and approve a marked advance in administration.

The absence of expression, on the part of the mass of the people, as to the matter of civil-service reform is a proof, it seems to me, rather of indifference as to the personal composition of the service than of opposition to the reform itself. In this light, this very silence is a powerful argument in favor of the view which I have advanced.

W. P. Beckwith.

Adams, Mass., January 3, 1887.

DOMESTIC SERVICE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your correspondent "A. S." in No. 1121 (December 23) gives as a remedy for inferior domestic service certain regulations to be established by the employer. While it is commonly admitted that the treatment of employers towards employed may be greatly improved, still it is not demonstrable that inefficient domestics are the result of this lack of wise treatment. People must adjust their actions to the class with which they deal. Many find from experience that indulging their hired girls, treating them with more than just kindness, has made them less willing to work, more apt to be discontented and unhappy. Therefore, until the "refined, intelligent" girls universally choose domestic service, and, under a lenient management, show a greater willingness to work, can your correspondent say with accuracy that through mild government ideal service is to be attained?

Any person in the employ of another must expect certain restrictions and hardships. The President of the United States does not find the word "servant hateful"; the gentleman, socially the equal of his employer, does not ask or expect to be treated other than as a servant. He has nobility enough to know that his worth is none the less assured if his master demands his "personal services." It is strange that intelligent and refined girls should find this galling to them, while intelligent and refined men do not find bitterness therein.

It is more easy to see that ideal service is to be reached by intelligent and refined girls seeking domestic service; meaning by these not girls with false pride and over-sensitive feeling, but girls with true refinement and active intelligence. Then, in the many cases where ladies are just and kind towards their servants, they will be appreciated, and in those cases where the employers have no love of humanity, the refined domestic will be a means of education to her employer.

E. V. P. M.

January 5, 1887.

LITERARY MORALITY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: On the very day when Mr. Benjamin's "Carey Bowdlerized" came to my notice, in the Nation of the 2d inst., I had been struggling with some troublesome passages in the 'Niebelungen Lied'—seeking the impossible in the form of a version that should fairly represent the Lied, and, at the same time, not offend American readers. I want a version not adapted to scholarly readers alone, but, like Harper's Magazine, suited to popular use, and fit to be laid on the family table, open to the boys and girls of all ages. Some light upon the phase of literary morality to which Mr. Benjamin called attention would just then have been specially helpful to me. But I found none, either in his opening question, or in his closing exclamation; and Mr. Palgrave's implied opinion, like Mr. Benjamin's own, fell far short of settling so grave a question.

Hundreds of teachers of English literature in America are either reading expurgated editions of the earlier writers with their classes, or apologizing for Chaucer and Shakspere and many others, by saying that the public morals of their day were so low that their writings gave no offence. The same excuse is surely due to all the great national epics, like the 'Iliad,' the 'Æneid,' and the 'Niebelungen Lied,' that have come out of the earlier and cruder civilizations. No doubt a more full and correct knowledge of the literature in its historic relations is gained through the use of the original texts in all their grossness. In those cases, however, where this is impracticable, as in most of our homes, in mixed classes, or where the pupils are in their teens, these great classics may be made available by the sacrifice of a small fraction of their value through slight omissions and alterations. Can a happy jingle atone for a lewd suggestion? That writer seems to me fortunate who, after a few centuries have made him anachronistic and ridiculous, finds a friend to throw a cloak upon his nakedness or deformity, and confer upon him the literary immortality to which he had every claim but one. Perhaps we owe a little dressing up to the old writers when we set them before a later generation with fashions that no merely poetic inspiration could anticipate. If, by the same act, we also meet an obligation to ourselves and to our children, and pay due respect to Christian civilization, we seem driven to a choice between expurgation and oblivion for many a valued classic.

Far be the day when American fathers need discourage reading in general on the part of their boys lest they be contaminated, as have some fathers in Germany, or when American mothers need restrict their unmarried daughters to a small portion of the literature read by other women, as is the fact in France. Some perils are inevitable; but let him be proclaimed an enemy of the republic who multiplies them! Even the public library, with all its marvellously increasing usefulness, brings poison to some minds. Thoughtful librarians, who find that Herrick is more read than the other British poets, and almost wholly by those who are least fit to profit by it, are heartily wishing it could be either "bowdlerized" or burned, provided no special restrictions may be put upon its circulation. Some safe way will here be found. Doubtless the publisher, after determining that his product is for popular rather than scholarly use, will recognize his interest and duty to make it decent, no less than to translate it out of a dead language into the vernacular. He will hardly ask if American readers have grown "too nice," but how nice they have grown, leaving it to the teachers of ethics and religion, when the people get over or under-nice, to set them right.

Close upon this follows the question whether art may properly suggest what is confessedly improper in language; but I only call attention to it as an issue soon to be met, and not necessarily to be decided on the precedent of art collections founded centuries ago. W. C. Sawyer.

Dresden, Saxony, December 23, 1886.

HISTORY AND THE GROUP SYSTEM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In quoting my article on "The Possible Limitations of the Elective System," from the December number of the Andover Review, you were prudent enough to pause at the right sentence. Had you gone one sentence further, you would have brought me the double mortification of seeing a blunder repeated. I stated that at Johns Hopkins University a "prospective lawyer" is forbidden Latin. He is not. On the contrary, every student pursuing the course there which fits for the law is obliged to read Tacitus and Livy. These authors are mentioned in the register under the heading of History, and reprehensibly escaped my notice.

I believe all the other exclusions mentioned exist. Prof. Adams, in his letter to you this week, points out that anybody may study as much history as he pleases outside his regular work, and also that a certain modicum of history is exacted before that work is begun. Both these statements are true and important, and so is a third statement—the only one made by me—that English history and American history enter as ingredients into but two of the seven groups of undergraduate study.—Respectfully yours,

G. H. Palmer.

Cambridge, January 7, 1887.

Notes.

HARPER & BROS. have nearly ready Dr. Franz von Reber's 'History of Mediæval Art,' translated by Joseph Thacher Clarke; 'Retrospection of America, 1797-1811,' by John Bernard, an English actor, edited from his MS. by Mrs. B. Bernard, with an introduction, notes and index by Laurence Hutton and Brander Matthews; 'Haifa, or Life in Modern Palestine,' by Laurence Oliphant, with an introduction by Chas. A. Dana; and 'A Tramp Trip: How to See Europe on Fifty Cents a Day,' by Lee Meriwether. In preparation are an 'Introduction to Psychological Theory,' by Borden P. Bowne, Professor of Philosophy in Boston University; 'Charles Reade: a Memoir,' edited by the Rev. Compton Reade and Chas. Luton Reade; and the second and last supplementary volume of McClintock and Strong's 'Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature,' making twelve volumes in all, and rounding out the twentieth year of publication.

Before the close of the present month G. P. Putnam's Sons expect to begin delivering to subscribers the first volume of Franklin's works, edited by Mr. John Bigelow. This edition embraces his private as well as his official and scientific correspondence, with much now printed for the first time, and also the unmutilated and correct version of the Autobiography. It will fill ten royal octavo volumes, uniform with Lodge's Hamilton, just published by the same firm, will not be stereotyped, and will be limited to 600 copies, a large part of which are already subscribed for. There will be several engravings on steel.

Thomas Whittaker issues this week Canon Luckock's 'The Bishops in the Tower: a Record of Stirring Events affecting the Church and Nonconformists from the Restoration to the Rebellion.'

A. D. F. Randolph & Co. will publish on February 1 the 'Life of James M. Hannington, First Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa,' by E. C. Dawson.

Rogers & Sherwood, 21 Barclay St., New York, will publish by subscription 'The History of the Confederate States Navy,' by J. Thomas Scharf of Baltimore, who writes, "not for pecuniary reward, . . . but from admiration of that service, of which I was a part." It will make one octavo volume of about 800 pages.

The issue of the first number of the Journal of Morphology (Boston: Ginn & Co.) has, by reason of a mechanical obstacle, been delayed till March.

'A Synopsis of the Nature and Effects of Alcohol and Narcotics,' by L. H. Luce, M.D., is announced by D. C. Heath & Co. It is intended for use in schools, directly, or through the teacher.

To describe or to praise Whitaker's Almanack to any one in quest of information concerning things British, is at the present day superfluous. That so much of the Empire could be condensed into such narrow bounds has always been a marvel of editing. The original size has at last been found quite inadequate, and has given way to a permanent enlargement to the extent of 160 pages. This compendium serves as an almanac in the ordinary sense, a great directory and statistical handbook, a statesman's year-book, etc., etc. For the Queen's Jubilee a succinct account of the principal events of her reign is given. A valuable abstract of Mr. Gladstone's Irish Government and Land Bills is added. And, for the rest, it may be said that anything sought for may be found in Whitaker, from lists of the peerage to members of Parliament, officers of the universities and colleges, colonial and foreign banks, hall marks on plate, volcanic eruptions of 1886, the year's weather, orders of chivalry, the English citizen's diary, and so forth without end. An index makes all this mass of intelligence readily accessible.

Cassell & Co. offer a prize of $25 to readers of their Family Magazine for the best practical paper on "The Domestic Service Difficulty in America," with suggestions for its solution—of no greater length than 2,000 to 3,000 words. The date for rendering these essays is March 1, 1887, on terms prescribed on page 448 of the last volume of the magazine.

Mr. C. D. Warner's 'Their Pilgrimage' (Harper & Bros.), which has been so welcome a feature of Harper's in the past year, is issued in a volume solidly bound in the old library style and of great typographical beauty. Mr. Reinhart's spirited and realistic illustrations, somewhat reduced to be accommodated to the page, are very attractive, and contribute to make an unusually handsome book. We have already commented upon the earlier chapters of the text; and the happy blending of travel and fiction which we looked forward to with confidence did, in fact, distinguish this story among the serials of the year. The appearance of the complete work allows one to appreciate better the wide area and the marked diversity of scene traversed, but the justice and delicacy of Mr. Warner's observations and the lightness of his manner are as noticeable on any page as in the whole. The rate of travel is perhaps too rapid for satisfaction; things are seen in haste and by glimpses, and of each watering place we have an outline sketch only. The idea was original and serviceable, but possibly fiction and travel, no matter how skilfully handled, are better apart.

In 'The Shakespearian Interpreter,' an address delivered by Dr. Rankin of Middlebury College, he pays a tribute to Mr. Hudson, the Shaksperian scholar, who was a graduate of the institution. The subject is really the interpreter of poetry in general, as if one should praise a man's profession instead of his work. Only a few paragraphs at the close are devoted to the critic personally. An examination and estimate of Hudson's real service to the study of Shakspere would be of use to his memory as well as to the public; but nothing of the sort is attempted in this memorial, though his work is very highly appraised in general terms.

We have already said our say, in the last volume of the Action, concerning Gogol's 'Âmes Mortes,' and should ere now have mentioned the translation, in two volumes, from the Russian by Isabel F. Hapgood ('Dead Souls,' T. Y. Crowell & Co.). Miss Hapgood's name is a guarantee of intelligent and faithful reproduction.

The English translation of 'Manon Lescaut' made by Arthur W. Gundry, and published in this city by F. T. Jones & Co., will, perhaps, only serve to increase the wonder that such a story should be a French classic—on the Anglo-Saxon assumption that nothing immoral or demoralizing, and unfit to be placed in the hands of children, could be deemed classical. The French style, we say, being abstracted, there remains only the story of a pair of worthless lives, conveying no useful lesson, and provocative of a false sentimentality. The book is handsomely printed, with plentiful illustrations from the French, kept within bounds.

Ginn & Co. have extended their series of "Classics for Children" with a second series of Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales, Scott's 'Ivanhoe,' and Miss Martineau's 'The Peasant and the Prince.' Likewise, the "Riverside Literature Series," issued monthly for schools by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., is increased by Franklin's 'Poor Richard's Almanac, and Other Papers,' with notes; and Part I. of Hawthorne's 'Tanglewood Tales.'

Shakspere's "As You Like It," Johnson's 'Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland,' 'Undine,' and Coleridge's 'Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit,' are the latest number in Prof. Morley's pocket "National Library" (Cassell & Co.).

The fourth series of the "Johns Hopkins Studies in Historical and Political Science" ends with a republication of Mr. Melville Egleston's paper upon "The Land System of the New England Colonies," first published in 1880. It makes a double number, 11 and 12. The importance of the subject and the excellence of the treatment warrant this method of giving it a larger circulation; but we are surprised that it was found possible, after six years of great activity in this field of research, to reissue it "without any change whatever from the original form." This we say not in the way of criticism, for we have not noticed any point in which revision would have improved the treatise; but as a testimonial to the solidity and thoroughness of the original work. This paper really belongs with the series of which it now forms a part, and affords a needed supplement and commentary to the special papers of Prof. Adams, Prof. Johnston, Dr. Channing, and others. The scope of the work can be judged by the titles of the nine sections into which it falls. These are: Original Sources of Title; Royal Grants; Grants of the Council for New England; Colonial Grants (three sections); and Land Communities (three sections). The details of these land communities—which, of course, were not family groups, and which yet were in many respects genuine communities—afford an interesting commentary and parallel to the communities of the early Germanic nations.

We have received a copy of a school edition of 'Cornelius Nepos,' edited by Karl Erbe, and published by Neff at Stuttgart. It has a large, handsome page, and serviceable notes at the foot of the page. The most distinctive feature of it is the illustrations, which are numerous, consisting of maps, portraits, coins, representations of armor, and other illustrations of ancient life, for the most part highly colored. The maps and plans are excellent, and so are many of the colored plates; the greater part of these, however, are on too small a scale and too inaccurate in delineation to be of much service. A portrait is good for nothing unless it really lets us know how a person looked, in feature and expression, as well as in general outline and bearing.

Prof. Francis W. Kelsey, in his edition of Cæsar's 'Gallic War' (Boston: John Allyn), has, like Erbe in the 'Nepos' just noticed, taken pains to illustrate the subject-matter of Cæsar's commentaries as well as his language. He gives six attractive plates representing Roman military works and implements of war, which, together with a chapter in the introduction on "The Roman Art of War in Cæsar's Time," will prove very helpful. The introduction contains also a sketch of Cæsar's life and character, and a chapter on "The Theatre of the Gallic War," with a brief account of the land, the peoples, and the history of Gaul. Especially noticeable are twelve good maps of battles, sieges, and campaigns, each of which occupies a page, and is conveniently placed just opposite the page of the text to be illustrated by it. Before the vocabulary are ten pages of well-selected Latin idioms and phrases, with their English equivalents. The notes are full and in general judicious, and altogether the edition is one to be welcomed.

The first number of Murray's Magazine comes to us from the International News Company. It appropriately starts off with a series of "Byroniana"—a poem, "Opening Lines to Lara," and some recollections of Mme. de Staël, written by Byron at Ravenna, August 4, 1821. It ends with the first part of a précis of Grant's autobiography by Matthew Arnold. The intervening articles, like "What is Germany About?" by George von Bunsen, are also attractive; but we may return to the number again.

The January Book-buyer (Chas. Scribner's Sons) contains the first likeness of "Uncle Remus" (Joel Chandler Harris) ever published.

A very great and equally welcome surprise is the revival of Le Français, under the editorship and business management of M. Jean de Peiffer, whose address is New England Conservatory of Music, Franklin Square, Boston. The proprietor and former editor, M. Jules Lévy, becomes a special editorial contributor, without pecuniary responsibility. We trust that this partnership is a guarantee of permanent success for the best French periodical ever founded in this country, and we are glad to renew our testimony to its special value as an adjunct to instruction in French, in schools or in private. Noteworthy in the January number is M. Lévy's skilful metrical translation of Whittier's stanzas on the Bartholdi statue.

The November number of the Antiquary opens with an agreeable article on "The Ancient Parish of Woking," by A. C. Bickley, which is continued in the December number. These papers, full of local detail, much of it of more than local interest, and told in a very interesting style, are a good example of the most useful work of this magazine. Next to this in order and in interest, in the November number, is Mr. C. E. Plumptre's paper on Lucilio Vanini, his life and philosophy, being the substance of a paper read in 1885 before the Aristotelian Society. This "martyr to the spirit of Rationalism" was burnt alive at Toulouse in 1619. Mr. Ordish's series upon the "London Theatres" treats of "The Fortune Playhouse" in November, and "The Red Bull" in December (with a curious cut). Another continued article (Nos. 2 and 3) is Mr. J. J. Foster's "On Some Miniature Painters and Enamellists who have flourished in England." In the December number is the third of Mr. J. H. Round's series of papers: "Is Mr. Freeman Accurate?" The inaccuracies pointed out in the present number seem to be on the whole the most serious detected by Mr. Round. They have reference to some Dorsetshire entries of Domesday Book, and to the imposition of Danegeld by the Conqueror; and in both cases the errors are certainly surprising. We look with interest for Mr. Freeman's defence; for, although a small matter in comparison with the great mass of his unquestioned learning, it is hard to see how the errors here pointed out can be explained.

Some useful suggestions can be got from the designs for book-cases which accompany the leading article in Le Livre for December; but, as a whole, the series is more fantastic than beautiful. M. L. Derôme tells of an anonymous and not very valuable work by Balzac, 'Le Code Conjugal,' and also throws a good deal of light and a little cold water on the "original edition" of "Ruy Blas" discovered by M. Jolly Bavoillot from his easy-chair in this city. Under the head of literary news will be found some interesting details concerning the regular photographic department now attached to the Bibliothèque Nationale and to the Library of the Arsenal, ready to meet the steady demand for permission to make facsimiles.

Among the announcements of new books to be published in Paris this winter is a volume by Leconte de Lisle, 'Poèmes Lyriques,' and a new volume of poems by M. Paul Bourget, of which the three books into which it is divided are called respectively Hélène, Dalila, Antigone. The novel of M. Bourget, which has been appearing in the feuilleton of the Débats, is now finished and will soon be published in a volume. It is called 'André Cornélis,' and it is a version, brought down into modern Parisian life, of the story of "Hamlet." During the winter two new works by André Theuriet will also appear, 'La Vie Rustique,' with illustrations by Léon Lhermitte, and a story of provincial family life with the promising title, 'Au Paradis des Enfants.'

The sum of about $2,000 for erecting a statue to François Arago, and collected for this purpose at the time of his death, thirty-two years ago, is in the hands of the Paris Academy of Sciences. Admiral Mouchez, director of the Paris Observatory, will receive additional subscriptions, and the Committee propose the early erection of the statue in the southern part of the meridian line passing through the Observatory, of which Arago was the director from 1811 to 1853.

The Pushkin celebration in 1880 formed an epoch in the study of that writer, and it may be said, without exaggeration, that his personal biography, as well as a reasonably adequate estimate of his historical significance, has only existed since that date. Bielinsky and his successors, including even Annenkoff, with his 'Materials,' were too nearly contemporaries of the poet to furnish full biographical and literary details, and to state properly the great historical fact of his appearance. Much work remained to be done, and a great deal of it was concentrated about 1880, in expectation of the literary triumph. Much also followed that event. All works previous to 1880 were subjected to unfriendly and suspicious oversight. The future historian and biographer of Pushkin will have at his disposal a vast mass of valuable material. One of his most invaluable aids will be V. I. Mezhoff's 'Pushkiniana. Bibliographical Index of Articles on the Life of Alexander Sergeivitch Pushkin, his Works, and the Productions of Literature and Art Evoked by Them.' It is published by the Imperial Alexander Lyceum, and is a volume of 400 pp., containing 4,587 items, with an index of names, objects, places, works and editions of Pushkin, and of translations into foreign languages; also, an index to miscellaneous publications and collections in which writings of Pushkin occur, as well as articles on his life and works. All journalistic literature from 1813 down to the present time has been examined for it.

Prof. Bonney of London received a short time ago from Sir Julius von Haast a small packet of volcanic dust from New Zealand, his examination of which he reports in a late number of Nature. The dust fell on June 10 of last year (the day of the Tarawera eruption) at Matakava, Hicks Bay, 115 miles from the scene of the eruption. Prof. Bonney describes the dust as being very fine, and of a dull, darkish gray color when regarded in the mass, but when examined in the microscope it may be divided into (1) bits of a more or less scoriaceous aspect, consisting of a somewhat brownish glass containing much disseminated ferrite, and (2) chips more or less transparent, generally not exceeding five-thousandths of an inch in diameter, and of all dimensions downwards to the finest dust. The majority of the latter are glass, commonly quite colorless, some of them containing bubbles, spherical, spheroidal, or more or less cylindrical, many of them showing a ridgy surface and evidently formed by the destruction of a very frothy pumice like that of Krakatoa. The results of Prof. Bonney's examination lead him to conclude that the dust is formed of material which was a glass wherein a porphyritic structure, on a large or a minute scale, was inconspicuous. Neither sulphur, pyrite, nor magnetite was noticed in a recognizable form.

—With the ninth volume, Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge brings to a close his laborious edition of the 'Works of Alexander Hamilton' (Putnams). It is wholly occupied with the 'Federalist,' as to the text of which Mr. Lodge has justly preferred the untouched original, and in numbering it followed the first edition of 1788. His annotations are few, and confined to the more significant changes made after the first publication. In the introduction he sets forth clearly the vexed question of authorship as between Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, and ends by expressing, undogmatically, a personal preference for Hamilton's claims over those of his associates. It is curious that the argument from internal evidence should be dismissed so easily. Take, for example, No. 54, which five of the Hamilton lists assign to Jay. It includes a defence of the slave-representation clause of the Constitution, and, whatever may be said of the style, its unmorality is quite consonant with that trait of Hamilton's which distinguishes him as a statesman. Of course Madison might equally have framed the apology put in the mouth of a Southerner. Jay, one thinks, an open opponent of slavery, would have been found, of choice, vindicating some less objectionable part of the compact; and, in fact, out of the five letters attributable to him, only one deals with a specific clause—that on treaty-making, naturally reserved for his pen, which had already devoted three letters to the general subject of foreign relations. Mr. Lodge is able to improve somewhat on Mr. Dawson's bibliography of the 'Federalist,' of which the most singular editions are certainly the French and the Portuguese. The appendix contains the Articles of Confederation, the Federal Constitution to date, a list of omitted letters already printed in the J. C. Hamilton edition of 1850, Fendall's index to the 'Federalist,' and a pretty large table of errata, mostly typographical. On the whole, the public is under decided obligations to Mr. Lodge and his publishers.

—The study of Browning continues to be prolific of books. 'Browning's Women,' by Mary E. Burt (Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co.), has a short introduction, in the nature of a card of recommendation written in haste, by Rev. E. E. Hale. The text is less analytic than descriptive, and, in fact, like much current Browning criticism, is largely a turning of the poems into prose. The author has independence and a touch of vivacity. She remarks that Balaustion is "a far closer portrait of a real American girl than our own literature affords"; and she strews her paraphrases with "sentiments" respecting the character and conduct of the women in question at the moment, which exhibit her stalwart convictions. Thus, of the woman in "Numpholeptos"—"She has heart enough, but she does not intend to give a brain in exchange for mere unreasoning affection"; or, in connection with Lady Carlisle, she says of womanly sacrifice in the Christian spirit: "There is a vast difference between dying to save a world of sinners to eternal life, and living to feed the selfishness of an unappreciative man, whose selfishness but grows the larger the more it is fed." So there is, no doubt. How far the womanly ideal in the nineteenth century exceeds that of the fourteenth, appears from her criticism of Beatrice meeting Dante—"standing unmoved with her eyes fast fixed on the eternal wheels. Instead of receiving him with the love that his life's devotion might seem to warrant, she proceeds at once to give him a lesson in astronomy, and her theories on the subject have since then all been proven false." Browning, she says, does things better; but after this curiously vapid deliverance, one is only surprised at the moderation of the remark, "I think the best critics of the day concede that Robert Browning is the only poet since Dante that has ever reached his altitude." After all, she is not sure that he has quite done justice to woman, and would not deny that there are grounds for "ominous s of rebellion in Browning Sections" on this pic; but at least, she says, he "is certainly a ng way ahead of those men who are egotistic enough and comical enough to assign woman her sphere. In no place is man so ludicrous and amusing as when doing that." Our "Shakspere" must wait a little longer for his Mrs. Jameson. A second volume, 'An Introduction to the Study of Browning,' by Arthur Symons (Cassell & Co.), is exceptional in its class. Its prefatory essay is the work of a very ardent admirer; but the critic is not wholly swallowed up in the devotee, and the critic in this case has a clear head and some sense of the logic of poetry. He is, moreover, candid and reasonable, and if one differs from him in some of his judgments, one does so with respect. The body of his thin book is occupied with analyses, descriptions, paraphrases, etc., of the work of Browning in chronological order, and both the method employed and the limits observed are admirable. At the end are a bibliography and a reprint of early prefaces. This volume, with Mrs. Orr's excellent handbook (the treasury on which the lesser Browning "expositors" all draw), will afford sufficient aid for any Browning classes.

—Sir G. W. Cox, the well-known author of the 'History of Greece' and 'The Crusades,' has just added to the long list of books from his pen a work deserving much commendation, namely, 'A Concise History of England and the English People' (London: Joseph Hughes, 1887). Its main object is, in the words of the Preface, "to make as prominent as possible the personal career of the chief actors in the several parts of the great drama. The work is intended strictly as an introduction to a more continuous study of the subject; and the matter, it is hoped, has been so put as to awaken and call into action the reader's powers of thought and judgment. . . . These chapters may also, it is hoped, exhibit the unity of English history and the continuous and steady political growth of the people from the days of Aelle and Cerdic to our own, and leave the reader fully acquainted with the principles of English constitutional history." If "fairly well acquainted" be substituted in the last sentence for "fully acquainted," it may be said that the author has accomplished his purpose with much success. A commendable feature of the work is the judicious mixture of Culturgeschichte with external political history. Here and there the author briefly weighs the relative merits of original authorities, in order that the reader may obtain some conception of the canons of historical criticism—for example, in giving the stories of Vortigern and Rowena (p. 21), the Massacre of St. Brice (pp. 80-82), and the Parentage of Thomas Becket (pp. 197-198). The book contains only 527 small octavo pages, being much briefer than 'The Students' Hume,' and less than half as large as Green's 'Short History of the English People.' As a text-book for college use, it is in some respects superior to both of these, while its brevity and the absence of the usual concomitants of a text-book will commend it to those who wish hurriedly to refresh their minds on the salient points of English history. There is not a single map—a defect which ought to be remedied in a future edition.

—A correspondent writes us from Munich:

"At the Aspinwall sale of pictures, which took place at Chickering Hall last spring, Mr. L. A. Lanthier is said to have given $1,025 for Piloty's 'The Death of Wallenstein.' As the original painting is still one of the chief attractions of the New Pinakothek in Munich and the artist never duplicated it, the work bought by Mr. Lanthier must have been a copy. There are, however, only three copies, taken directly from the original, in existence. The first is a half-sized copy made in 1881 by Mr. Benjamin F. Landis, a young American artist residing in Munich, and sold to a Milanese banker. A second, somewhat larger, copy was made by Mr. Lederer for a gentleman in North Germany; and about two years ago a third, half-sized, copy was made by Mr. Landis for the Hon. Andrew D. White of Cornell University. But inasmuch as copies two and three are still in the possession of the persons who ordered them, the picture purchased by Mr. Lanthier must be Mr. Landis's first copy, or else, which is hardly probable, the copy of a copy. Mr. Landis is well known in Munich as an exceedingly clever and conscientious copyist, not only of the old masters, but also of the most famous modern painters; and the fact that one of his copies should have been sold as an original in New York at more than double the price he charged for it, or would now charge for making a similar work, is more creditable to his skill than it is to the honesty of the dealers or the knowledge and critical judgment of the connoisseurs. One of the principal reasons why many distinguished painters refuse to permit their pictures to be copied is the fear lest the copies should fall into the hands of American dealers, or, more frequently, of European dealers in America, and be palmed off on the ignorant or unwary as originals. Mr. Lanthier's experience at the Aspinwall sale would seem to show that this fear is not wholly unfounded."

—So far as the United States are concerned, the necrology of 1886 was chiefly marked by the number of Presidential candidates who, like ex-President Arthur, passed away. We include in the term both actual nominees like Gen. Hancock, Horatio Seymour, and Samuel J. Tilden, and also so narrow a miss as Charles Francis Adams, and those candidates in petto David Davis and Gen. Logan; the last having been besides a defeated nominee for the Vice-Presidency. A constructive Vice-President and even (for a day) President, David R. Atchison, of subsequent Border-Ruffian notoriety, may be ranged in the same category. John Kelly is associated with the foregoing as an unsuccessful President-maker or unmaker. In the corresponding high places of the world, King Ludwig of Bavaria is the one sovereign whom death claimed. Some statesmen—and one, at least, eminent—we have already enumerated. Of high rank abroad were Beust, Minghetti, the Comte de Falloux; and mentionable also are Server Pasha and W. E. Forster. Paul Bert we had better class among the scientists, where his title will not be disputed. Beside him let us name Theodor von Oppolzer, the astronomer, and the Nestor of American naturalists, Isaac Lea. The adventurous Hobart Pasha and the other chief military names recall our civil war: Hancock and Logan, as above, with Gen. David Hunter, Gen. Geo. H. Gordon, and Loring Pasha. Art has been deprived of Paul Baudry, K. Daubigny, Édouard Frère, Meyer "von Bremen," Carl Piloty, A. B. Durand, among the painters—the sole American on the list being also an honored name among our native engravers on steel; Léon Gaucherel, the etcher; Randolph Caldecott, a versatile artist; our sculptor, H. K. Brown, and admirable architects, J. Wrey Mould and H. H. Richardson, with their English confrère, James Fergusson; our art student and critic, Charles C. Perkins and Earl Shinn. In music, Liszt's name overtops all others.

—The poets for whom the past year was their last were Victor von Scheffel, Sir Henry Taylor, Sir Samuel Ferguson, Dean Trench, and our Paul Hayne—a wide range of talent, achievement, and distinction. The list of historians is perhaps more brilliant, headed as it is by the veteran Ranke, and including Waitz, Duncker, Wilhelm Scherer, Julian Schmidt, Armand Baschet, Sir Erskine May. Brief but shining is the list of philologians that consists of Madvig, the first Latinist of the age, and Leopold Zunz, a giant in the field of Hebrew criticism. We have already overlapped the vague territory of "literature," which yet yields us at one extreme "Ned Buntline" (Edward Judson), at another the editor and commentator of Shakspere, Henry N. Hudson, and joins with them Sheldon Amos, the publicist, John Esten Cooke, the novelist, or John Russell Bartlett, author of much besides his 'Dictionary of Americanisms'; and should not be allowed to exclude that rare scholar if too infrequent writer, E. W. Gurney. J. Hetzel, an author ("P. J. Stahl") of conspicuous merit, is a connecting link between that craft and the publishers, of whom Sampson Low, J. B. Lippincott, and D. Van Nostrand were also withdrawn from their labors. Henry Stevens "of Vermont," again, binds the publishers to the librarians, and here a bright example was extinguished in the person of the learned and amiable Henry Bradshaw, of Cambridge University. By himself we mention Alexander Ostrovski, the popular Russian dramatist; and our list is now dwindling to individual representatives—such as F. von Tschudi, the South American traveller; or R. R. Madden, the Irish philanthropist; or J. B. Gough, the unparalleled temperance orator; or Austin Flint, the good physician; or William Hunter, the pillar of the Department of State when all around was "rotating in office"; or that other pillar, on whom the Knights of Labor fell and were pulverized, H. M. Hoxie; or Edgar Bauer, the German political agitator; or John Humphrey Noyes, founder of the Oneida Community, and memorable illustration of the capacity of New England to breed religious fanatics; or Richard M. Hoe, associated with the enormous advance in the power of the press and the popularization of literature in all its forms; or, finally, of that skilled manipulator and inventive genius, Joseph Albert, pioneer in those various forms of gelatine printing which have revolutionized the art of photography and done wonders for book illustration.

—The opening and principal paper of the Scottish Geographical Magazine for December is "The Position of Dr. Emin Bey," by R. W. Felkin, M.D., his friend and correspondent. Dr. Schnitzler (Emin Bey) is one of Gen. Gordon's officers, having been for the past twelve years connected with the Egyptian Equatorial Provinces, for the first four as Surgeon-General and since 1878 as Governor. He is described as a remarkable linguist, with great scientific attainments, as well as showing "wonderful ability in dealing with the natives." When he assumed the government, only a belt of land along the Nile was under control, and there was an annual deficit of £38,000. In three years the whole province, nearly as large as Europe, with a population of 6,000,000, had been reduced to order, and he had a surplus of £8,000, obtained "by the practice of rigid economy and the suppression of abuses." He has constructed roads, established a post between the forty stations, and taught the people weaving and the cultivation of cotton, coffee, rice, indigo, and wheat. Since 1883 he has been practically cut off from the world, having been compelled by repeated attacks of the Mahdi's forces to abandon all his stations except those on the Nile from Lado to Lake Albert. He is said still to have some 2,000 soldiers with him, out of a former 6,000, all negroes. Of the bravery and endurance of these men under "incredible privations and sufferings" he speaks in the highest terms, saying, in one of his letters recently received, that these events have proved to him "that the black race is in valor and courage inferior to no other, while in devotion and self-denial it is superior to many." His present situation is very precarious, as his ammunition is probably exhausted and his escape to the south is cut off by the defeat and death last spring of his ally, the King of the Unyoro, by the murderer of Bishop Hannington, the King of the Uganda. But if he had had any intention of escaping, he has given this up, as the last letter received from him, dated July 7, 1886, says, "I have come to the determination to hold out here with my people." From this letter it also appears that he continues his work of instructing the people of the various stations still in his possession in manufactures and agriculture, besides adding largely to his scientific collections. Dr. Felkin discusses the various routes proposed for the relief expedition. These are four in number, the most direct of which is through Masai Land, and would take at least four to five months to reach Emin Bey after leaving Zanzibar. This route, as well as the one proposed by Stanley by way of the Victoria Nyanza and Uganda, he objects to, on the ground that the approach of an armed expedition to this latter country would almost certainly lead to a determined resistance, as well as the murder of the captive missionaries. His preference (and it should be remembered that he writes with a personal knowledge of the country) is for a more southern and western route, by which all danger of contact with the hostile king could be avoided. The German appointee of Gordon pays in his correspondence a glowing tribute to his chief. Gordon thus refers to him, a year earlier, in his journal: "The other day he called the Doctor (who, by the way, is a German, and who, now professing the Mussulman religion, pretends to me that he is an Arab by birth and religion. Emin Effendi is his name in Arabic). Well, Mtesa sent for him, etc., etc."

SEELEY'S NAPOLEON.

A Short History of Napoleon the First. By John Robert Seeley, London: Seeley & Co.; Boston: Roberts Bros.

PROF. SEELEY is an eminent teacher of history; he is hardly an historian. He cannot rank with Macaulay, with Carlyle, with Gardiner, or with Freeman. He is not a philosophical thinker; no one would dream of placing him by the side, for example, of John Stuart Mill. He is not a critic of the first class, such as Matthew Arnold or Swinburne. He does not possess a style of the first order: he cannot for a moment compare—to confine ourselves to his contemporaries—with Goldwin Smith or with Maine. For all this, his writings exert wide and deserved influence. If we seek for the source of his power we can do nothing better than study with care his 'Short History of Napoleon.' The book betrays in a moment the nature and limits of Prof. Seeley's strength. He is without a rival in handling the paradox of commonplace. His essential ideas are notions which, be they false or true, are the property of the world. His mode of stating them is the manner of a man who maintains powerfully a disputed thesis. Hence flows a double advantage: our author's teaching is accepted because it coincides with current opinion, while his teaching excites attention because it has the air of novelty. Nor in all this is there the least affectation. Prof. Seeley is a most sincere writer. His ideas, we take it, are his own, for he has thought them out for himself, but they are the ideas of a great number of persons besides Prof. Seeley. His presentation of them is forcible and makes an impression, and has impressed Prof. Seeley himself before it impresses his readers. He is a dupe to his own art. He places received notions in a rather new light, or, more strictly, expresses them in a new form, and makes others believe, because he believes himself, that he has propounded new truths.

Let any critic who doubts this analysis of the substance and manner of Prof. Seeley's teaching, weigh well the paragraphs which conclude his estimate of Napoleon's place in history:

"When," he writes, "we review the career of Frederick the Great, we cannot refrain, however severely we may judge his crimes, from reflecting that, after all, his monument is modern Germany. That solid structure remains to honor the workman who did so much to build it. It is, in the main, just such a structure as Frederick would have desired to see, as he intended to found. For Napoleon, too, it may be said that modern France, in its internal constitution, is his monument. Its institutions are in the main the work of his reign. But this is the monument of that earlier Napoleon who was the child of his age. The Napoleon who was himself, who executed his iron plans with almost unlimited power, has no monument. All that he built, at such a cost of blood and tears, was swept away before he himself ended his short life."

Let our supposed critic further, when he has read these paragraphs, reflect that they conclude, and, as it were, sum up an elaborate estimate of the most conspicuous personality at a great crisis of the world's history, and then consider whether the Regius Professor of Modern History is doing anything better than repeat in a forcible style the traditional English view of the greatest among England's enemies. Seeley's verdict on Napoleon is in effect that Napoleon himself achieved nothing. Of his works, some, indeed, live after him, but these are the monument of the Napoleon who was the child of his age, and ought not therefore to be put down to his credit. The works which were his own perished at his death. All that he really achieved, therefore, was evil, and, like most things evil—according, at any rate, to received ideas—perishable.

Nor let it be supposed that we do our author injustice in taking the last paragraphs of his book as samples of the whole. No doubt it is his intention to give a fair estimate of Napoleon, but there is not a single chapter of criticism which does not in some way or other impugn the Emperor's title to fame. His rise to power, we are taught, is nothing extraordinary, because the Revolution had opened a career for every one, and some one of low origin was certain to gain supreme authority. His conquests, it is intimated, were less marvellous than they appear, because Napoleon had in his hands the absolute control of an instrument for war such as has never fallen within the grasp of any other commander. The French armies were, when he took them in hand, a military instrument of such efficiency and potency as we shall not find again if we search the whole of history, and Napoleon controlled this instrument more absolutely than any other leader has ever controlled the forces at his command. His invincibility is itself nothing better than a received fiction; his failures were at least as great as his successes. Nor can his performances boast originality. "In the quality as well as in the quantity of his performance we may trace the working of circumstances. By circumstances he was shaped as well as favored." His policy itself, and especially his hostility to England, was simply the policy of the old French Foreign Office designed on a gigantic scale and put into effect with stupendous energy; and this traditional enmity, which possessed not even the merit of originality, was, according to Prof. Seeley, at once the explanation of Napoleon's most inexplicable acts and the cause of his easily avoidable ruin. Napoleon's very wickedness bears about it, according to his critic, an air of plagiarism: his lawlessness is an imitation of Frederick, or else the common characteristic of all revolutionary adventurers.

No doubt Prof. Seeley inserts here and there throughout his criticism saving clauses, which suggest that perhaps he himself suspects that you have hardly accounted for a great man's career by enumerating all the qualities in which he was not specially great, or at any rate not specially original. Cromwell resembled in many points scores of Puritan soldiers, and this resemblance was itself, to a certain degree, a source of power; but it is because Cromwell p[ossessed] some gift not to be found in the troopers or even in the officers with whom he took [counsel.] that Cromwell became Lord Protector. Napoleon shared many of the vices of the Jacobin to whom he originally belonged; his mere military genius may not, it is possible, have surpassed that of Moreau. But Robespierre perished on the scaffold amid universal execration; Moreau effected nothing as a politician, and, by joining the enemies of his country, cast on his own reputation a slur more permanent than could be branded upon it by the jealousy and injustice of his rival. Napoleon ruled France with such success that thirty-five years after Waterloo his traditionary fame reëstablished the Empire. We may feel absolutely sure that such success arose, in part at least, from the fact that there is to be found in Napoleon some quality not to be found in Robespierre, or Moreau, or a score of other competitors who started in the race for power with at least as fair chances as Napoleon Bonaparte.

We suspect that Prof. Seeley, if hard pressed, would reply that this peculiar quality is to be found in Napoleon's special unscrupulosity, and, let us add, special selfishness. He was as daring as Danton, and dared all not that France might be free, but for the sake of a much more attainable object—that is, for the sake of making Napoleon ruler of France. However this be, one thing is clear, Prof. Seeley's view of Napoleon is the view, and no other, which has been handed down to us from the generation of Englishmen who shared the sacrifices and witnessed the vicissitudes of the great war. It is, as we have said, the traditional English view, formed by English opinion, of the great enemy of England. Now the point on which we wish to insist is that this received view, which has been revived, confirmed, and restated by Lanfrey, is all that Prof. Seeley has to contribute towards our understanding of one of the most singular characters that ever appeared on the stage of history; and that this piece of splendid commonplace is put forward as though it were a new analysis of Napoleon's character. Prof. Seeley warns us that "to find a measure for great men—that is, men whose energy of action and whose sphere of action have been exceptional—is much more difficult than is usually supposed"; and that the difficulty is specially great in the case of Napoleon, as may be judged from the wide divergence in the estimates whether of historians such as Thiers on the one side and Lanfrey on the other, or of intelligent and impartial contemporaries, such as Goethe on the one hand and Jefferson or Southey on the other. Prof. Seeley tells us that he proposes "to inquire how much and in what manner Napoleon was favored and shaped by circumstances, and afterwards to consider how much remains to be explained by personal idiosyncrasy." Our hopes are raised high. We expect a new portrait of one of the most singular among the world's heroes. Prof. Seeley, when he draws aside the curtain, bids us treat as an adequate likeness the old and well-worn portrait or caricature of the "Corsican usurper," which for now well-nigh a century has been known to all Englishmen from their childhood. Never, surely, did any author show greater confidence in the paradox of commonplace.

CARLYLE'S EARLY LETTERS.

Early Letters of Thomas Carlyle. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. 1814-1826. Macmillan & Co. 1886.

THE literary handling of the mortal career of Thomas Carlyle has exhibited all the faults of which biography is capable. It has long been understood that very few men can write their with veracity. Autobiographies are ...ful because they exhibit something of ...al charm or make tacit confession of weak... and singularities, as a genuine, sincere, vigo... character does in his real human intercourse; ...f they do not serve in the place of formal and impartial narrative of events and the view of personality from the outside. A man in the course of his life suffers many changes; his intellectual and frequently his moral point of view varies, and with each decade his past takes on a new perspective; he can never reproduce in imagination, still less in memory, what he was as he was; his identity, to risk a paradox, is self-effacing. Carlyle, in writing his Reminiscences, was peculiarly at a disadvantage; he was in a mood of suffering, and he saw his past through the cloud of recent bereavement, which distorted its elements. His genius itself, so powerfully imaginative, and his emotion, which seems to have deprived him of the saving faculty of humor in some portions of his subject, were both against him; and, besides, he was an old man. Of the utmost value in the impersonal parts and of great moral interest in all that concerns himself (so far as his words are the judgment passed by a man upon his deeds at the close of his career), his Autobiography is but a small part of the material for his Life, and is directly of worth for that purpose only as it is supported by the day-to-day record of documents, by the observation of others, and by his own books. It was necessary that some one else should undertake the task of examining and reducing the copious materials which were in existence for a full biography.

Carlyle was scarcely more fortunate in his choice of one to intrust this labor to than he was in his selection of himself as the scribe of his works and days. Froude, if one considers only the judgment of the man, showed himself lacking not only in reticence and tact, but in any proper understanding of the nature of the Carlyles. This was a "grievous fault," and fatal to his success in the mere capacity of biographer. The trouble is not so much that he was indiscreet, and told more of the truth than good taste and friendly devotion to a friend's better self would warrant; but he made his blabbing disclosures without right discrimination, and so presented and arranged the facts, so moulded them with his own mistaken conceptions, and colored them with what is essentially prejudice, that they served, no otherwise than as did Carlyle's own autobiographical writings, to give wrong impressions. The facts are thrown into confusion by the brooding of Carlyle in the one case and the perversion of Froude in the other.

So much has been clear this long time, but it now appears that Froude was guilty of gross negligence in his editorial work, as has been brought out by the comparison of the original materials with his printed transcripts; and he is further charged with warping the narrative by giving to certain parts of it a bias unfavorable to the Carlyles, in the face of the evidence before him. The only inference to be drawn is, that he was equally as careless in reading and sifting the original manuscripts as he was in attending to their correct publication. The case against him is already strong enough to convict. It is Carlyle, however, and not Froude for whom the world feels concern. Both the Autobiography and the authorized Life have elements of untrustworthiness in them as records of the exact truth of events and as portrayals of characters. Under the circumstances, what is there left for a friend of Carlyle who feels the injustice of this state of the case to the principals involved, except to publish faithfully such of the originals as may give to the public opportunity to correct, at first hand, the opinions formed on the grounds of Carlyle's confessions and Froude's narrative?

This is the task which Prof. Norton has charged himself with, and the first volume of his work is before us. He attempts no narrative; the time has gone by for that. He merely prints seriatim letters of Carlyle from his nineteenth to his thirty-first year, up to the day of his marriage to Jane Welsh, and includes a few letters to Carlyle which are essentially illustrative of the changing situation. He adds occasionally a note of elucidation, and at the end devotes a brief appendix to the more important misstatements of Froude. The plan of the work is thus the same as that of the Emerson-Carlyle correspondence, previously edited by him. The substance, one need not say, is vastly different. These are the letters of a youth to two or three college mates, to his parents and brothers, and to the young lady whom he was destined to marry. They are the expression of a dutiful son and brother and of an interested friend, in regard to matters of family concern, his own health, his studies, pursuits, prospects; they are no more than this, for even in those letters to Jane Welsh which Prof. Norton has thought it not unbecoming to publish, with one exception, Carlyle is the student and not distinctly the lover. He was engaged during these years either in teaching school or in private tutoring, with literature in the shape of hackwork slowly taking more and more of his time to its special service, until in the last year he was fully in the harness as a professional translator. It is not to be expected that he would have much of consequence to communicate, and, so far as intrinsic worth goes, we must frankly say there is little in these epistles that need detain the attention of men. It is singular that there should be so slight intimation of any formed opinions; the young Edinburgher, periodically returning to the folks at home, read a great deal and thought about it, estimated it, wrote it out in the way of biography and translation, but had practically nothing of his own to say; or at any rate he did not intrust his meditations to letters. His mind was not developed. Carlyle, in the thoughts by which the world knows him, was not there.

What was there, however, was Carlyle's temperament. The native endowment of the youth stands out all the clearer because unconfused with any opinions. What this was is well enough understood: a quick eye for the oddities of human nature; a sound judgment of men, seemingly intuitive in its operation, but owing much to his inherited moral perceptiveness; ready intelligence, and a susceptibility to the poetic and the grotesque in man's life, so fruitful in later years; and, above all, the moral sense which was the main feeder of his genius. These things are to be felt continuously in his letters. Something of his style is also observable—lacking in brilliancy and power, but essentially there. For the rest, the only other thing which belongs to the indubitable Carlyle of fame is his dyspepsia. He writes of it from the first with an objurgatory vigor which has more of the distinct prophecy of his future in it than anything else to be found in the volume; and it is abundantly manifest, whether altogether because of this early and painful infliction or not, that he was an irritable person to live with, sharp-spoken, querulous, and hard-grained. He was proud toward the world, discontented, and ambitious; his own opinion of himself, happily justified by the event, was fully sufficient to sustain him in times of difficulty and struggle of heart and hope, and he was fully conscious of his superiority at all points.

The portion of the volume which is occupied with his letters to his parents, and their replies, is by far the most interesting; but less on Carlyle's account than as a picture of Scotch life. This special value was one reason why Prof. Norton included so large a number of the family letters, as he says in his preface. The letters to Miss Welsh are mostly letters of advice respecting composition, without any marked character, and those of them which are not in the vein of "the guide, philosopher, and friend" are not very significant. The total value of the collection, consequently, is, as has been said, not great in itself. A hard-headed young Scotchman, well-met among his few friends, attached to his kin, and bound to get on by literature in which he had the wit to find the best—such was Carlyle from the close of his boyhood to his marriage in full manhood. His character, had he ended then, would have been nothing to the world, and we suspect that the story of these twelve years will be oftener used to illustrate the late maturing of a strong genius than as any other kind of a proof-text.

The points in which the story, here spread before the reader in the original documents, differs from the account rendered by Froude in his own words, necessarily relate to the nature and relations of a few persons. They have no immediate intellectual interest; in fact, the whole subject belongs in the region of world gossip, which differs from village gossip only in the eminence of the persons involved. It was inevitable, after Froude's publication, but it was no less unfortunate, that public attention should be diverted from the intellectual history of Carlyle to the special point whether he treated his wife well. The moral ideals of Carlyle were neglected, the history of their genesis and development fell far into the background, and the question now asked was, What was his own moral practice in daily life? It is a pertinent inquiry in the cases of all men who assume to be public teachers; it is often a useful one. But in Carlyle's case it is complicated by the fact that, in the particulars in which it is commonly held that he failed of manliness, he seems to have been unconscious of his errors at the time of committing them. Defects of nature, rather than dereliction of duty, are brought out in his family history; he was hard, selfish, and dull in some matters, but he was too much absorbed in his own life to be habitually conscious of these faults, though he was aware of them momentarily from time to time. His wrong-doing in these respects began early. He indulged his weaknesses of temper amid his own people, and often expressed contrition in words which plainly apply, not to single acts, but to a general course of conduct.

The main question, however, in these early years of his life concerns the position of Edward Irving in the group, and the circumstances which led to Carlyle's engagement with Miss Welsh and the feelings which the lovers entertained towards each other. Froude inspires the belief that Miss Welsh's attachment to Irving was of a deep and lasting kind, and that it remained in her heart in the state of a blighted affection. This circumstance, he says, Carlyle did not realize. Secondly, he intimates that the marriage was brought to pass by the interference of others, whose action at least hastened it; that Carlyle exhibited a selfish temper in the preliminary arrangements for a home, and showed himself in other ways something less than a man of sense and breeding. Prof. Norton controverts Froude on all these points, which he treats of in his appendix. The evidence, so far as it is contained in the Carlyle love-letters, is not before the public: but Prof. Norton, while withholding it, clearly states that in his opinion this correspondence affords a view of Carlyle's and Jane Welsh's characters and mutual relations "different both in particulars and general effect from that given by Mr. Froude." So far as Irving is involved, Carlyle, while mentioning him with friendliness, has a clear eye for his foolishness, as he thinks it; and Miss Welsh, Prof. Norton says, came to see "his essential weakness—his vanity, his mawkish sentimentality, his self-deception, his extravagance verging to cant in matters of religion." This seems to put an end to any notion that in her wedded life she compared her lot with Carlyle to "what might have been."

To follow into detail the other minor matters would carry us too far. It appears, from Prof. Norton's account, that Froude has misstated the part taken by Mrs. Montague in the affairs of the lovers; that both of them were equally disposed at first to be content with an affection short of the point of marriage; and that, in the practical arrangements looking to their union, Carlyle's selfishness is not to be discerned, and more especially that Miss Welsh did not perceive any such defect in him, as Froude alleges, but on the contrary expressed her entire faith in him, regard for him, and the devotedness that belongs to the relation she was about to assume towards him. It is too soon to judge of the effect of these letters and controversial notes upon Carlyle's reputation. This present volume covers but a brief period; it remains to be seen whether Froude has misrepresented the wedded life, as he has the years before marriage. We have always regretted the labored discussion of the intimate domestic life of the Carlyles; the necessity to go over such ground again makes the matter doubly unfortunate. Yet Carlyle is entitled to the benefit of all that can be adduced in his behalf, and, at the least, should have the case stated exactly. Prof. Norton has nothing more in mind than to exhibit the papers in the simplest state, and to allow them to do the justice to Carlyle which his biographer, by his misinterpretations and inaccuracies, denied. This is the labor of a friend, and the end and issue of it will be awaited with interest.

BANCROFT'S CONQUEST OF CALIFORNIA.

California. Vol. V. 1846–48. [History of the Pacific States of North America. By Hubert Howe Bancroft. Vol. XVII.] San Francisco: The History Company. 1886.

THE changed name of the publishing firm by which this volume is issued indicates of itself that the fortunes of Mr. Bancroft's enterprise have been subject to some recent calamity. Our readers, however, will no longer need to be reminded afresh that a severe loss by fire threatened, not long since, to put an end to Mr. Bancroft's entire series of Pacific Coast Histories, and that, with commendable energy, the injured firm not only managed to reorganize for the purpose of continuing the publication of the histories, but also succeeded in permitting only the slightest delay to intervene before the appearance of the present volume. This successful resistance to misfortune is certainly a matter for general congratulation.

Previous reviews have prepared our readers to expect much of this crowning volume of the early California series. We think that there will be no disappointment with the book as published. The same hand is at work here as in previous volumes of the 'California.' Whose hand it is, we are still permitted to conjecture. But we have the sense that a good piece of work has been done once for all. There must be supplementary discussions of many of the incidents here narrated, but the main story has now been authoritatively told.

The history of the seizure of so considerable a territory as California has, of course, a natural interest for such inquiring Americans as wish to understand all the significant episodes of their country's annals. The interest of the story is, however, heightened by the fact that the tale has often been grossly misrepresented, partly for romantic, but largely for personal reasons. Those who took part in the affair had apparently no idea of any historical hereafter when what they did would not only be told in their own glowing way, but also retold truthfully, and judged on its merits. There is an air of utter irresponsibility pervading the whole conduct of the seizure. The Californians were a far-off and degraded people, with no special rights in their own land, and, above all, with no power to make such rights as they had in any wise obvious to the world. Such was the feeling of Capt. Frémont, of Lieut. Gillespie, of Com. Stockton, and of most of the other officers who had a share in the conquest. That these rancheros would ever make manifest to the world how their rights had been abused, the heroes of our conquering host of trappers and marines seem never to have imagined. But now at last the case of the Californians is clearly stated by a writer from among the nation of the captors; and what José Castro rightly called at the time the "despicable policy" of certain agents of the American Government, is very clearly exposed. It does, to be sure, little good to lament such long-past wrongs, unless there is some chance that we may avoid similar wrongs in the future. But from this disagreeable tale of boastful and irresponsible aggression, and of petty tyranny, we may at all events learn just what an obtrusive policy towards our Spanish-American neighbors means, and always will mean. In California the mischief was done on a small scale; yet for that not our policy, but the thinness of the population may be thanked. In future we may some time take a fancy to conquer some other California. Before we do so, let us read this story once more, and remember of what stuff such aggressions are made.

The new sources used in this volume include the papers of Consul Larkin, frequently cited, indeed, in the earlier volumes, but here of the very greatest importance. The mission of Gillespie to Frémont—a mission discussed in our previous review of Hittell's 'California'—is now explained in the light of the original despatch brought by Gillespie to Larkin; and the Frémont legend grows somewhat insignificant beside the facts. Bancroft's summary, in chapter iv, page 77 sq., of the "causes of the settlers' revolt," is pretty certainly substantially accurate, although the argument concerning the motives of Frémont himself (p. 89) will seem to the unprepared reader a little less convincing than it should seem, because it is rather too brief for so complex a subject matter. Frémont was undoubtedly, as Bancroft says, "engaged in a revolutionary movement, not in accordance with, but in disobedience of, his orders from Washington." And Bancroft has no insufficient reasons for saying this. Yet the general reader, especially if the Frémont legend has become familiar to him by reason of its frequent repetition in popular histories, will hesitate to accept this statement as sufficiently warranted by the brief summary of the evidence here given. After all, however, the best cure or belief in a legend is the presence of some good sense in the reader's mind; and we heap up evidence in vain for those who are born to believe fables, and to misapprehend historical truth.

Another most amusing group of popular tales, however, has clustered about the story of Commodore Sloat's raising of the flag at Monterey, July 7, 1846. This act, wherewith began our legal possession of the romantic golden land, is a fit nucleus for legends. Yearly such are repeated at California pioneer celebrations. The chances are that they will never be forgotten. Do not all the old pioneers know about them? Thus, for instance, everybody knows about Sloat's race with the wicked English Admiral, from whom he snatched California just in time. Exactly how he came to win the race, is not always so clear, because too many stories exist concerning that episode. They are all equally well founded, but they cannot all be true at once. Sloat was at Mazatlan until the beginning of June, 1846. By this time he had heard enough of the hostilities on the Rio Grande to make him feel sure that, under his orders, he must set sail for California and seize the ports. Accordingly he did set sail, and was followed not long after by Admiral Seymour in the English ship Collingwood. Seymour reached Monterey nine days after the seizure of the town. He remained in the harbor for a week, showed no signs of vexation at the news of the conquest, and was socially on the best of terms with Sloat's officers during this period. Then he set sail for the Sandwich Islands. So much sober history knows. The legends, however, are aware that Sloat and Seymour had both long been equally anxious for news of the hostilities on the Rio Grande, before setting sail from Mazatlan, and that it was Sloat's superior command of secret advices which finally enabled him to outwit the Admiral. Seymour, on his part, as these stories have it, had strained every nerve to get the best of Sloat. That he was defeated in the race for information and in the subsequent race for Monterey depended on various things. Once, for instance, at the critical moment, he did temporarily get the better of Sloat in the matter of information. But thereupon Sloat sent his own son to dine on the English vessel at the Admiral's table. The Englishmen, as was their nature, drank too much champagne; and so the bold young American learned all that they could tell him. Sloat acted at once, and set sail before the Englishmen had time to recover from the effects of that disastrous dinner. And thus we won the golden land!

Of course, this account (which, by the way, Mr. Bancroft has not repeated, although we understand it to be the official legend among a certain group of pioneers) is not the only version of such a glorious story. Quite different reasons why Sloat was able to outwit the Englishmen are current, in accounts summarized from various equally valuable sources in the foot-note to p. 211 of the volume before us. But, as appears from facts which Mr. Bancroft (p. 203) makes public for the first time from the Larkin papers, Sloat actually knew of the hostilities on the Rio Grande as early as May 17, three weeks before he set sail from Mazatlan. At that time already, as Sloat shows by a "strictly confidential" letter to Larkin, he had resolved, under his instructions, to leave Mazatlan at once for the California coast. The subsequent struggle for the earliest information concerning the first hostilities, the heroic incident of the champagne dinner, and all the other exploits of that legendary time thus lose their significance at one unhappy stroke. We may, indeed, ask ourselves, Why then did Sloat still delay so long? But we shall be sure, at all events, that he could not have been passing those three weeks in an hourly struggle to outwit the dreaded Englishmen. Either he was playing no game against them at all, or he spent three weeks in making them a present of the game.

But in fact the whole legend about the hostile English designs upon California is now utterly ruined. On page 208, sq., Mr. Bancroft's discussion of the topic is quite sufficient to make the matter clear to intelligent students. We miss in it one important item only of the evidence, namely: if there were nothing else known about the matter, would it not be clear that Sir Robert Peel's Cabinet was the last one to engage in such an aggression as the one that the legendary account of Admiral Seymour's instructions attributes to the English Government of the day? Mr. Bancroft refers to the conversation in Parliament in August, 1846, between Bentinck and Disraeli on the one side, and Palmerston on the other. In this conversation enough appears to make it tolerably sure that the English Government had had no hostile designs upon California. But Mr. Bancroft's account does not point out what is equally significant, namely, that not Lord Palmerston, but his predecessor, must have given Seymour instructions, if any were given, with reference to California. Quite impossible, nevertheless, is the supposition that Peel's Government, which so long and carefully sought every chance to avoid coming to blows about Oregon, should at that very moment have been meditating the deep laid scheme which the brave son of Commodore Sloat wrested from the lips of the nefarious and abject Englishmen, while he enjoyed their hospitality at the legendary dinner.

We hasten to point out, further, in the briefest manner, a few of the more significant novelties in the rest of this volume. In the story of Stockton's rule, Mr. Bancroft presents (p. 271) conclusive evidence that Larkin, acting in his character as confidential agent of our Government, undertook on Stockton's behalf to make peaceful overtures to Castro in the South, and that these overtures were the occasion for Castro's known attempt, August 7, to enter into negotiations with Stockton. Stockton's insolent rejection of Castro's offer at the time when it was made, appears in this way in a worse light than ever before. On page 344, sq., is given what may be called the first authentic account of the savage little fight at San Pascual, a fight of which Gen. S. W. Kearny chose to give so false an official report. Mr. Bancroft's account is made up from a number of not previously accessible sources, especially those collected by Judge Hayes of Los Angeles, in papers which are among the most noteworthy possessions of the Bancroft library. After the conquest history is completed, the most significant novelty of the volume seems to be the detailed plan of San Francisco in 1848, together with the long explanatory notes, founded in part upon testimony not previously accessible to historical students.

Of matters that seem to us doubtful, in Mr. Bancroft's views in this volume, we venture in conclusion to lay stress upon the reasoning (p. 226) whereby the hesitation of Commodore Sloat at Monterey, before raising the flag, is made to depend rather upon Larkin's advice than upon the consequences of Frémont's hostile action. To the writer of the account before us, the Bear-Flag hostilities would seem to have been additional reasons urging Sloat to quick action. We are disposed to regard their influence upon Sloat as only tending to increase his previous hesitation; and a careful reading of Mr. Bancroft's arguments has not convinced us of the contrary. Larkin, indeed, plainly advised the delay, and Sloat, during the time of the delay, doubtless often spoke as if, for his own part, he was ready to act at once. But Sloat had spoken just so, long before, at Mazatlan; and yet, as we have seen, he had afterwards hesitated. That Frémont and the Bear Flag can have been encouraging to the mind of such a man, we still must doubt. It is impossible to acquit "the Bear" of having done all the mischief that he could, in this matter as well as in every other. The valiant beast of the Sonoma flag was an unmitigated nuisance to California, and we cannot grant him the poor honor of having urged on Sloat to action.

With this volume on the conquest, Mr. Bancroft has reached the boundary line between the early history and the history of the modern State. We hope that there will be no falling off in the later and most difficult portions of the task. Thus far there is good reason for congratulation. The history of early California has been written in great detail, and in a fashion that must make the book readable only in single chapters or episodes—never as one connected whole. Yet nowhere else can we find so thorough an account of the beginnings of an important community. It is an axiom of historical study that to make the exact truth accessible, must be a true end in itself for the investigator. If this be so, then no one should complain that Mr. Bancroft's book deals so exhaustively with provincial annals. Out of provinces grow, if not always nations, then at least organic and vastly important members of great nations. No one can doubt that the Pacific States have a very significant history before them. In the future, near or remote, no sensible man will doubt the value of the elaborate research which has now made the early portions of this history both accessible and comprehensible for all time. We have expressed our decided disagreement with some features of Mr. Bancroft's plan. We have no doubt of the great importance of what has resulted.

A Muramasa Blade. By Louis Wertheimer. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

In this unique work, Mr. Wertheimer has essayed a task none the less difficult because others, with no mean pretensions to learning and literary skill, have signally failed in it. These were unable to succeed because it is impossible to call the past into resurrection—to "recreate the rose with all its members"—by the science of archæology alone. One must have, in addition, keen insight and warm sympathy to write a story of life in the Japan of five hundred years ago that will translate easily into the vernacular, and seem, when read by a native, the product of the soil. Yet this is what Mr. Wertheimer has attempted to do, and we think he has succeeded, excepting a few sentences serving to an American reader as hooks and eyes of speech. The story is truly and minutely Japanese in English. A Tokio hanashika (story-teller), under his matawning in Yanagi Chō, might tell to his open-mouthed auditors this tale of a sword, and not shock one of his auditors. And this, notwithstanding that such listeners are as critical of idiomatic accuracy as is a four-year-old child of the integrity of bed-time lore.

Improbable as many of the incidents and characters are, from our point of view, and impossible as some of them certainly are in the eye of science, all are in harmony with what the natives call Yamato Damashii (the spirit of ancient Japan)—that fierce code of honor which formed the ethics of gentlemen and the religion of heroes like Mutto and Sennoské of the story. So faithfully has the author conceived his palingenesis of a vanished ideal, that in one or two points the narrative becomes to us a ludicrous farce, though in the oblique eye the most orthodox tragedy. In reading, we unconsciously suffered our risibilities to rise. On reflection, we felt like the outraged auditor in a theatre, in whose vicinity a boor guffaws during the death-scene. Possibly Mr. Wertheimer might have pleased the Japanese fancy a little less, and satisfied the Occidental taste somewhat more, had he sooner rung down the curtain on certain acts. Yet we are not so sure, remembering our own sensations in a Japanese theatre, when an actor committing hara-kiri occupied twenty-two minutes, by the watch, in disembowelling the bag of blood which did duty for his abdominal economy. The author evidently has his eye on the gallery gods afar off, for in chapter x. the endurance of Yamagawa is prolonged beyond belief. The aged servitor opens the region below the navel in a "regulation cut of six inches long and one deep." While thus ripped open, he indulges in a conversation with his young master; and then, clapping his hand to his gushing midriff, listens bolt upright and calmly to the reading of his prolix will by a comrade. In print, this document occupies twelve solid octavo pages. Even supposing the soldier to be a fair scholar and able to read Chinese fluently—hardly so, we think, in the fourteenth century—the perusal must have required twenty minutes. Now, supposing the seppuku of that age was not in the severing of the great artery in front of the spine, but only an "inch deep," still, such a power of endurance in so old a man savors more of the Japanese stage than of physical possibility. It is, to say the least, not good art, and we question whether Bakin would countenance it.

Apart from this criticism, we cannot but pronounce Mr. Wertheimer's literary effort a superb triumph. His knowledge of Japanese history is as exact as it is copious. His references to tradition are to the taste of literary orthodoxy as tested by the latest researches. His local coloring is from actual study and an experience of thirteen years in the language and the land. Despite the literal faithfulness to the samurai's ideal, the romance is one of absorbing interest to the Western reader. It pictures the bright and glorious side of feudalism. Then, the soldier's calling was the noblest, war was a profession, the sword was the soul of the samurai, the forger of the bright true blade a pet of princes, and the possessor of a Muramasa was envied of millions. Yet the very brilliancy of the picture, while helping us to understand the gleam which even now lights up the bronze stolidity of a Japanese face when hara-kiri or swords are mentioned, shows also the arc of horrible darkness in which the lower strata of humanity rotted under pride and tax and the swashbuckler's tool. We remember only too well the sight of slashed corpses lying in the streets of Tokio, and our feelings at stumbling, while travelling at night, over dead bodies in the public roads, of seeing beggars allowed to drown in sight of withheld but convenient help, of bloody dogs hacked in head, body, and limbs—for the sword once drawn must not be sheathed till it tasted blood. With all true reformers, we rejoice that the reign of the sword, even of the Muramasa blade, with its consequent brutality, is over, and that the humanity of the beggar and pariah is now a fact recognized in law and custom. The reading of this book, which held us fascinated to the end, has been a powerful reminder that the horrors and wonders of the feudalism which we witnessed in the days of 1870 and 1871 are now at an end.

The subject is worthy of the noble literary and artistic treatment given it in this book. The illustrations are remarkable in that they have not been contaminated or voided of their spirit by alien hands. The five copper-plate engravings are by Nakamura Munéhiro of Tokio, who has caught the old-time spirit fully. The three-score and ten drawings of a native artist now in this country are on the average good; in some places, as in war scenes, they approach excellence. They have been reproduced by photo-lithography. Print, binding, and index are of the first class. In the silk-bound copies the Kiôto brocade, of Mikado red inwoven with chrysanthemums, makes a fitting case for this mirror of Oriental chivalry.

Memoirs of the Rev. J. Lewis Diman, D.D., late Professor of History and Political Economy in Brown University. Compiled from his Letters, Journals, and Writings, and the Recollections of his Friends. By Caroline Hazard. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

The materials for this biography were scanty. Prof. Diman's outward life was uneventful, and he did not make his private letters a record of inner experience, or pour out in them learning, wit, and impressions of men and affairs, any more than the secrets of conscience and growth. This volume consequently deals almost entirely with external matters. The subject of it was born of excellent New England stock, and piously reared. The tradition of his family, his youthful discipline, and his own nature united to direct him to the choice of the ministry as his profession; and, after completing his college course at Brown University and having spent some time at a parsonage and at Andover, he went abroad and resided at several of the German universities, where he saw and listened to the famous doctors of the time, and was well received by them. At the end of two years, in the course of which he visited the principal places of interest in middle and western Europe, he returned to this country and was settled over a church in Fall River, and later in Brookline. He had been from the first impatient of dogma, and attached to the spiritual rather than the theological elements in the Christian faith, and his mind continued to grow more liberal and comprehensive. He was the first of his denomination to exchange pulpits with Unitarian clergymen. This breadth of view and freedom of practice led to adverse comment and dissatisfaction on the part of the more rigid in the faith, and when, at the age of thirty-three, he was called to the professorship of history and political economy at Brown University, it was probably a welcome and certainly a most satisfactory solution of a position which would have constantly grown in difficulty. He continued, however, to preach, and received invitations to accept pastoral charges many times, including one from the Unitarians. His ripe conviction upon the matter is perhaps expressed in declining a call to the Second Church in Boston: "For success in the ministry, a man needs to be the mouthpiece of a sect, or at least to be able to express himself with great distinctness on certain disputed points. On many of these points my own judgment is in suspense, and it would be hypocrisy for me to assume to speak with authority; and in such a position as that which the minister of the Second Church would almost of necessity hold, he would be continually called on to define his position." The quality of his theological views is amusingly illustrated by the story of the ambassador "of the Greek obedience" who dined with him at Senator Anthony's, and inquired afterwards what his religion was, remarking that he thought he might be of the Orthodox Apostolic Church. A sketch and estimate of Prof. Diman's theology are furnished by Prof. George P. Fisher, which will satisfy the curious in doctrinal matters.

At Brown University Prof. Diman continued to grow in reputation, and almost from the time of his settlement he had calls to chairs in other colleges and universities, East and West, in some cases including an offer of the presidency; and although he declined these, his sphere of usefulness was enlarged by his acceptance of lectureships in Baltimore and Boston, by contributions to the press and the periodical literature of the day, and by public addresses. He was thus a busy man for nearly a score of years, and he expressed his aim during this period most completely when he wrote briefly to a friend regarding some one of his numerous declinations of higher posts, that he cared "more for scholarship than for position." It is his life as a scholar that these pages contain—an account of his tasks, both at the college and in private with the young ladies whom he taught, and in the different schools at Providence in which he took a humane interest; and with their details are woven some personal impressions of him in his literary club, and brief notices of vacation days and of his second short tour in southern Europe. Of his domestic life very little is said, but his home is described as a pleasant one. Of the development of his mind, the growth of opinion, and of his sentiments and tastes, he apparently left no record except in his published works. He led preëminently a scholar's life; his mind broadened without any crisis of feeling or jar of broken bonds, and his beliefs seem to have had an unimpeded natural growth. That his life-work fell so easily into the department of history, which his intellect found entirely congenial and satisfying, was a piece of excellent fortune.

This memorial of him will be especially pleasing to those whom it will enable better to recall the charm of his personality and to renew their living memories of him. His comparatively early death cut him off from the best years of his usefulness, for his virtues and studies were those that are most fruitful in the last years of a long life.

The Book Fancier; or, The Romance of Book Collecting. By Percy Fitzgerald. Scribner & Welford.

MR. PERCY FITZGERALD has taught us not to expect much from him. After all the fifty or a hundred volumes with which he has weighted the shelves of the second-hand booksellers, he does not yet know how to plan a chapter or to write a sentence. His construction is as careless as his style is slovenly. The best that can be said for him is that he is a lively writer, with a gift for finding good texts for his bookmaking. That he should have written this little volume on book collecting tends to prove that the recent growth of interest in books as books is even wider than we had supposed. That he should have made as poor a book as this is, shows that his own knowledge of the subject is skin-deep only. It is a sort of scrap-book of snippets of gossip, odds and ends of all kinds tumbled into its pages, helter-skelter and higgledy-piggledy. For example, the chapter on the Elzevirs and Plantins is chiefly taken up with a journalistic description of a modern printing-office, concluding with a list of comic misprints! It is easy enough to see that Mr. Fitzgerald, although he has used his paste and scissors diligently, has no real knowledge of the subject and no firm grasp on it. Any chapter of Mr. Lang's 'Library' or 'Books and Bookmen' is richer and sounder than Mr. Fitzgerald's whole book. We may note especially the obvious absurdities at the top of page 144 and of page 153, and the apparently late discovery of Allibone's 'Dictionary' and of Poole's 'Index.' Of recent French books—which are many and excellent—Mr. Fitzgerald knows little or nothing; he refers to the beloved Bibliophile Jacob as "La Croix" (p. 201), and this is typical of his erudition. He berates the French for their indifference to Molière as evidenced by the few editions of his works!

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Alexander, Mrs. By Woman's Wit: A Novel. Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.
All is Not Gold that Glistens: A Sketch. Philadelphia: Porter & Coates.
American Law Review. Vol. xx. St. Louis: Review Publishing Co.
Bainbridge, Elizabeth G. Schoolroom Games and Exercises. Chicago: The Interstate Publishing Co. 75 cents.
Beers, Rev. R. W. The Mormon Puzzle and How to Solve It. Funk & Wagnalls. $1.
Browne, F. F. Bugle Echoes: A Collection of Poems of the Civil War, Northern and Southern. White, Stokes & Allen. $2.50.
Child, F. J. The English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Part iv. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $5.
Claveau, A. Contre le flot. Boston: Schoenhof.
Crump, A. The Theory of Stock Exchange Speculation. H. W. Rosenbaum.
Deriot, Sophie. The Beginner's Book in French. Illustrated. Boston: Ginn & Co. 95 cents.
Dostoïevsky, L'Esprit souterrain. Traduit par E. Halpérine et Ch. Morice. New York: Christern.
Faguet, E. Études littéraires sur le xixe siècle. Boston: Schoenhof.
Faguet, E. Les Grands maîtres du xviie siècle. Boston: Schoenhof.
Foster, D. S. The Romance of the Unexpected. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.
Gannett—Jones. The Faith that Makes Faithful. Eight Sermons. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. 50 cents.
Gunn, Dr. R. A. The Truth about Alcohol. Belford, Clarke & Co.
Halévy, Ludovic. Princesse. New York: Christern.
Handbook of School Law. Manual of School Law in the State of New York. Syracuse: C. W. Bardeen.
Hanson, G. P. The Legend of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co.
Heilprin, A. The Geographical and Geological Distribution of Animals. D. Appleton & Co.
Hildeburn, C. R. A Century of Printing: The Issues of the Press in Pennsylvania. 1685-1784. Vol. ii. 1764-1784. Philadelphia.
Kennard, Mrs. E. The Girl in the Brown Habit. Harper & Brothers. 20 cents.
Littell's Living Age. Fifth Series. Vol. 56. October-December, 1886. Boston: Littell & Co.
Lodge, H. C. The Works of Alexander Hamilton. Vol. ix. and last. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.
Whitaker, J. Almanac for 1887. London.

The Greek in English.

By Thomas D. Goodell, Ph.D., Instructor in the Hartford (Ct) High School. 16mo, pp. 128.

Price 75 cents.

This book attempts to teach that limited portion of Greek which college men remember after they have forgotten vastly more—the portion which even those who wish to banish the study of Greek from our schools would admit can least easily be spared, and the portion essential to a ready command of the English tongue. This it tries to do without waste of time or labor.

 A sample copy sent, postpaid, to a teacher upon receipt of 38 cents.

Henry Holt & Co.,

PUBLISHERS,

29 West 23d St., New York.

JUST PUBLISHED:

The Martyr of Golgotha.

By ENRIQUE PEREZ ESCRICH,

From the Spanish by ADÈLE JOSEPHINE GODOY.

It is a beautiful and remarkable little book, written in a most religious and reverential spirit, and with a certain warmth of loving conviction not too common nowadays. It describes the events and persons surrounding the life of Christ, and imparts a reality to the sublime tragedy to which custom has rendered many persons indifferent. The book is in two volumes and deserves a secure place among the historical and imaginative works on the Christian era.—The World, N. Y.

In Two Volumes. Price, paper, $1; cloth, $1.75. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

WM. S. GOTTSBERGER, Publisher, 11 Murray Street, New York.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL,

to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

BREAKFAST BACON,

DIAMOND BRAND.

"S. DAVIS, JR.," Cincinnati.

ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT, New York.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE COMPLETE Index.—Ten Numbers (Abbott—Vespucci) now ready. The few likely to be interested in this troublesome and expensive work may examine it in the great Libraries, Boston; Redwood, Newport; Mercantile, New York; Case, Cleveland; Michigan State, Lansing; Public, Milwaukee; Congressional, Washington; etc. Price to Subscribers, $1.50 a number; to all others, $2.00.

E. ROTH, 1135 Pine St., Philadelphia.

German Simplified.

An eminently practical new method for learning the German language. Edition for self instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each; school edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by Prof. A. Knoflach, 140 Nassau St., New York. Prospectus free.

ADVANCED COURSE FOR FRENCH STUDENTS.

FRENCH EUROPEAN MAGAZINE, for school and family; 26 numbers a year, post paid, for $1.10. Specimen number mailed to any address.

E. ROTH, 337 S. Broad St., Philadelphia.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

The Hayward Letters.

Being a Selection from the Correspondence of the late A. Hayward, Q.C. 1834 to 1884.

With an Account of his Early Life. By HENRY E. CARLISLE. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $7.50.

Whitaker's Almanack.

Containing an account of the Astronomical and other Phenomena, a large amount of information respecting the Government Finances, Population, Commerce, and General Statistics of the British Empire throughout the World, With some notice of other Countries, etc., etc.

12mo, paper, 40 cents; half roan, $1.00.

The New Amphion.

Being the Book of the Edinburgh University Union Fancy Fair, in which are contained sundry artistick, instructive, and diverting matters, all now made publick for the first time.

16mo, vellum, $2.00.

 Original contributions by Robt. Browning, John Stuart Blaikie, A. Lang, Robert Louis Stevenson, etc., etc.

"The volume is now on our table, and it is one of the quaintest and daintiest that we have ever seen."—Publishers' Circular.

THE MINISTRY of FINE ART TO THE HAPPINESS OF LIFE. By T. GAMBIER PARRY, M. A., 8vo, cloth, $5.60.

CONTENTS: Purpose and Practice of Fine Art.—Ministry of Fine Art to Common Life and to Spiritual Life.—Ministry of Color to Sculpture and Architecture.—History of Mosaic, Ancient and Christian.—Art and Artists of Glass Painting, Ancient and Mediæval.—Adornment of Sacred Buildings.—Art in Archæology.—Builders and Buildings of the Cathedral at Gloucester.

THE GROWTH OF FREEDOM IN THE BALKAN PENINSULA. Notes of a Traveller in Montenegro, Bosnia, Servia, Bulgaria, and Greece, with Historical and Descriptive Sketches of the People. By JAMES GEORGE COTTON MINCHIN. With a map. Crown 8vo, cloth, $4.20.

With Preface by George Augustus Sala.

THE DOGARESSA: A STORY OF VE- NETIAN LIFE AND MANNERS OF THE MOST BRILLIANT PERIOD OF HER HISTORY. By W. MELMONTI. Translated by CLARE BRUNE. One vol. demy 8vo, cloth, $4.80.

FIVE O'CLOCK TEA. Containing Receipts for Cakes of every description, Savoury Sandwiches, Cooling Drinks, etc. By the author of 'Breakfast Dishes' and 'Savouries and Sweets.' Fcp. 8vo, cloth, 60 cents.

"The only danger is that with such tempting recipes as the authoress of this little volume gives, one may be inclined to partake so freely as to rather spoil one's dinner. . . . 'Chocolate Cake' and the 'Vanilla Soft Icing' for it read quite too lovely." —Truth.

BURKE'S (Sir BERNARD) PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, KNIGHTAGE, &c., for 1887, corrected to the latest date. Super-royal 8vo, cloth, gilt, $18.00.

"Constant reference to the pages of 'Burke' enables us to testify to its invariable accuracy."—Court Journal.

JUDY'S ANNUAL FOR 1887. Edited by CHAS. H. ROSS. Profusely illustrated, 4to, paper, 50 cents.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

Containing Standard Works of European Literature in the English Language, on

History,	Theology,	Natural History,
Biography,	Antiquities,	Poetry,
Topography,	Science,	Art,
Archæology,	Philosophy	Fiction,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference, comprising in all Translations from the

French,	Spanish,	Anglo-Saxon,
German,	Scandinavian,	Latin and Greek.
Italian,

$1.40 or $2 per volume (with exceptions). Complete sets in 677 volumes. Special prices on application.

The following works are recommended to those who are forming public or private libraries. The volumes are sold separately:

ADDISON'S WORKS. 6 vols.....$1.40 each.
BACON'S ESSAYS, MORAL AND PHILO- SOPHICAL WORKS. 2 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON and TOUR IN THE HEBRIDES, &c. (Napier). 6 vols. 1.40 each.
BURKE'S WORKS AND LIFE. 9 vols..... 1.40 each.
BURNS'S LIFE. By Lockhart..... 1.40 each.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols..... 1.40 each.
CHAUCER'S WORKS (Prof. Skeat). 4 vols... 1.40 each.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
DEFOE'S WORKS. 7 vols..... 1.40 each.
GIBBON'S ROMAN EMPIRE. 7 vols..... 1.40 each.
GOETHE'S WORKS. 14 vols..... 1.40 each.
GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. 5 vols..... 1.40 each.
HAZLITT'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
LAMARTINE'S WORKS. 8 vols..... 1.40 each.
LESSING'S LAOKOON, &c..... 1.40.
LESSING'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 2 vols.... 1.40 each.
MILTON'S PROSE WORKS. 5 vols..... 1.40 each.
MOLIÈRE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols... 1.40 each.
PLUTARCH'S LIVES (new translation by Long and Stewart). 4 vols..... 1.40 each.
SCHILLER'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
VASARI'S LIVES OF PAINTERS (with new appendix by Dr. Richter). 6 vols.. ..... 1.40 each.
BURNEY'S (Mme. D'Arblay's) CECILIA. 2 vols 1.40 each.
BURNEY'S (Mme. D'Arblay's) EVELINA..... 1.40.
FIELDING'S NOVELS. 4 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
PETRARCH'S SONNETS..... 2.00.
MANZONI'S BETROTHED. (I promessi Sposi). 2.00.
PEPYS'S DIARY. 4 vols..... 2.00 each.
KANT'S CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON ..... 2.00 each.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. 2 vols ..... 2.00 each.
HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS AND TRAVELS. 3 vols.... .....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
STAUNTON'S WORKS ON CHESS. 4 vols... $2.00 and 2.40 each.
GILBART ON BANKING. 2 vols..... 2.00 each.
LOWNDES'S BIBLIOGRAPHER'S MAN- UAL. 11 parts .....$1.40 and 2.00 each

 The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Holiday Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743 745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Charles Scribner's Sons

PUBLISH TO-DAY:

THE SELF-REVELATION OF GOD. By Samuel Harris, L.L.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in Yale College. 1 vol., 8vo. Uniform with 'The Philosophical Basis of Theism.' $3.50.

This work is a restatement of the evidence of the existence of God and of the reality of His revelation of Himself, as modified by, and in harmony with, the legitimate results of recent thought and meeting skepticism in its present positions.

The subject is divided into four parts, the first of which treats of the revelation of God in the experience or consciousness of man. The three remaining parts are concerned with the verification of this fundamental fact by the other revelations which God makes of Himself, viz.:

Part II. His Revelation of Himself as the absolute Being. Part III. His Revelation of Himself as the Personal God in the Constitution and Course of Nature and in the Constitution and History of Man. Part IV. His Revelation of Himself reconciling the World to Himself in Christ.

SOME PROBLEMS OF PHILO- sophy. By Archibald Alexander, Professor of Philosophy in Columbia College. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.00.

Professor Alexander states briefly, but comprehensively and clearly, those problems of philosophy which may be regarded as still unsolved, and to understand the nature of which is to understand the present condition and work of philosophy itself. The range of the book may be surmised from such titles as "The Problem of the Ultimal Nature of Matter," "The Relation of Belief to Knowledge," "The Problem of Human Will," "The Immortality of the Soul," "The Doctrine of a First Cause," "The Doctrine of Cause and Effect," etc.

OLD FAITHS IN NEW LIGHT. By Newman Smyth. New and Revised Edition. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.

The current discussions in theology give the appearance of this volume in a new edition a special and timely interest. Dr. Smyth's book is a very comprehensive and singularly clear survey of the whole field of modern thought in relation to the fundamental questions of theology and a very lucid presentation of the changes which have been effected and the positions which are now held by those who believe in the "new theology."

THE MEXICAN GUIDE. NEW Edition for 1887. By Thomas A. Janvier. 1 vol., 16mo, with large folded maps. Leather, net, $2.50.

In conformity with the original plan of the work, that it should be annually revised and amended, the new edition for 1887 contains in addition to other important changes an entirely new Part, treating of Provincial Mexico. The Guide has received the official endorsement of the Mexican Government, the warm commendation of the newspaper press, and the substantial approval of the travelling public.

. . . "There is little but hearty praise to be given to Mr. Janvier's work. He has succeeded in producing a happy combination of Baedeker and Murray, uniting the practical helpfulness of the former with the latter's tendency to supply artistic and historical details."—The Nation.

 For sale by all booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

Charles Scribner's Sons,

743-745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1125. THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

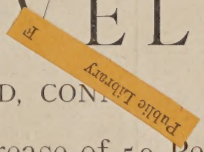
QUALITY PAYS both Dealer and Consumer.

ILLUSTRATION:

The NEW LIFE INSURANCE Written in 1886 by

THE TRAVELERS,

OF HARTFORD, CONN.



AMOUNTED TO $8,420,553, an Increase of 50 Per Cent. over 1885,

THE RESULT OF FURNISHING THE BEST LIFE POLICY IN THE MARKET,

And Guaranteeing Perfect Security by HEAVY ASSETS, NOW AMOUNTING TO $9,111,589.68, OF WHICH $2,129,165.88 IS SURPLUS TO POLICY-HOLDERS.

The Most Expensive Economy

Is to buy cheap goods, which are cheap because there is no security for their delivery.

The Terrible Railroad and Steamboat Disasters,

Which have already destroyed so many lives this year, are liable to bring sudden obligations of enormous volume on any company doing personal insurance: Insure in a company

ABLE TO MEET THEM ALL!

AND WHICH COULD PAY

A $2,000,000 Loss Without Closing its Doors.

THE TRAVELERS Pays all Claims without discount, and immediately on receipt of satisfactory proofs.

HAS PAID POLICY-HOLDERS NEARLY $13,000.000.

All Policies contain Equitable Non-Forfeiture provisions. Accident Claims paid pro rata in event of occupation being changed.

JAMES G. BATTERSON, President. RODNEY DENNIS, Secretary.

JOHN E. MORRIS, Ass't Secretary.

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 43

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 46

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Labor Legislation 48
Judge Gresham's Decision in the Wabash Case 48
How the People Voted 49
The Sharples Portraits 49

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Nebulous English Politics 50
The Land War in Ireland 51

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Inter-State Commerce Bill 52
The Supply of Teachers 52
The "Issuing" of Silver 53
The President's Excuse in Michigan 53
A Story Without an End 53

NOTES 53

REVIEWS:
McClellan's Own Story.—I 57
England's Case against Home Rule 59
The Crimean Journey of Catharine II 60
Recent Religious and Ethical Literature 61
About Money and Other Things 62
Romances of Chivalry 63
Ancient Cities 63

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 64

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.

Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27.

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top.

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding.

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

☞ The edition of the first issue of the current volume (Jan. 6, 1887) is entirely exhausted. Subscriptions ordered to begin with that number will commence with the number for Jan. 13 instead.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gillig & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CALIFORNIA, San Diego, Pierce Place.

THE SOUTHWEST INSTITUTE.—Health and Education for Girls and Boys in the finest climate in the world. Girls received into the family. For circulars address Mrs. E. C. DERBY. Refers by direct permission to Rt. Rev. Wm. I. Kip, D.D., Bishop of California; General Geo. Stoneman, Governor of California; General W. T. Sherman, General George Crook, U. S. A.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE.—A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls. MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887. Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI- tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY-HALL SCHOOL (59th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the Institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT admits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

ADAMS ACADEMY.—PREPARA- tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886. For all information address WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE- paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI- tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course. HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal, Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

MASSACHUSETTS, Worcester.

READ INSTITUTE (FOR YOUNG Ladies), established in 1844. Second half of present school year will begin 29th Jan., 1887.

NEW HAMPSHIRE, Portsmouth.

MISS A. C. MORGAN'S SCHOOL FOR Young Ladies. Second term begins Feb. 1, 1887. J. G. Whittier says a better, healthier, and pleasanter location for a school could scarcely be found in New England."

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys. WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. C. M. WILKINSON'S HOME School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Refers to Miss Louisa M. Alcott, Hon. John Lowell, Geo. Wm. Curtis, Esq.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill. WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies. Students prepared for College. Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

Teachers.

A RECENT COLLEGE GRADUATE, at present in the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, who has travelled extensively in Europe, would like to take entire charge of two or three lads for a summer's trip to Europe. References given to President Julius H. Seelye of Amherst, Rev. A. F. Schauffler, D.D., of New York, and others, and good references required in return. Address W. G. SCHAUFFLER, 244 East 13th St., City.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard. 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

INSTRUCTION IN CLASSICS, GER- man, French, Mathematics, History, by an experienced, successful teacher (German, graduate of Heidelberg Univ.). German literature a specialty. Z, 19 Prospect Place, New York.

JOHN W. DALZELL, PRIVATE TU- tor, 15 Applan Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

PUPILS INSTRUCTED IN PRACTI- CAL Kindergartnering and in Quincy School methods. Address, L. E. L., care Mrs. Weil's School, 711 Madison Avenue, New York City.

School Agencies.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston. Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

SCHOOL AGENCY.—Oldest and best known in the United States. Estab'd 1855. J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., 7 East 14th St., New York.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free. E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

Wants.

A LADY ACCUSTOMED TO TRAVEL- ling, graduate of the Bellevue Training School for Nurses, with thirteen years' subsequent experience, desires an engagement to accompany an invalid to Europe. Best references in New York, Boston, and San Francisco. She can be seen personally in New York. Address, Miss M. K., Office of "Nation," N. Y. City.

TO PUBLISHERS AND AUTHORS.—The undersigned, having lately read several books published by prominent houses, and found them very incorrectly printed, offers his services in detecting errors overlooked by the printer. Has had a long experience as proof-reader and press corrector. Would also revise Authors' MSS., and prepare them for the printer. For terms and particulars, address READER, care Nation.

WANTED.—ASSISTANT PRINCI- pal and silent partner in a Western school. Address, stating present salary and sum ready for investment, HESPEROTHEN, 196 Grinnell St., New Bedford, Mass.

4 to 8% INVESTMENTS Municipal BONDS

And other Securities. Call or send for Lists.

S. A. KEAN & CO., BANKERS,

UNITED BANK BUILDING,

Broadway and Wall Street, New York.

MAIN OFFICE: CHICAGO.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars. Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

Prompt and reliable information relative to Florida and Florida Investments.

furnished by R. G. Robinson & Co., Real Estate, Loan, and General Agents, Orlando, Orange Co., Florida. Branch office, Zellwood, Fla.

7 2/3% CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures. Capital $600,000 Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets. AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

F. W. CHRISTERN,

39 West Twenty-third Street, New York,

Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

SALE OF AN OLD VIRGINIA HOME AND PLANTATION

of About 3,600 Acres of Land, by Order of the Circuit Court OF ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

The plantation is divided into eleven farms, ten of which contain from 150 to 250 acres each of cleared land with suitable woodland attached. On each are four (4) buildings, namely, a cottage-home of four (4) rooms, a kitchen, a meat-house; and one containing corn-house, barn, and stable. Each is divided into six (6) fields, well fenced, and with one or two exceptions all the fields of all the farms are watered by living streams. The old homestead farm of about 800 acres contains all necessary outbuildings, such as barns, stables, corn-houses, etc., quarters for laborers, bath house and dairy, a four-roomed office, and the old mansion rebuilt and added to since the war—the last two in a lawn of 8 acres. The garden of four (4) acres falls in terraces from the house to a brook that runs through a dell at the foot of a hill which is about 40 feet high, filled with shrubbery, wide grassy roads and walks, and is altogether a fairy spot. The old mansion has a cellar under the whole, contains 8 rooms and wide halls, with closets, dressing rooms, etc.

The lands are in the famous County of Albemarle, in the grape-growing district, of which the Monticello Wine Cellars are the centre, and are specially adapted to the culture of the other fruits, including the celebrated Albemarle pippin, and to corn, wheat, oats, tobacco, and especially to grasses. They are in the midst of a refined society, with church and school facilities, 16 miles from Charlottesville and the University of Virginia, 3 miles from Gordonsville, with a station and post-office of Chesapeake and Ohio R.R. on the plantation, 2 miles from the homestead. At this station are two residences and a country store-house (belonging to the estate), the latter of long standing and established business. These lands present a rare opportunity for investment to a capitalist desiring a delightful country home with large possessions, or to a company of settlers to divide among themselves. The railroad runs for 2¾ miles through the place.

In addition to all this, these lands lie at the base of the Southwest Range of mountains, a part of the plantation running up on Peter's Mountain, the highest peak of that range, the climate being as healthy as any in the world. Besides these advantages, there is, for 2¾ miles through the plantation, a vein of hematite iron ore, accompanied by one of limestone, vertically projected, 80 ft. wide, and running parallel to the iron vein at a distance of about 200 yds. A great bargain can be had in these lands. For further particulars, apply to JOHN M. PATTON, Commissioner of Circuit Court of Albemarle County, at Ashland, Hanover County, Virginia.

A NET SIX PER CT. INCOME

FROM DEBENTURES OF THE FIDELITY LOAN AND TRUST COMPANY, STORM LAKE, IOWA. CASH CAPITAL, $150,000.

The New York Tribune of Oct. 20, 1886, in its financial article, says: "The 6 per cent. debenture bonds of the Fidelity Loan and Trust Company of Storm Lake, Iowa, are secured by deposit with the Metropolitan Trust Company of New York of mortgages on improved property in the West—principally in Iowa. The Fidelity Company is endorsed by some of the best-known bankers in this city."

A superior investment for Savings and Trust Funds, where safety is the first consideration. Address

WILLIAM G. CLAPP, Treasurer, 7 Nassau Street, New York.

Books for Veterans

AND FOR ALL INTERESTED IN THE HISTORY OF THE WAR.

Recollections of a Private Soldier.

By Frank Wilkeson. 16mo, cloth extra, $1.00.

"After so much has been written by the commanding officers, it is refreshing to find a book that tells simply but graphically how the private soldiers lived, fought, and died."—Oregonian.

"One of the most interesting narratives of the civil war that have been published."—St. Paul Press.

"A thrilling and evidently truthful picture. . . . The book will make a sensation."—Washington Republic.

"One of the few books out of the great mass of war literature that will survive and will make a lasting impression."—Rochester Post-Express.

"The author has done the country a real service in writing this book, . . . which will be read with delight by every honest veteran."—Buffalo Express.

"The work of a writer of recognized ability, who possesses exceptional powers of observation and description, and who possesses also the courage of his convictions. . . . His pictures are most graphic and his thrusts unerring."—Baltimore Sun.

Uncle Sam's Medal of Honor.

An Account of some Noble Deeds for which it has been Conferred in the United States. By Theo. F. Rodenbough, Bvt. Brig.-Gen. U. S. A. 12mo, with 106 illustrations and an accurate list of all recipients of the medal. Cloth extra, $2.

"A book that will be dear to the officers and soldiers of the late war."—Army and Navy Register.

"It is a splendid record of the most genuine heroics."—Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

"The accounts of the gallantry and devotion of the heroes of the regular army on the frontier are admirable."—Rochester Post-Express.

"The book is most creditable to the heroism of the American soldier, and will have a special fascination for all who delight to read of deeds of daring."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

27 and 29 West 23d St., N. Y.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE COMPLETE Index.—Ten Numbers (Abbott—Vespucci) now ready. The few likely to be interested in this troublesome and expensive work may examine it in the great Libraries, Boston; Redwood, Newport; Mercantile, New York; Case, Cleveland; Michigan State, Lansing; Public, Milwaukee; Congressional, Washington; etc. Price to Subscribers, $1.50 a number; to all others, $2.00.

E. ROTH, 1135 Pine St., Philadelphia.

A REAL GARDEN!

The fourth and enlarged edition of our book, A FEW FLOWERS WORTHY OF GENERAL CULTURE, ready February 1st, is certainly the most beautiful work on flowers yet published. In it we have endeavored to show how a most lovely and fascinating garden can be made with hardy plants, and how great a mistake is the present almost universal custom of using nothing but the so-called bedding plants—geraniums, coleus, etc.—for gardening purposes. The book is superbly printed, and among its contents are the following illustrated papers: "Hardy Plants and the Modes of Arranging Them," "Tropical Garden Effects," "Hardy Plants in England," "Decorative Possibilities of Hardy Climbers," "Roses Old and New," "Splendid Garden Effects with Hardy Lilies," "The Making of the Hardy Border," "Success with Hardy Roses," and "Rhododendrons, Kalmias, and Hardy Azaleas." The illustrations are profuse and most artistic, and show the garden effects of different plants.

This book of real merit and exquisite beauty will be sent, postpaid, for 50c., bound in durable flexible covers, or in leather for 75c.; but the price paid will be allowed on the first order sent for plants, making the book really free to customers.

Our Descriptive Catalogue, containing a complete list of the best New and Old varieties of Roses, Clematises, Rhododendrons, Hardy Azaleas, Carnations, Lilies, Tuberous, Begonias, Gloxinias, and the largest collection of Hardy Plants in America, sent on receipt of 10 cents in stamps.

Our Special Low-Priced Offers of valuable and well-grown plants sent free.

The Musa Ensete (The Great Abyssinian Banana) is a remarkable and the most beautiful plant known for producing a tropical effect in the garden or lawn. We have a large and almost exclusive stock, which we offer at very low prices.

B. A. ELLIOTT CO.,

PITTSBURGH, PA.

New Medical Books.

A Text-Book of Medicine.

For Students and Practitioners. By ADOLPH STRÜMPELL, formerly Professor and Director of the Medical Polyclinic at the University of Leipsic. Translated, by permission, from the second and third German editions by HERMAN F. VICKERY, A. B., M. D., Assistant in Clinical Medicine, Harvard Medical School, etc., and PHILIP COOMBS KNAPP, Physician to Outpatients with Diseases of the Nervous System, Boston City Hospital, etc. With Editorial Notes by FREDERICK C. SHATTUCK, A. M., M. D., Instructor in the Theory and Practice of Physic, Harvard Medical School, etc. With 111 Illustrations. 8vo, 981 pages. Cloth, $6.00; sheep, $7.00.

A Manual of Operative Surgery.

By JOSEPH D. BRYANT, M. D., Professor of Anatomy and Clinical Surgery, and Associate Professor of Orthopædic Surgery in Bellevue Hospital Medical College; Visiting Surgeon to Bellevue Hospital, and Consulting Surgeon to the New York Lunatic Asylum and the Out-Door Department of Bellevue Hospital. New edition, revised and enlarged. With 793 illustrations. 8vo, 530 pages. Price, cloth, $5.00; sheep, $6.00.

Paralyses: Cerebral, Bulbar, and Spinal.

A Manual of Diagnosis for Students and Practitioners. By H. CHARLTON BASTIAN, M.A., M.D., F. R. S.; Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians; Examiner in Medicine at the Royal College of Physicians; Professor of Clinical Medicine and of Pathological Anatomy in University College, London, etc. With 136 Illustrations. Small 8vo, 671 pages. Price, cloth, $4.50.

The Methods of Bacteriological Investigation.

By FERDINAND HUEPPE, Docent in Hygiene and Bacteriology in the Chemical Laboratory of R. Fresenius at Wiesbaden. Written at the request of Dr. Robert Koch. Translated by HERMANN M. BIGGS, M. D., Instructor in the Carnegie Laboratory, and Assistant to the Chair of Pathological Anatomy in Bellevue Hospital Medical College. Illustrated by 31 Woodcuts. 8vo, 218 pages. Price, cloth, $2.50.

A Text-Book of Ophthalmoscopy.

By EDWARD G. LORING, M. D. Part I. The Normal Eye, Determination of Refraction, and Diseases of the Media. With 131 Illustrations and 4 Chromo-Lithograph Plates, containing 14 Figures. 8vo, 267 pages. Price, cloth, $5.00.

An Atlas of Clinical Microscopy.

By ALEXANDER PEYER, M. D. Translated and edited by ALFRED C. GIRARD, M. D., Assistant Surgeon United States Army. First American from the Manuscript of the second German edition, with Additions. 90 Plates, with 105 Illustrations, Chromo-Lithographs. Square 8vo. Price, cloth, $6.00.

A catalogue of new MEDICAL PUBLICATIONS and NEW EDITIONS is now ready, which will be sent to any address on application.

D. APPLETON & CO.,

PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

THE NEW SOUTH AND THE OLD.

THE SOUTHERN BIVOUAC,

A REPRESENTATIVE LITERARY MAGAZINE.

Its Field Peculiar, and Its Success Assured.

During the past two years the SOUTHERN BIVOUAC has represented, in its papers on history, politics, outdoor life, industrial resources, social life, poetry, and romance, both the Old South and the New.

SOUTHERN INDUSTRIES.

In its table of contents may be found papers on "The Invention of the Cotton Gin," "The Invention of the Cotton Picker," "The Sugar Fields of Louisiana," "The Rice Fields of South Carolina," "Orange Culture," and "Pure Bred Live Stock in Kentucky."

The papers by Mr. John Duncan on "Pure Bred Live Stock in Kentucky" will be continued during this year. For early publication is announced "The Vines and Wines of Virginia," "Southern Naval Stores," and one or more on the mineral resources of the Southern States.

SOUTHERN HISTORICAL PAPERS.

In March, April, and May, the SOUTHERN BIVOUAC published valuable articles by Colonel R. T. Durrett on the "Resolutions of '98 and '99," settling finally the authorship of those resolutions. In May and June, it published some interesting illustrated articles on "The Virginia Cavaliers"; in September, October, and November, it published Paul Hayne's delightful papers on "Ante-Bellum Charleston." These papers, with biographical and critical sketches of Southern statesmen and men of letters, will be continued from time to time. The "Unpublished Letters of Jefferson," begun in December, will be completed in March or April, and in February will begin some biographical papers of Captain John Cleves Symmes, the author of "Symmes' Theory" of a hollow world. In an early issue there will appear sketches of General P. R. Cleburne and John C. Calhoun.

WAR PAPERS.

Each issue of the magazine contains much in relation to the civil war. It has published valuable papers on Hood's Campaign in Tennessee; on Bragg's Invasion of Kentucky; on the Fall of Fort Sumter, and on Chattanooga. It has ready for early publication a series of articles by General E. M. Law on "The Fight for Richmond"; an article by Dinwiddie B. Phillips on the "Merrimac"; with other articles relating to various features of the contest.

The papers by Judge Thomas H. Hines on "THE NORTHWESTERN CONSPIRACY"

constitute one of the most valuable contributions to a true history of the war that has yet been made. These papers began in the December issue, and will continue for several months.

POETRY AND FICTION.

The short stories in the SOUTHERN BIVOUAC have been original and pleasing. They describe Southern character, Southern habits of life and modes of thought in a graphic manner. For early publication stories are announced from H. S. Edwards, "A Government Clerk"; from Falcon, "'Squire Johnson's Court"; from Lee C. Harby, "Jessamine"; from Mrs. M. Sheffey-Peters, "Hi Roark's Shadow," and "The Dance of Death"; from H. W. Cleveland, "Old Scipio"; from Will Wallace Harney, "Origin of Creek Fire." In addition, papers will be published describing peculiar features of life in the Southern States, among them a paper by Young E. Allison on the Mountaineers of Eastern Kentucky. Poems from Margaret J. Preston, Clinton Scollard, Will Wallace Harney, William H. Hayne, Charles J. O'Malley, and others will appear from time to time.

Reference is made to these articles not as exhausting the resources of the SOUTHERN BIVOUAC, but to define, as far as possible, the field which it seeks to occupy, and to show that in its purposes, and in what it has accomplished, it is a worthy representative of the literary and artistic element in the Southern States. It is enough to show that the new South is not to be exclusively a material revival; that the activity so noticeable elsewhere is not lacking in literature and in other branches of life. Moreover, the magazine aims to present fairly, faithfully, but with no prejudice or passion, the story of the old South; to trace its progress, its development, and its perpetuation in the South of to-day.

To show that in this attempt the publishers have met with no small measure of success, we submit only a few notices from the press, which has been unusually encouraging and cordial:

[The Nation.]

The SOUTHERN BIVOUAC for March has a valuable contribution to the history of the "Kentucky Resolutions of 1798 and 1799." This consists in part of a facsimile of Thomas Jefferson's letter of December 11, 1821, to J. Cabell Breckenridge, in which he avows the authorship of the resolutions. There is also a facsimile of a printed copy of the resolutions as they passed the Legislature, of which the author of the article says it is "an original copy now in the possession of the writer." The reproduction of the letter, with the address, frank, and postmark, conclusively settles the disputed point as to the person to whom the letter was addressed.

[Penman's Art Journal.]

The SOUTHERN BIVOUAC for October is the best number of a $2 magazine we have ever seen. If a subscriber in the course of a year should read nothing but Maurice Thompson's paper, "Ceryle Alcyon," he would be amply repaid.

[Christian Observer.]

It occupies the foremost place in the publications of the South, and compares favorably with any in the land.

[Washington Hatchet.]

The SOUTHERN BIVOUAC is the best magazine which the South ever gave to literature. It has the sectional color which one expects from its name, but this adds to its general value. Its literary standard is decidedly above the commonplace, and it has proven itself most admirably able to do the work which it had marked out.

[Christian Union.]

The first volume of the SOUTHERN BIVOUAC, just received, handsomely bound in cloth, decidedly increases our respect and regard for this Southern magazine. We are pleased to learn that it is receiving that measure of success and popularity to which its merits entitle it. As a whole, this volume gives indubitable evidence of judicious and intelligent editing.

[Chicago Inter-Ocean.]

Among the most interesting of the magazines that come to our table. It is mainly devoted to army life among the Confederates and the incidents and history relating thereto, but all told in the best possible spirit, and as enjoyable to the Union as the Confederate soldier.

[N. Y. Observer.]

The October number is in all respects the finest which has come under our notice, and is wanting in scarcely any feature of a first-class periodical. The BIVOUAC is the foremost literary representative of the new South, and as such we wish for it the fullest measure of success.

[Boston Herald.]

It is a source of genuine pleasure to open the SOUTHERN BIVOUAC in these days. There is not a trace of political bitterness in it, and there is considerable evidence that writers, new and old, at the South are making a strong effort to maintain their former literary standing.

[Indianapolis News.]

It is by odds far ahead of anything the South has produced in periodical literature.

[Hartford Courant.]

The SOUTHERN BIVOUAC has earned its prosperity by deserving it. It is well written, well edited, and well printed, handsome to look at, full of things worth reading, a credit to its editors and a credit to the new South. The numbers from June, 1885, to May, 1886, have been put between covers as Volume I of the New Series, and a very attractive book they make—a book, too, well worth a place in Northern as well as Southern libraries.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS, $2.00. SINGLE NUMBERS 20 CENTS.

Southern Bivouac and Louisville Courier Journal (Weekly), - - - - - - - - - - - $2.25
Southern Bivouac and Atlanta Constitution (Weekly). - - - - - - - - - - - - - $2.25

The NORTHWESTERN CONSPIRACY Papers began in December. Back numbers furnished when desired.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWSDEALERS OR BY MAIL. ADDRESS

SOUTHERN BIVOUAC, Louisville, Kentucky.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1887.

The Week.

THE coal-heavers in New Jersey have struck for an advance of wages, and propose to have the fairness of the demand settled by the arbitration of "District Assembly No. 49"—that is, by themselves. Their work is heaving or "handling" coal—that is, shovelling it from cars into barges, or from barges into cars, as the case may be—the lowest form of manual labor. They say that if they get what they ask for, their pay will amount to two dollars a day, which seems high for this sort of work at this season. But, whether high or low, the fact is that for every man who does not think one dollar and seventy-five cents enough for this sort of work, there is another waiting for the job which he rejects, and eager to take it if they can get protection from the police while doing it. The same thing is true of the striking 'longshoremen who are now disturbing the steamship owners. The trouble there is, that the Union men do not wish other men to accept payment of their wages by the week or by the month from the Old Dominion Company, instead of payment by the hour. There is, as we understand it, no dispute about the rate of wages. Nor is there any dispute between the company and that portion of the men who are paid by the week, about the time of payment. A does not say that he does not wish to be paid by the week or month, but by the hour. On the contrary, he prefers it because it means steady work. It is B, who is paid by the hour, or is not in the employment of the companies at all, who is dissatisfied by the way in which A is hired. He therefore tells A that he must not be paid monthly or weekly, and, on A's refusing to heed him, lies in wait for him as he goes to his work, and tries to hit him with a stick or stone. More than this, B goes to other steamship wharves, and threatens to hit with sticks and stones anybody who moves freight which has ever passed through A's hands. While all this is going on, not only is an important branch of business suspended or greatly impeded, but A and his family live in terror of their lives—almost as great terror as if they were settlers in the Apache country when Geronimo was afield. His wife and children expect every morning when he leaves his home to see him brought back with his skull fractured or his ribs broken, and all because B does not like weekly payments.

There are concerned in the coal strike about 6,000 men, all manual laborers—that is, 3,000 on strike, and 3,000 who want, if protected by the law, to do the work which the strikers refuse to do. The presumption is that the latter 3,000 possess in a far higher degree than the others the conditions which in a laborer excite commiseration. They are evidently poorer; they are more willing to work; they have undoubtedly families in a large number of cases dependent on them for support. They are, too, much more peaceable, for, instead of attacking the strikers and driving them from their work, so as to get the job for themselves, they allow the strikers to drive them from it, in the absence of police protection. Nevertheless, they are a forgotten element in most of the discussions about strikes. Nine out of ten of us when we talk of "labor," mean simply the laborers who join the unions, and never think of the still larger number of even more necessitous laborers who do not choose to join the unions. We talk as if the 3,000 strikers had a right to be employed to heave coal by a particular employer, and as if the other 3,000 had no right to be employed by anybody, but were bound to look on and starve, while the strikers loafed and lived on "assessments."

There seems, in view of the proceedings at St. Stephen's Church on Monday, nothing for the followers of Henry George to do but start a church of their own. We do not believe that any of the existing religious denominations has the requisite accommodation for the doctrine that the land of the country may be lawfully taken from its present owners without compensation. This may be possibly a moral doctrine or the doctrine of the future, but no existing church is ready for it or likely to be within any reasonable period. In all existing churches no distinction is made between real and personal estate, as the subject of property rights; and all consider the ousting of a man from his house or land against his will to be robbery in the ordinary acceptation of that term, and as such an improper thing for a good church member, and much more a professional theologian, to advocate or be engaged in. Under these circumstances, if the Georgites feel the need of a religious creed and religious services of their own, the wise and kindly thing to do is to start a church, and embody the George view of land in the creed. It is not for us to suggest the precise way in which it should be organized, but it may not be unbecoming to express the opinion that Henry George should occupy a very high, if not the highest, place in the hierarchy. In fact, the place of Archbishop does not seem a bit too high for him. It would not, in truth, be as high as that held by another famous reformer, Brigham Young, in the Mormon Church. The advantages, too, of belonging to a church whose founder is still living, and may be consulted at any moment on knotty points of doctrine and discipline, are too obvious to need enumeration.

The popular demonstrations in favor of Dr. McGlynn are, no doubt, deserved tributes to his long, laborious, and faithful services as a pastor. But such services are common among the Catholic priesthood. Indeed, a parish priest who should fail in rendering them could not long hold his place. Neither the services themselves nor the affection which they inspire can hide the real issue of the controversy, which is whether Dr. McGlynn will obey an authority which even Martin Luther recognized and bowed to when he was summoned to the Diet of Worms. What the authorities of the Church at Rome might do if its summons were obeyed, is an after consideration; but the meetings held and the resolutions passed on Monday went upon the assumption that Dr. McGlynn had already been tried and condemned, which is wholly gratuitous and strictly false. Nor does it stand to reason that the Church of Rome, in so grave a matter as this, is likely to have its counsels swayed and its world-wide policy established by the assumed prejudices of Archbishop Corrigan and Vicar-General Preston in New York.

The anti-Mormon bill as passed by the House last week preserves the main features of the act as it was sent over from the Senate last winter. The most important new departure in this measure is the section which annuls all territorial acts establishing the religious corporation known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, and the corporation known as the Perpetual Fund Emigration Company, and makes it the duty of the Attorney-General to dissolve these corporations. It is through these corporations that the Mormon Church has done its work, and their destruction is undoubtedly a terrible blow for the hierarchy. At the same time it must be admitted that the North Carolina member who opposed the bill on the ground that this proposition is unconstitutional, made out a strong case. The Constitution provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," and it is certainly a grave question whether under this provision it has the right to dissolve a religious corporation because members of the corporation break the laws. The principle that a legislative body may thus interfere in religious matters is a dangerous one to establish, and its adoption in this case is the less excusable because there seems no doubt that polygamy could be overthrown without recourse to so doubtful an expedient.

The passage of so drastic a measure with scarcely a dissenting vote by a Democratic House disposes of another Republican bogy. Next to the theory that the Democrats were going to pay the rebel debt and pension the ex-Confederates, perhaps the most popular of the old stand bys for the Republican organs and stump-speakers has been the claim that the Democrats favored polygamy in the expectation of converting the Territory of Utah into a Democratic State. At the rate things are now moving, there will not be a splinter left by 1888 of that ancient "view-with alarm" plank of the Republican platform.

The House of Representatives passed last week the measure, which had been urgently recommended by the President in his annual message, to provide for an additional Judge of the United States Court in New York, but not without some remonstrance from Western members, who alleged that their needs for more judges were quite as pressing as those of the commercial metropolis. If this claim is well founded, it is an argument for more judges at the West also. No disposition of the Treasury surplus, or that small portion of it required to recompense the Federal bench, can be made so advantageously as by employing a sufficient number of first-class men, and paying them first-class salaries, to clear the court dockets and keep them clear. The delays of justice in the Federal courts, and in State courts as well, amount in many cases to a denial of justice. How great and aggravating is that denial here in New York a few facts will explain. Secretary Manning, in reply to a House resolution of March 23, 1886, stated that there were then pending in this district 2,201 separate revenue causes dating from October, 1867, and involving the aggregate sum of $11,519,268. It was estimated that the interest running against the Government on the claims, which would probably be decided in favor of the plaintiffs, was $150,000 per annum —an amount sufficient to pay the salaries of twenty-five judges at their present rate of compensation. This is the state of the case as regards Government business only, or rather one single branch of it. How must it be with the ordinary business of private litigants? The truth is, that New York has become as great a centre of commercial litigation as it is of commercial transactions generally. The business of the Stock Exchange, and of the Clearing-house (as compared with other similar institutions in the United States) is fairly representative of the business of the United States courts. Suits involving railroad and other corporations in Texas, Oregon, and every State in the Union, and mining properties in all the Territories, are multiplying here all the time. Patent suits are gravitating here more and more, while the admiralty business corresponds in magnitude to the shipping carried on at this port, and the criminal business is no small item. The net result is a perfect gorge, at which the Judges, Wallace and Brown, with such help as they can occasionally get from neighboring districts, are toiling with more than Sisyphean industry. It ought to be an axiom of the public service that its judicial equipment should keep pace with the country's growth. Instead of one new judge for this district we ought to have six, and they ought to have $10,000 a year each. They could all be kept employed.

The passage by the House of the bill to pension all dependent soldiers and dependent parents of soldiers is the first departure, on a large scale, from the foundation principle of pension laws. This principle affirms, that the Government is held to look after and provide for those soldiers who have been more or less disabled and hindered from earning a living by wounds or disease contracted in the service. As to all others, it made a contract to pay them so much per month, to provide them with rations and clothing, and restore hem at the expiration of the service to their respective homes. Some departures have been made from this rule in particular cases before now, and these have whetted a demand that the rule itself shall be set aside, as it has now been by the vote of the House. The new rule, if anything can be called a rule which is only the discretion of Congress, means that pensions shall hereafter be granted according to the ability of the taxpayers to supply the money. This is what we are coming to. But the worst part of the bill that was passed on Monday is that which makes "dependence" a gauge of the right to draw a pension. It is a premium on sloth, a discouragement to independence. When we read the piteous tales of hardship endured by ex-soldiers after twenty-three years of peace—hardship not traceable to military service in any way whatever—we sometimes wonder what must be the condition of the ex-Confederates, to whom no pension ever comes, no matter what degree of disability may have been incurred by them in addition to the loss of the great battle itself. How do these men get a living? Who supports them?

There is an air of opéra bouffe about the proposed investigation of the Pacific Railroads by a permanent salaried, and boarded, and free-passed, and liquored, and tobaccoed commission attached to the Interior Department. The character of the investigation is disclosed by a letter written by Theophilus French, ex-Auditor of the Pacific Railroads, to a person in the office of the Central Pacific Company, obviously intended to be shown to Mr. Huntington, in which Mr. French hints darkly at certain memoranda that he obtained in his official capacity years ago. It might be worth while for Mr. Huntington to pay something to get those memoranda out of French's hands, but he thought on the whole that it would be better to take the public into his confidence immediately by sending French's letter to the newspapers, and herein we agree with Mr. Huntington. It is reported that another ex official of the Auditor's office, a more recent product than French, and also a more rapacious one, is working up the proposed investigation. The steps taken by the intending blackmailers show very clearly that there is plenty of law on the statute-book now to make any desired investigation, for it is quite as easy for the present Auditor to get the information that French hints at as it was for French himself to get it. If Congress wants to know anything that has not been brought out in the numerous investigations and lawsuits of the past twenty years, it has only to signify its wishes to the officer in charge of the bureau created expressly for the purpose of auditing these accounts. This would be the regular course of procedure. The only objection to it appears to be that the present Auditor is a high-minded man, with a reputation to preserve, who would not lend himself to the particular kind of "investigation" that his predecessor, French, hints at. There may be items of past expenditure that the companies would rather not have made public, but they can much better afford to throw open their books than Congress can afford to equip a blackmailing commission.

A curious feature of the recent House debate upon naval reorganization was that the most important provision of the bill under consideration was ignored by both parties. The bill establishes a "board of council," which is to continue independently of the will of the Secretary of the Navy, except that he can change its personnel, and which is to advise him upon all questions of naval policy that he may submit to it. Under the existing system the Secretary of the Navy, like the heads of the other departments, gets the best counsel he can on each subject from the sources which he deems most authoritative. Whenever he wants the advice of a board, he convenes such a board as he thinks best, continues it as long as he finds it useful, and dissolves it when it has served his purpose. Under the proposed system a new Secretary, when he first enters the Department, will find a board already organized to receive him and to make his ignorance bliss, by tendering him professional counsel of so high authority that he will never need any knowledge of naval affairs except what his mentors may choose to impart. Then, when engines break down and ships capsize, he can compound with his conscience by the reflection that he never did anything but follow, to the best of his ability, the authority established by Congress for his guidance.

The project has no support in reason or in precedent. No one ever proposed or heard of a board of generals as a part of the legal organization of the War Department, to show the Secretary of War how to run his Department; nor did any Secretary of the Treasury ever ask Congress for a board of financial experts to advise him upon his fiscal policy. It would puzzle the most ingenious advocate of the plan to invent a sound reason why Congress should make the creation of a particular board of council mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy rather than upon the Secretary of War or the head of any other department. The Naval Committee did not venture upon the perilous task of explaining it in their report, and it is curiously illustrative of the indisposition of Congress to scrutinize the measures before it that, in a three days' debate upon the bill, not a member called for the reason of so anomalous a feature. That it originated either with the Committee on Naval Affairs or with Secretary Whitney, no one supposes; in fact, it has been urged from time to time by a few naval officers for forty years. But it never before got so far on its way without being challenged and turned back.

No one can read the argument of Professor Smyth before the Andover Board of Visitors, as it has been published in full, without carrying away a high opinion of its acuteness and learning, and a conviction of the author's perfect sincerity. Not every one, however, will be persuaded that his defence is entirely successful. He easily shows that he has not departed from the Seminary creed more widely than those who are at the bottom of the prosecution. In fact, there is something singular about the sudden zeal for the creed on the part of those who have been known, for years, to hold it, in parts at least, in a thoroughly non-natural sense. Andover students of ten or fifteen years ago could hardly bring themselves to believe it possible, when these proceedings were first talked of, that Prof. Smyth, the most conservative man on the Faculty, hopelessly behind the times, according to the standard of Prof. Park's lectures, should turn out a radical, while Prof. Park should appear as the virtual accuser of his colleague, on the ground of holding opinions at variance with the creed. There can be no complaint, certainly, by those who have brought on this trial that they have not been treated with abundant generosity by the defendants. Only in an incidental way have the latter shown that the prosecution did not object to departures from the creed, but simply to departures from its own particular departures. If an appearance of over-technicality is to be found in any part of Prof. Smyth's argument, it is where he contends for his right to hold to his views of future probation, even under a strict interpretation of the creed. That the new doctrine is not explicitly condemned in the creed may be true, but to contend, as the Professor does, that it is, in addition, logically implied in the creed, seems to be to fall into that confusion which Sir Henry Maine has shown to attach to the old idea that new legal decisions, really making new law, were yet but an inference from a definite, original set of legal principles. The unwillingness to admit a positive advance, which the author just cited affirms to be characteristic of jurisprudence, is an old failing of theology. And when Prof. Smyth goes further, and refuses to interpret the creed by the known opinions of the men who framed it, he would seem to be disowning one of the accepted canons of historical symbolics.

Decidedly the most interesting thing brought out in this trial is the attitude towards the Andover creed, not of the accused professors, but of their present judges. The testimony of Professors Hincks and Harris made it clear that they had been distinctly and directly authorized by the Board of Visitors to take the creed with any number of mental reservations, even including this very matter of future probation. We should think it must have been very hard for President Seelye and Dr. Eustis to maintain a becoming appearance of judicial gravity when it was put in evidence that they themselves had already passed upon the main question submitted to them, and that they were very much in the position of a civil judge called upon to find a man guilty of an offence which he had privately assured the accused was not indictable. To make this comic situation complete, it is now announced that a decision is not to be expected until after a considerable time; the judges must needs deliberate carefully, it is said. It had long been suspected that the trustees and visitors were of the opinion that the subscription exacted of the Andover professors meant nothing in particular. This suspicion became a certainty, three or four years ago, when Prof. Thayer demanded that the trustees should set him right by making public the assurances which they had given him in private, and indignantly resigned on their refusal to do so. After the express declarations made in the present trial, we do not see how it can any longer be questioned that the Andover idea of subscription is much like the old French Legitimist's view of the Charte as given to Niebuhr—"that it had been granted, but that of course there was no intention of observing it."

For some years past, Prince Bismarck has only put in an appearance in the Reichstag when it has become necessary to bring his personal influence to bear upon that body in the interest of Government measures. It is a matter of record that, on almost every such occasion, he has lost his temper, and, instead of argument, has employed violent abuse, threats, and insults in addressing the Opposition. It is not too much to say that no minister in Europe ever ventured to treat a representative body with such contemptuous imperiousness, and, but for the forbearance of his adversaries, out of deference to his age and great past services to Germany, his vehemence would have led more than once to turbulent scenes on the floor of the Reichstag. In his recent speeches on the Army Bill, he was more than true to his regular rôle of parliamentary bully. Nevertheless, the passage of the Army Bill could not possibly result in any immediate considerable strengthening of the imperial army, and its failure would not at all involve the national danger which the Chancellor made the burden of his speeches. The Minister of War admitted distinctly before the Committee to which the bill was referred, that, under the actual operation of the measure proposed by the Government, the army would be increased by only about 14,000 men at the end of the first year, and that it would take altogether fully twelve years to reach the total maximum increase of 150,000 men of the active army and reserve. He admitted, further, that if war should break out in the spring, it would be unwise to attempt to carry out the provisions of the bill, as this would obstruct the mobilization of the army. The Opposition had, therefore, the advantage of being able to contradict Bismarck's plea for the urgency of the bill out of the mouth of another spokesman of the Government.

Neither the speeches of Bismarck nor of Moltke contained anything new except Bismarck's contemptuous dismissal of the Bulgarian trouble as something which does not concern Germany, and for which Germany will certainly not break with Russia. This was doubtless intended to back up Moltke's warning to France that she is not going to catch Germany unprepared. The increase of the army, Moltke said, meant peace. The refusal to increase it would mean war, and France must also understand that no opportunity for aggression through an alliance with Russia was going to be afforded her. Of course, this is also a warning to Austria that she must look after her own interests in the Balkans, without help from Germany; but as she certainly can count on England and Italy, and has nothing to fear from Germany, it will probably not greatly disconcert her. France, it is pretty sure, will never take the field against any first-class Power until she has again tried her strength with Germany. All her military resources will be husbanded for a supreme effort to recover Alsace and Lorraine.

The condition in which this increase of armaments will leave Europe is something which will always remain a blot on the history of modern civilization. It is something which, in what is called "an industrial age," is really astounding. France, Austria, Germany, Italy, and Russia have very nearly 3,000,000 men in the flower of their age constantly under arms in time of peace, and offer enormous premiums to the best talent of the period for the improvement of instruments for the destruction of life and property. Besides this force, another still larger, although not constantly under arms, is kept more or less tormented and disturbed by drills and evolutions in preparation for war. All these Powers, too, are now gradually furnishing their troops with repeating rifles in exchange for the old breech-loaders, which made such a sensation twenty years ago. There is no immediate prospect of an end to this state of things until the Ottoman Empire is dead and it is finally settled who is to have Constantinople. Europe came out of the war of the French Revolution in 1815 with two burning questions constantly ready to set the Continent in a blaze. One was the Italian, and the other the Eastern question. The Italian question was disposed of by the three bloody wars of 1859, 1866, and 1870. The Eastern question has caused two almost equally bloody, that of the Crimea and that of 1877. These brought it somewhat nearer to a solution, but the end is still far off, and will probably only be reached by another frantic struggle. The Turk has his trunk packed and is ready to go, but he would be a bold man who should undertake to say who his successor will be.

The death of Lord Iddesleigh removes one of the best of the older school of politicians from English public life — the school which bred Canning and Peel and Gladstone, and which made the English House of Commons, since the Reform Bill, the foremost debating assembly in the world. He was an English gentleman of the very best sort, well-informed, conscientious, public-spirited, fair-minded, just, kindly, and good-tempered. He treated everybody courteously, and his statements in public and private life could be absolutely relied on. As soon as the Disraeli type of Toryism began to take root—the tricky, unscrupulous, evasive, and abusive type—Sir Stafford Northcote, as he then was, began to find himself more and more out of place, and his removal to the House of Lords was a plain hint that the party needed a different kind of man. Putting him in the Foreign Office while suffering from a disease which made excitement dangerous, was, in the present state of European politics, simply a sign of the extreme scarcity of first-rate men in the party. But the attempt of some of the Liberal journals to make political capital out of his death by throwing the blame of it on Lord Salisbury, seems brutal as well as absurd. Every man who goes into politics takes the chances of the game, and it is for him to judge whether he is physically fit to face them or not. Nobody else can or ought to decide for him whether they will put his life in danger or not. What those who put an unsound man in a responsible place have to consider, is not whether the duties of it will kill him, but whether he will be competent to discharge them properly while he lives.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

WEDNESDAY, January 12, to TUESDAY, January 18, 1887, inclusive.

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has approved a new civil-service rule, giving the Civil-Service Commissioners power to appoint a Central Board of Examiners, to which will be submitted all examination papers of candidates' grading.

The Senate on Friday refused by a vote of 25 to 36 to recommit the Inter State Commerce Bill for conference, and subsequently passed it by 43 to 15. The affirmative vote consisted of 23 Republicans and 20 Democrats. Three Democrats voted in the negative. The House will adopt the conference report by a large majority.

The House on Wednesday passed the Tucker substitute for the Edmunds Mormon Bill. The bill makes the lawful husband or wife of any person prosecuted for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation a competent witness against the accused; provides for the registration of all marriages, making it a misdemeanor for any person to violate the provisions relative to such registration; annuls all Territorial laws providing for the identification of the votes of electors at any election, and also all laws conferring on the Territorial courts the power to determine divorce cases, and abolishes woman suffrage in the Territory. Penalties are prescribed for unlawful intercourse, and polygamy is defined as a marriage between one person of one sex and more than one person of another sex, and is declared to be a felony. The financial corporations known as the Church of Latter Day Saints and the Perpetual Emigration Fund Company are dissolved, and the Attorney-General is directed to wind them up by process of court; and all laws for the organization of the militia of the Territory and the creation of the Nauvoo Legion are annulled. Polygamists are made ineligible to vote, and a test oath is prescribed to all persons desiring to vote that they will obey the laws of the United States, and especially the laws in respect to the crimes defined in this and the original Edmunds act. The bill provides for the immediate appointment by the President of all judges and selectmen of the county and probate courts, and by the Governor of all justices of the peace, sheriffs, constables, and other county and district officers.

The House of Representatives has passed, by a vote of 222 to 26, the bill to create a Department of Agriculture and Labor. It passed on Wednesday a bill authorizing the appointment of an additional United States Judge in the Second Circuit, which includes New York, Connecticut, and Vermont.

In the House of Representatives on Friday Mr. Caldwell (Dem., Tenn.) submitted the conference report on the Electoral Count Bill, and it was agreed to without debate or division. The amendments of the House to the bill are substantially adopted, and the principal changes made in the text are in the nature of more definite statements touching the exclusive right of the States to determine what electoral returns shall be presented to Congress. What is known as the Oates amendment was also accepted by the Senate conferees. The effect of this amendment is to strike out of the Senate bill the clause which allowed the President of the Senate to announce the name of the successful candidate, and confine his functions to the mere announcement of the state of the vote, which will be regarded as sufficient to indicate the result.

The Senate Trade-Dollar Bill, with the amendment of the House Committee, was submitted to the House on Saturday morning. The silver men gave notice of a minority report, and say privately that they will oppose the bill to the end unless the House agrees not to interfere with the present purchases of silver bullion.

The House of Representatives on Monday, under a suspension of the rules, passed, by a vote of 179 to 76, the bill for the relief of dependent parents and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who are now disabled and dependent on their own labor for support. Mr. Matson (Dem., Ind.) said that the total number of persons who would be benefited by the bill was estimated at 33,105, and the annual cost to the Government would not reach $6,000,000

The bills granting pensions to Mrs. Logan and Mrs. Blair, widow of Gen. Frank Blair, were defeated on Tuesday in the House Committee on Invalid Pensions, the Democrats voting against them.

United States Senators were practically elected on Tuesday by the Legislatures of the several States in separate session as follows: Maine, Eugene Hale (Rep.); Delaware, George Gray (Dem.); Illinois, Charles B. Farwell (Rep.); Missouri, F. M. Cockrell (Dem.); Michigan, F. B. Stockbridge (Rep.); Minnesota, C. K. Davis (Rep.); Pennsylvania, M. S. Quay (Rep.); Connecticut, J. R. Hawley (Rep.). The contests are close and undecided in New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Nebraska, Massachusetts, and West Virginia.

The Democratic majority in the Indiana Senate on Monday evening unseated McDonald (Rep.) on the ground that he had used money in securing his election; and gave his seat to Brannowan (Dem.). This gives the Democrats two majority on joint ballot.

The Republican Senatorial caucus at Albany made no nomination on Monday night. The first ballot resulted: Miller 44, Morton 35, Hiscock 12; necessary to a choice 48. On a second ballot the only change was a transfer of one vote from Hiscock to Morton. The caucus then adjourned to meet on Tuesday night. The Democratic caucus nominated Smith M. Weed. In the Assembly and Senate on Tuesday the Republicans voted as they had in caucus, and the Democrats for Mr. Weed. There was consequently no election. Mr. Miller gained one vote in Tuesday night's caucus.

The annual report of the New York State Board of Charities shows that the value of the property devoted to charitable purposes on October 1, 1886, was $52,128,192.

At a meeting of the reform Democrats of Maryland in Baltimore on Wednesday night the following resolution was adopted: "That we heartily endorse the national Administration of President Cleveland in its efforts to secure reform in the currency and tariff reform, and also its civil-service reform, whenever it is carried into effect in its true spirit, but we are compelled to express our regret that in the State of Maryland the laws and rules establishing said reform are not administered in good faith, and that the Federal appointments in Maryland, with few exceptions, have been made in accordance with the spoils system in its worst form, which system the American people condemned in the election of President Cleveland himself."

Gov. Rusk of Wisconsin, in his biennial message to the Legislature, said: "With those agrarian and socialistic theories of fanciful society that deny the right of private property, or of each individual to full protection in the enjoyment and control of all his lawful earnings, whether obtained by his own labor or by contract, we can have no sympathy. They are as un-American as monarchy, and as treasonable as secession. They contemplate the destruction of both justice and liberty, and would accomplish the destruction of both if their application to existing society were seriously attempted. We are not prepared as American citizens to even consider a change in our form of Government. Republican institutions and individual liberty go hand in hand, and must and will be loyally maintained."

Judge Pratt of Brooklyn on Thursday evening denied the application for a stay of proceedings in the case of ex-Alderman Arthur J. McQuade. He was taken to Sing Sing on Monday.

Owing to a strike of coal-handlers in this city and shipping points tributary to it, a coal famine is threatened.

The Rev. Dr. Edward McGlynn, who has been suspended from his pastoral functions at St. Stephen's Roman Catholic Church, in this city, on account of his advocacy of Henry George's doctrines, was succeeded on Saturday by the Rev. Arthur Joseph Donnelly, for thirty years pastor of St. Michael's Church, at Ninth Avenue and Thirty-first Street. The congregation have held an indignation meeting.

Jonas Gilman Clark, the wealthiest citizen of Worcester, Mass., has announced his intention of founding in that city an institution for the promotion of learning in all its higher branches, to be called Clark University. He will start it with an endowment of $1,000,000.

Mrs. Abby Kelley Foster, widow of Stephen S. Foster, the anti-slavery agitator, died in Worcester, Mass., on Friday. She was born at Pelham, Mass., January 15, 1811. Her parents were descendants of Irish Quakers, and she was educated at a Friends' school, and became a teacher. At the age of twenty-six she resigned her position as a teacher, and started out as an anti-slavery lecturer, being among the first women to address mixed audiences in favor of abolition. She suffered many indignities. In December, 1845, she married Stephen S. Foster in Pennsylvania, and was in full accord with his advanced opinions, speaking with him for many years. Their home was on a farm near Worcester up to Mr. Foster's death some years ago. Mrs. Foster necessarily took an active interest in woman suffrage, and also became a pronounced Prohibitionist. In private life she was amiable and unassuming. Her last work was the preparation of material for a biographical sketch of her husband on Tuesday of last week. She has led a quiet and invalid life during recent years.

Henry Brewster Stanton died on Friday of pneumonia, in this city, in the eighty-second year of his age. He was a native of Connecticut. His early education was acquired in the district schools. In 1826 he removed to Rochester, N. Y., where he wrote for a newspaper, entered politics as a Whig, and became Deputy County Clerk. Then he studied in Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, intending to enter the ministry. The anti-slavery agitation diverted his course, and, as general agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society, he travelled all through the Northern States and in some of the border States, delivering speeches. In many instances the meetings which he addressed were broken up by mobs. He attended the World's Anti-Slavery Convention in London in 1840, and spoke in most of the large cities of Great Britain and Ireland. During the years 1838–1840 he was active in the movement to form the abolitionists into a compact political party, which was resisted by Garrison and others, and resulted in a lasting dissension in their ranks. After this he acted with the Liberty party, and then joined the movement to establish the Republican party. Meanwhile he had studied law, and practised it with success, at first in Boston and afterwards at Seneca Falls, N. Y. He was twice elected to the New York State Senate. When Horace Greeley was editor of the Tribune, Mr. Stanton wrote for that paper, and for the last eighteen years he had been a member of the editorial staff of the Sun. In the latter part of his life his political affiliations were with the Democratic party. Mr. Stanton married in 1840 Miss Elizabeth Cady of Johnstown, N. Y., daughter of Daniel Cady, an eminent lawyer.

Prof. Edward Olney of the University of Michigan, the author of a complete series of text-books and one of the best-known educators in the West, was found dead at his home in Ann Arbor on Sunday. He was sixty years of age.

Gen. W. B. Hazen, the Chief Signal Officer, died in Washington on Sunday evening. He had been out of health for some time. Gen. Hazen was born in Vermont in 1830, and was graduated from West Point in 1855. He first served against the Indians, was later Assistant Professor of Military Tactics at West Point, and served through the war for the Union. He was appointed Chief Signal Officer in 1880.

Prof. Edward Livingston Youmans, the distinguished writer on scientific subjects, died in this city on Tuesday at the age of sixty-five. He established the Popular Science Monthly in 1872, and has since been its editor, assisted in recent years by William J. Youmans. For nearly forty years Prof. Youmans has held intimate relations with the publishing house of D. Appleton & Co., and it is understood that his influence had much to do with making the publication of scientific works a leading feature of the firm's business. Through him Herbert Spencer's works were first published in this country. Prof. Youmans was a personal friend of Mr. Spencer, and was well known to scientific men in all parts of Europe. He projected in 1871 the "International Scientific Series," arranging for the publication of the works in New York, London, Paris, and Leipsic, with a subsequent extension of the system to Milan and St. Petersburg. He was the author of a 'Class Book of Chemistry,' 1852; 'Alcohol and the Constitution of Man,' 1853; 'The Chemical Atlas,' with text, 1855; 'The Handbook of Household Science,' 1857; 'The Correlation and Conservation of Forces,' 1864; and 'The Culture Demanded by Modern Life,' 1867.

FOREIGN.

The debate on the German Army Bill was continued in the Reichstag on Wednesday. Herr Hasenclever declared on behalf of the Socialists that they would oppose every increase of the army. He vehemently criticised the contemptuous manner in which the Chancellor refered to the Reichstag, and said that in every other Parliament in the world a minister who so treated the majority would be forced to resign. The Chairman called Hasenclever to order. Both Hasenclever and Windthorst reproached Bismarck for his blunt explanation of German and French relations, which they said would excite instead of calm France. Bismarck made no reply.

Prince Bismarck made another notable speech in the Reichstag on Thursday, in the course of which he said: "The papers even ask us to use our soldiers to bar Russia's road to Constantinople. To do this would, perhaps, be in England's interest. But we have a difficult task to maintain peace and act permanently as moderator between two Powers, both our friends. Had I acted in 1867, at the epoch of the Luxemburg question, not as mediator, but in the manner in which I have been asked to do now, I should not have had to meet one bloody war alone, but many. In years to come, if Russia attacks us, then we must and shall defend ourselves to the last drop of blood. As matters stand, Russia has no cause to attack us, nor have we any cause to attack Russia. It is just as little conceivable that the Poles would involve us in war with Russia, for it would be very doubtful whether they would profit by Russian victory. I fail to understand how the same party should, on the one hand, seek to involve us, while on the other hand they would refuse or curtail the means of war. The comparison which has been drawn between our treaty with Italy in 1866 and the agreement of the King of Hanover with Napoleon does not hold good. According to the latter the Hanover Legion was only to act in the event of the cession of the left bank of the Rhine. You found no analogous clause in our treaty with Italy. There could never have been a question of the cession of German territory. Nor is it possible to show the existence of any understanding with Italy bearing the slightest resemblance to that between George V. and Napoleon III."

On the reassembling of the Reichstag on Friday Herr von Stauffenberg's amendment limiting the duration of the bill to three years was carried, the vote being 186 to 154. The Conservatives, Imperialists, and National Liberals voted with the minority. The Socialists and most of the Alsatian members abstained from voting. Prince Bismarck immediately read an imperial message dissolving the Reichstag. An imperial decree was issued on Friday afternoon, fixing February 21 for the holding of general elections for members of the new Reichstag.

The publication in Paris of the full text of Prince Bismarck's speeches in the Reichstag is tending to alter the tone of public opinion regarding his utterances. The Chancellor is charged with brutality, and with endeavoring to provoke a war with France. The principal result will be to strengthen Gen. Boulanger's demand for military credits. The War Minister, in order to avoid a conflict with his colleagues, has consented to accept a credit of 87,500,000 francs as sufficient for the present year; but his original demand for 325,000,000 francs remains his estimate on paper.

M. Floquet, on assuming the chair of President in the French Chamber of Deputies on Thursday, said he hoped that wise concord and a spirit of compromise would prevail among the members of the Chamber, who, he hoped, would all be animated by patriotic emulation to work for the progress of national institutions, in the first rank of which the Government placed the army. This declaration was received with applause. Continuing, M. Floquet said: "When, without distinction of party, we follow with equal solicitude the earnest efforts of the valiant youth of France, and when with unanimous impulse we accept every sacrifice to increase our country's power, we do not feel agitated by feverish impatience or desire. Only with tranquil persevering shall we place ourselves in position to fulfil all our duties and secure for France the respect of all. The essential condition of that is peace, which we prize as highly as anybody in the world."

In a test vote on Monday in the French Chamber of Deputies, Premier Goblet was sustained by 273 to 220.

The Russian budget for the past year shows a deficit of $26,113,310. The Minister of Finance proposes to raise $30,357,140 for extra expenditure by means of a loan.

Italy will act as mediator between Russia and Bulgaria, France having refused the duty.

In the recent Greek elections all the members of the Ministry were returned. The Government will have a majority of two-thirds in the new Chamber.

The British political world was startled on Wednesday morning by the announcement that Lord Iddesleigh had died suddenly. He fainted while ascending the stairs of Lord Salisbury's official residence in Downing Street as he was about to visit his Lordship. He was taken to the Prime Minister's room and expired in twenty minutes. His physician says: "Lord Iddesleigh for many years past has suffered with cardiac affections, which, while not placing his life in immediate peril, rendered the prospect of its sudden termination only too possible. He died of syncope." Lord Iddesleigh (Sir Stafford Henry Northcote) was born in London October 27, 1818, educated at Eton and Oxford, graduating first in classics, was private secretary to Mr. Gladstone in 1843-5, when the latter was President of the Board of Trade, and in 1851 succeeded to the Baronetcy of his grandfather. He assisted Sir C. E. Trevelyan in drawing up a report, in 1854, which led to the civil service being thrown open to public competition. He entered Parliament in 1855, was Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1859, President of the Board of Trade in Lord Derby's third Administration in 1866, and Secretary of State for India from 1867 to 1868. He was a member of the Joint High Commission whose labors resulted in the Treaty of Washington in 1871. In 1874 he entered Disraeli's Cabinet as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and when Disraeli became a peer he succeeded him as leader of his party in the House of Commons, holding office until 1880. Sir Stafford led the Opposition during Gladstone's Ministry from 1880 to the formation of the Salisbury Ministry in June, 1885. Meanwhile Lord Randolph Churchill had come into notoriety by his frequent attacks on Mr. Gladstone, his breaches of party discipline, and his evident sympathy with certain phases of Radicalism. He gradually surrounded himself with a coterie of young men who aspired to turn Toryism in new directions. When Lord Salisbury formed his first Ministry (June, 1885), this element worked to have Sir Stafford Northcote "decently shelved." He was given the high Cabinet office of First Lord of the Admiralty, but was transferred to the House of Lords under the title of Earl of Iddesleigh, thus losing his leadership. In Salisbury's second Ministry (1886) he was made Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. This office he held until Lord Randolph Churchill's recent resignation from the Cabinet. In order to enable Lord Salisbury to form a coalition Cabinet with the Whigs, Lord Iddesleigh proffered his resignation. When the Prime Minister failed in that undertaking, Lord Iddesleigh considered himself entitled to his old portfolio, but was offered the Privy Seal. This he rejected, and retired from office under a strong sense of having been ill-treated.

It was announced in London on Tuesday that Saturday's Cabinet Council determined to bring in a bill at the beginning of the session to empower the Crown in certain cases to summon special jurors, and, if necessary, to change the venue, and also to confer on magistrates power to deal summarily with inciting to conspiracy, intimidation, and boycotting, the punishment for such offences not to exceed three months' imprisonment. The striking feature of this news is, that even a Tory Government no longer dares introduce a coercion bill for Ireland alone; for the new bill will be applicable to the whole United Kingdom.

Mr. W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury, and Conservative leader in the House of Commons, has sent a circular to supporters of the Government asking them to make every effort to attend the opening of Parliament, as they will be invited to proceed directly to the consideration of questions of grave importance.

Mr. Goschen will contest the Exchange Division of Liverpool. He has issued an address in which he asserts that he is still a Liberal, and that he rallied to the support of the Government under the influence of deep conviction that the duty of men of all parties was to close up their ranks in the face of the common danger threatening the existence of the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Bright, in a letter declining an invitation to attend a meeting of the advocates of federation, on the ground that he has no sympathy with the objects and purposes thereof, says the federation project is mainly the offspring of the jingo spirit which clamors for a vast and continually widening empire, and seems almost ready to boast that the Empire can fight the world outside of its own limits. Mr. Bright says he would recommend sensible men to let the question rest.

In the course of a speech in London on Thursday Mr. Henry M. Stanley said that he had decided to take the route by way of the Congo River as the best and most expeditious for the relief of Emin Pasha. Passage might be forced by other routes, but he pointed out that after the caravans had passed along them all those routes would be closed, while the Congo would always be open. The expedition would leave London, he said, January 20. Later reports of his intentions point to the Zanzibar route.

LABOR LEGISLATION.

Among the few labor problems which, nearly all persons are agreed, can be dealt with by legislation, are the two questions of child labor and weekly cash payments of the laborers' wages. No dispute, it is thought, can arise here as to either the wisdom or the efficiency of summary and stringent laws to limit the one and to enforce the other. England and America have gone far to restrict the employment of children in factories, and economists are at one with philanthropists in seeking to extend such legislation by advancing the limit of the child's lawful working age. Equally are they agreed as to the need of some means for abolishing store payments and monthly payments of wages, and substituting the cash system. If there are great difficulties surrounding both these reforms, as to the need of which there is little difference of opinion, should we wonder that the radical philosophers and orators who declaim about the wrongs of labor either take refuge in generalities, when asked to frame bills to carry their ideas into effect, or end in some ridiculous climax like Gov. Hill's recommendation that a new legal holiday be established, to be called Labor Day, and to be set apart for meditating on the subject of labor?

The two questions of child labor and weekly payments form the subjects of the annual report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the State of Connecticut. This Bureau has been in the charge of Prof. A. T. Hadley, as Commissioner, a trained thinker, investigator, and statistician, known to the country as the author of the best treatise on another vexed question, commonly called the Railroad Problem. It has been stated in the newspapers that Prof. Hadley's place as Commissioner "is wanted" by some politician or Walking Delegate, and that he is to be removed from office. However that may be, he has left on the public records of the State the most intelligent and painstaking examination of these two labor problems that has been supplied from any American source. That his sympathies are altogether with the laboring man is apparent on every page, but he does not fail to show that the reforms demanded, which upon the whole he favors, can be gained only after much pain and suffering among the wage workers themselves, and at the expense of the poorest and feeblest members of the class.

Connecticut passed a law last year prohibiting the employment of children under thirteen years of age. "If any law is to be obeyed," says the report, "this one ought to be." Yet there has been the greatest resistance to its enforcement. This has come from places where it would be least expected—that is, from the most needy operatives, "to whom the twenty-five cents a day that a child can earn by working in the mills is a present consideration that will outweigh anything else, who will not merely connive at evasions of the law, but make every effort to obstruct its enforcement." The case is cited of a twelve-year-old boy who was actually supporting a family on wages of five dollars a week earned without detriment to his own health and vigor. When the law came in force he was driven out of the factory by the State inspectors. This case is cited, not as an argument against the law, but as an index to the secret and powerful opposition to its enforcement among the operatives themselves. Prof. Hadley thinks, however, that "the general object to be obtained is so good that we must be prepared to enforce the law even though it may create great hardship in individual cases." He thinks that the thirteen years' limit can be enforced, and that possibly a fourteen years' limit might be, but that beyond this there would be grave doubt whether the State could insure obedience to it. As a general rule applicable to all labor laws, Prof. Hadley remarks that "when workmen are ready to make personal effort to enforce the law in their behalf, it is surprising how little legislation is needed." It is a great mistake to suppose that employers are the ones to suffer from the discontinuance of child labor, or that they are opposed to its abolition. The effective opposition comes from the weakest of the laboring class, since it is upon these that the heaviest burden of the change falls.

The larger part of the report is taken up with the questions of weekly payments, factorizing, store pay, the credit system, etc. Here we have not only a large array of statistical information and individual opinion from employers and employees, but also a careful collation of the laws of other States, all forming the foundation of a methodical treatment of the subject. The question is really that of the cash system against the credit system in factory labor. The cash system is the best, of course, because it dispenses with interest on money, and promotes habits of saving and thrift among the operatives. The laboring man is easily enticed, by the facility of obtaining credit, to spend a little more than he would if he had the money in his pocket and was obliged to pay cash down. There is a certain amount of sheer waste in the credit system that amounts to a loss to the whole community. Why not, then, pass a law requiring all employers to pay their workmen weekly? Three leading objections are urged by employers, who are, however, rather the small employers in the villages distant from banks than the large firms and corporations. In so far as there are hardships connected with the system of weekly payments, Prof. Hadley shows by a rigid analysis that they will fall upon the weaker firms, and by so much add to the predominance of the stronger—in other words, create monopolies or enlarge existing ones. The three objections are:

(1.) In many lines of business it is impossible to ascertain as often as once a week the amount which a man has earned; still less possible is it to pay him for work which is in an unfinished state.

(2.) In a still larger number of cases payment at frequent intervals, while not absolutely impracticable, seems to involve additional expense and inconvenience on account of the additional clerical force and work which it demands.

(3.) Other concerns, again, especially in the smaller towns, find it difficult to maintain the necessary cash reserve which weekly payment involves.

All these objections are examined by the light of the statistical and other information gained, and all are set aside as insufficient to rebut the arguments which are urged in support of the proposed law. But when we have got to the end, we find that we have not, after all, abolished the credit system, which is the real object of attack, since usurers will step in and lend money to improvident operatives at exorbitant rates of interest, if they are sure of getting paid in the end. This condition would be rather worse than the existing state of things. After considering all the pros and cons, Prof. Hadley concludes and recommends, as a measure better than any arbitrary requirement respecting weekly payments, that a law be passed exempting from legal attachment (prior to the obtaining of judgment and execution) the wages of laboring men, and he favors total rather than partial exemption. Already, exemptions, either total or partial, are embodied in the laws of one-half of the States of the Union. The protection which the right of attachment gives to the storekeeper being taken away, he will give no more credit except to those whose personal character entitles them to it. A law against the assignment of wages would be a necessary corollary, and these two measures are considered to be the only practicable and self-executing means to achieve the ends sought to be reached by the system of weekly payments.

JUDGE GRESHAM'S DECISION IN THE WABASH CASE.

It will be worth the while of any person interested in railroad securities to read the decision of Judge Gresham in the case of the Wabash Railroad (now published in the Federal Reporter), resulting in the dismissal of the receivers for breach of duty to the bondholders, and the appointment of a thoroughly competent man, Judge Cooley, as receiver in their place.

It is not hard reading. Like the opinions of most clear-headed lawyers, it is perfectly comprehensible to any one who will have the patience to make himself acquainted with the details of facts. There are no citations of authorities, no parade of aphorisms about moral duties, or repetition of the utterances of other courts, to break the sequence of the argument. Indeed, there is scarcely room for argument—outside of a court-room, where everything seems arguable—on a question involving the claims of receivers, based on orders obtained from a facile judge to pay debts of the Missouri Pacific Railway by receivers' certificates; which were expected to have priority over the earliest mortgages of the Wabash; while threats of enforcing them as such were used to compel the bondholders to accept a lower rate of interest for bonds which were perfectly secure, if the rights of the holders were respected. These bonds the receivers had greatly depreciated in value, and had rendered apparently insecure by diverting the revenues of the road to other purposes than the payment of the interest on the earlier securities.

Without any rhodomontade, the opinion states that an order was obtained directing the receivers to pay a loss of more than three millions of dollars, incurred by the Missouri Pacific in operating the Wabash system as lessees, just as if it was a debt of the Wabash Railroad, when it was, in fact, that of the lessees to whom the profits would have accrued, and who therefore were responsible for the losses. The Court does not take the trouble to inquire whether such a loss was incurred, or whether it was only a question of book-keeping, but is satisfied to state that it was not a debt of the Wabash which the receivers paid.

Next, it disposes of an order directing the receivers to pay $2,300,000 of notes of the Wabash Railroad endorsed by Solon Humphreys, one of the receivers, and by Gould, Dillon, and Sage, in the petition for which it appears that the notes were endorsed by sundry individuals of high credit and financial standing. "For the sake of entire frankness," says the Court, "the name of Solon Humphreys was disclosed as one of the endorsers, but the names of Gould, Dillon, and Sage, the other three endorsers, were withheld 'because of the personal inconvenience and injury which might result from the publicity given to their business affairs.'"

It next takes up a most charming arrangement by which the receivers supplied the railroad with coal from a mine owned by Humphreys, one of the receivers, Gould, Dillon, Sage, Hopkins, and Charles Ridgley, all directors of the Wabash, at a price which Judge Gresham could not approve of, and in relation to which the opinion says: "Men with a proper appreciation of their rights and of the rights of others—trustworthy men—are not apt to be found in such inconsistent relations. Gould, Humphreys, Dillon, Sage, Hopkins, and Ridgley are men of stern integrity if their interests in the coal company did not improperly influence their action as directors of the Wabash Company."

Next the Court holds that the minority bondholders who refused to be bullied into accepting a lower rate of interest on their bonds, "if they selfishly stood out against the committee's scheme, and would enter into the most complicated litigation ever known in the railroading of this country, with its exasperating delays and endless expense," can have ample redress; dismisses the receiver, and directs the mortgage to be foreclosed for the benefit of the minority bondholders, who have some rights which the law and receivers must respect.

There is certainly a directness and clearness of purpose in this decision which contrasts favorably with the labored productions of some judges, who cannot state the most self-evident result without leaning for support on the decisions of other courts. Probably instances of equally gross malversations of duty have come before other courts. The dealings of the receivers and the directors with their coal mine appear, perhaps, less offensive to those engaged in railroads than to this judge and other men; but the wholesale payment of the loss of one railroad out of the property in the hands of the receivers of another, belonging to the mortgage creditors, is certainly exceptional, and the payment of Humphreys's and Gould's endorsements of unsecured debts may be called unique. It is not often, however, that the offence is so distinctly stated, and the result made to follow so absolutely, and without any apology by the Court to offenders as high in financial circles as these.

With the order dismissing the receivers who did the wrong, and proceeding to give redress to the minority whose rights were threatened by the Purchasing Committee, the decision ends. For these latter persons there is redress, but what is the redress for those whose timidity or poverty compelled them to sell out at a depreciation? Probably none. That class of people go to the wall, or into smaller rooms and garrets, and trouble syndicates no more in this world.

HOW THE PEOPLE VOTED.

THE Republican press, and that part of the Democratic press whose happiness is increased by any indication that it thinks it can discover of a lack of popular support of President Cleveland, made much use, immediately after the November elections, of the discovery that the Democratic majority in the next House of Representatives would not be so large as is the majority in the present one. No mention was made, of course, of the fact that, at the Congressional election that follows a Presidential election, it has almost uniformly been the case that the representation in the popular legislative body of the party in power has been decreased, and especially was there an omission of any presentation of the vote of the people by States. The official canvass in many of the States is made with deliberateness, and it was not until the announcement was made on Monday of the official vote of Texas that a presentation of the State statistics could be made in official form. Now that they are at hand they are worthy of inspection.

Twenty-four States voted last November for State officers at large. Of these, the official vote of all but one—Colorado—has been declared. There being practically no opposition tickets in either Delaware or South Carolina, and only a judicial contest in North Carolina, these States are omitted from the tables of comparison. The pluralities of the heads of the other State tickets compare as follows with the pluralities for Presidential candidates in 1884; all the States not marked with an asterisk elected a Governor last year:

PLURALITIES.

	1886		1884
	Rep.	Dem.	Rep.	Dem.
Cal	.....	652	13,128	.....
Conn	.....	1,898	.....	1,276
*Illinois	34,705	.....	25,118	.....
*Indiana	3,319	.....	.....	6,427
*Iowa	14,712	.....	19,773	.....
Kansas	33,918	.....	64,274	.....
Mass	9,463	.....	24,372	.....
Michigan	7,730	.....	3,308	.....
Minn	2,600	.....	41,620	.....
Missouri	.....	50,635	.....	33,059
Neb	23,300	.....	22,521	.....
Nevada	594	.....	1,615	.....
N. H	485	.....	4,066	.....
N. J	.....	8,020	.....	4,412
*N. Y	.....	7,818	.....	1,047
*Ohio	11,781	.....	31,802	.....
Pa	42,851	.....	61,019	.....
Tenn	.....	16,801	.....	9,180
Texas	.....	163,540	.....	125,301
Wis	18,718	.....	14,698	.....
Total	204,176	249,364	327,314	180,702
Net	.....	45,188	146,612	.....

The changes which this table presents are very striking. It will be seen that the Republican majorities in 1886 show a loss of 123,138, while the Democratic majorities show a gain of 68,662, making a total Democratic gain (or Republican loss) of 191,800.

The total Republican and Democratic vote in the years named was as follows:

	1886		1884
	Rep.	Dem.	Rep.	Dem.
Cal	84,318	84,970	102,416	89,288
Conn	56,920	58,818	65,923	67,199
Illinois	275,366	240,661	337,469	312,351
Indiana	231,922	228,603	238,463	244,990
Iowa	180,309	165,597	197,089	177,516
Kansas	149,615	115,697	154,406	90,132
Mass	122,346	112,883	146,724	122,352
Michigan	181,518	173,788	192,669	189,361
Minn	107,064	104,464	111,685	70,065
Missouri	178,490	229,125	202,929	235,988
Neb	75,956	52,656	76,912	54,391
Nevada	6,463	5,869	7,193	5,578
N. H	37,819	37,334	43,249	39,183
N. J	101,919	109,939	123,336	127,778
N. Y	460,636	468,454	562,001	563,048
Ohio	341,095	329,314	400,082	368,280
Pa	412,485	369,634	473,804	392,785
Tenn	109,837	126,638	124,078	133,258
Texas	65,236	228,776	93,141	225,309
Wis	133,247	114,529	161,157	146,459
Total	3,312,561	3,357,749	3,814,726	3,655,111

An analysis of this last table shows that, while the Republican vote of 1886 fell off in the twenty States 502,165 as compared with that of 1884, the Democratic vote suffered a loss of only 342,550. Thirteen of these States gave a plurality for Blaine in 1884, and seven of them gave a plurality for Cleveland. In nine of the Republican States the Democrats made gains in 1886, and in a tenth (Wisconsin) the Republican candidate, as is acknowledged, received many votes outside of his party because of his firm stand against the rioters last summer. Every one of the seven States that were Democratic in 1884 increased the Democratic majority last year save one, viz., Indiana. If the Blaine press or the anti-Cleveland Democratic press can find in these figures any grounds for thinking that public opinion is shaping itself in favor of a spoils ticket in 1888, they are welcome to make their plans accordingly.

We add a fuller comparative table of the Prohibition vote of 1884 and 1886 than has been published:

	1886.	1884.
California	6,432	2,920
Connecticut	4,691	2,305
Illinois	19,527	12,074
Indiana	9,185	3,528
Iowa	578	1,472
Kansas	8,094	4,495
Massachusetts	8,251	9,923
Michigan	25,333	18,403
Minnesota	18,966	4,384
Missouri	3,504	2,153
Nebraska	8,175	2,899
Nevada	.....	.....
New Hampshire	2,132	1,571
New Jersey	19,808	6,153
New York	36,414	24,999
Ohio	28,982	11,069
Pennsylvania	32,422	15,283
Tennessee	.....	1,131
Texas	19,486	3,534
Wisconsin	17,089	7,656
Total	268,769	135,752

Here is an increase of nearly 100 per cent. in the vote of this third party in two years, and an increase so evenly distributed that it has taken place in sixteen out of twenty States.

THE SHARPLES PORTRAITS.

THE comfortable assurance, under which many of our citizens have rested, that we were soon to possess veritable treasures in the so-called Sharples portraits of Washington and his family, now on exhibition and for sale in this country, has received a severe shock from the report on these portraits presented to the Massachusetts Historical Society on January 13 by Mr. Francis Parkman, chairman of a committee appointed by that society to investigate the historical value of these pictures. In November last, Major Walter, who represents the family in England now owning the portraits, and who has published a large and elegant volume entitled 'Memorials of Washington' (see No. 1114 of the Nation in support of their claim to authenticity, appeared before the Historical Society with a view to obtaining its backing in his appeal to the national Government at Washington to purchase the portraits for the nation. The result is the present report of Mr. Parkman, which will not be pleasant reading to Major Walter or his coadjutors. As a model of quiet and yet crushing sarcasm it is as good as Bentley's essay on the letters of Phalaris.

The claim in question rests mainly on letters published by Major Walter, which are ascribed to Washington, to the artist Sharples, and to "good Robert Cary," the London banker, who figures as "the friend, benefactor, and admirer" of Washington. Of the Washington letter, which has no date, Mr. Parkman says:

"Its style bears no resemblance to the well-known style of the alleged writer. It bears, however, a striking resemblance to the very peculiar style of Major Walter, which is marked by frequent and conspicuous solecisms. One of these is his often repeated use of the verb to name in the sense of to mention. Washington also is made to say, 'I have been solicited to name that, if Mr. Sharples thinks of returning to this country, a good opportunity would be offered to bring them [the pictures] out.' And again, a few lines below, 'My wife declines to join in asking your consent—I have undertaken simply to name it.' The letter begins with thanks for two jars of pickled tripe, sent as a present by Cary, and the illustrious writer adds: 'Dental infirmity impels us caring for this necessary item in our domestic commissariat'—a sentence eminently Walterian, as is also the injunction that Sharples shall be required to paint copies of his portraits 'in the best manner of his capability.'"

The original letter from which these precious extracts are taken is said by Major Walter to have been destroyed at Washington's own request "for politica reasons." No explanation is given of the sudden appearance in print of a letter which was destroyed in the last century. Another of Major Walter's favorite expressions is the use of evidence as a verb; and Sharples in his letters follows his modern admirer, and says: "General Hamilton evidences more what painters would call 'background knowledge.'" This and the other phrase to name have infected to a disgraceful extent the styles of Washington Irving, Hawthorne, Emerson, Macready, Col. Trumbull, Albert Gallatin, and others, as they appear in their letters quoted by Major Walter.

But the gem of the whole collection of letters is that of the banker Cary, quoted by Major Walter on p. 242 of his 'Memorials.' "There," says Mr. Parkman, "we look in vain for the characteristic traces of Major Walter's pen." But, "by a remarkable coincidence," the sentiments of the old London banker and even his very words reappear in a speech made by the Irish orator Charles Phillips in 1814 on Dina's Island, in the lakes of Killarney. We give the letter and the speech in parallel columns:

THE BANKER CARY.	CHARLES PHILLIPS.
"May not the follies of the Old World at some distant day inter all the pride of its power and the pomp of its civilization, and may not human nature find her destined renovation in the empire created by Washington! May not the glory of past great ones prove to be legendary traditions! The monumental record of natural rise and natural ruin proclaims that no splendor of achievement, no solidity of success, can insure to empire the permanence of its possession. Troy thought so once, yet the land of Priam lives only in song! Thebes thought so once, yet her hundred gates have crumbled and her tombs are as the dust they were destined to commemorate. So thought Palmyra! Where is she? So thought Demosthenes and the Spartans, but Leonidas is trampled by the timid slave. The days of their glory are as if they never had been, and the Island that was then a mere speck, rude and neglected in the barren ocean, now rivals all the wealth of their commerce, the glory of their names, the fame of their philosophy, the eloquence of their Senate, and the inspiration of their bards." ('Memorials of Washington,' p. 242.)	"Who shall say that when, in its follies or its crimes, the Old World may have interred all the pride of its power and all the pomp of its civilization, human nature may not find its destined renovation in the New? . . . When the glories of our name shall be but the legend of tradition, philosophy will rise again in the sky of her Freedom, and glory rekindle at the urn of her Washington. I appeal to history. Tell me, thou reverend chronicler of the grave, can ambition, wealth, commerce or heroism secure to empire the permanency of its possessions? Alas! Troy thought so once, yet the land of Priam lives only in song! Thebes thought so once, yet her hundred gates have crumbled and her monuments are as the dust they were vainly intended to commemorate! So thought Palmyra; but where is she? So thought the countries of Demosthenes and Leonidas; yet Sparta is trampled by the timid slave, and Athens insulted by the servile Ottoman. The days of their glory are as if they had never been; and the island which was then a speck, rude and neglected in the barren ocean, now rivals the ubiquity of their commerce, the glory of their arms, the force of their philosophy, the eloquence of their Senate, and the inspiration of their bards."

All will agree with Mr. Parkman's remarks on this coincidence:

"If it is not likely that the 'plain London merchant'—the words are Major Walter's—would have poured himself out in this rhetorical strain, neither is it likely that the Irish orator had ever heard of Cary, or still less have got access to his private papers. On the other hand, it is very likely that the words of Phillips, which have been often printed, and which some of us will remember in the school-books of our boyhood, may have met the eye of Major Walter."

The report ends as follows:

"The Committee began their inquiry under a strong impression that the three portraits were what they were represented to be; but this was quickly removed on an examination of the evidence produced by Major Walter in proof of his assertions, since it is of such a character that, for reasons given above, and others almost equally cogent, they feel compelled wholly to reject it."

We trust that the authorities at Washington will take this document into serious consideration before they add these new treasures to the national gallery of historic portraits.

NEBULOUS ENGLISH POLITICS.

LONDON, January 1.

THE Queen's jubilee year is coming in like a lion. It is to be hoped that it will be true to the whole of the proverb, and go out like a lamb. At present we are in the region of storms, meteorological and social. The one hope of peace abroad lies in the fact that France and Germany, between whom lies the real point of disturbance, are each too strong to attack the other. Neither can get at the other. The frontier on either side of the Rhine is reported by experts to be impregnable, save by the invasion of the neutral territories of Belgium and Switzerland. Austria is too weak to challenge Russia alone, and Germany would certainly not see Austria attacked and dismembered. If England's interest in the Bulgarian and Eastern questions is, as Lord Salisbury contends, too slight to make it necessary to interfere as a principal in the controversy, most persons will be disposed to agree with Lord Randolph Churchill that she ought not to interfere at all. However, reason and calculation speak only in the beginning of a quarrel, or before the quarrel has begun. Passion and accident usually decide the actual entrance into a fray, and, like love in the poem, will find out the way.

At home, politics, like the streets, are in a state of fog, which only now and then lifts. Statesmen, like pedestrians, are involved in "a London particular," and accidents and collisions abound. When I last wrote to you, I mentioned the opinion entertained by some very close observers that Lord Randolph Churchill's retirement from the Government would not be long delayed, and that before the session was many weeks old he would have found a pretext for withdrawing himself. In the view of some well-placed critics it was thought that the opposition of his colleagues, or, if they were won over or bullied into acquiescence, of a large number of the Conservative party, to closure by a simple majority would give him the pretext which he desired. But he has been in too great a hurry to wait. I referred also to the opinion that an understanding existed between Lord Randolph Churchill and Mr. Chamberlain, and that they would find an opportunity of coming together. This, too, has been confirmed. Mr. Chamberlain, who could not come to London to attend the Unionist meeting over which Lord Hartington presided, was called to town, no doubt on purely private business, a day or two before Lord Randolph exploded his resignation on the public in the columns of the Times. He dined with the Chancellor of the Exchequer—as Lord Randolph Churchill was then and still is, and will be till his successor is appointed—in Connaught Place. There is reason to suppose that he knew what was going to happen. The speech which Mr. Chamberlain delivered in Birmingham on the day of the announcement scarcely affected surprise. The eulogy which he passed on Lord Randolph's democratic Toryism had all the air of being thought over beforehand, and of having been kept in reserve for the occasion. The relations between Lord Randolph and Mr. Chamberlain have been very close and intimate, off and on. Each has a strong admiration for the audacity and unscrupulousness, and an immense belief in the cleverness and the future, of the other. They have a good deal in common. Lord Randolph is a sort of Blenheim Chamberlain. Mr. Chamberlain is a sort of Brummagem Churchill. They are drawn together by the attraction which unites, not like to like, but like to difference. Personal and political quarrels have not been infrequent with them. They have attacked each other in the House, reciprocating accusations of treason and falsehood, to which neither of them is particularly sensitive. There have been seasons in which they have ceased to speak to each other; but the quarrels have been those of outraged affection, and have been followed by the renewal of love.

Another political revolution has been not less remarkable. Mr. Chamberlain has bitterly resented Mr. John Morley's claim to have a political soul of his own, and his daring to remain in a government which Mr. Chamberlain had quitted. In the political sense, Mr. Chamberlain believed that he had invented Mr. John Morley and patented him, and that no one else had a right to employ him. Their mutual criticism on public platforms has been of a more than sub-acid kind. Lord Randolph is supposed to cherish the same sentiment towards Mr. Henry Mathews, whom he brought into the Cabinet and made Home Secretary, and who has declined to follow Lord Randolph out of the Cabinet. To return to Mr. Chamberlain. His speech at Birmingham was interpreted as showing signs of a yielding or coming-on disposition, and Mr. Morley was authorized or felt himself at liberty to enter into negotiations with him. They have celebrated their personal reconciliation by going to the play together, and witnessing Mr. Irving's performance of the part of a politician able to give lessons to the most expert wire-puller and caucus manager. Whether a political understanding with a more considerable personage than Mr. John Morley will follow this personal reconciliation, is a question which is hidden in the bosom of the future and of Mr. Gladstone. If Mr. Gladstone can see his way to modifying and restricting his home-rule scheme so as to bring it within limits compatible with the maintenance of the United Parliament as established in the Act of the Union, and the authority of the Imperial Executive over every portion of the United Kingdom, the controversy, so far as Mr. Chamberlain and the Radical Unionists are concerned, would be at an end. There would still be room for a large devolution of properly Irish business to a National Council, with its own Executive acting in subordination to the Imperial Parliament and Executive. Mr. Chamberlain cannot go further than this without self-stultification. Mr. Gladstone, with no other inconsistency than is involved in a statesmanlike accommodation of himself to circumstances, might fairly take the result of the last general election as decisive against the form and mechanism of his scheme, and set about the task of adjusting it to the conditions imposed by the declared opinion of the nation. If Mr. Gladstone cannot bring himself to take this course, there seems to be little advantage in sanctioning his late Chief Secretary's explorations into Mr. Chamberlain's feelings and intentions. Even if Mr. Gladstone's personal objections were overcome, Mr. Parnell would have to be squared or otherwise operated on. The "gastric fever" of the Irish Parliamentary leader has happily been subdued, but there is reason to fear that the "complications" with which it was accompanied remain. Mr. Gladstone, however, might not be indisposed to welcome a reunion of the Liberal party which should put it into the position in which he invited the country to place it at the general election of 1885—a position in which, while prepared to listen to the suggestions of the Irish party, it should be numerically and therefore morally independent of them.

It is obvious from many public symptoms as well as privately notorious, that Mr. Chamberlain feels his position as a dissentient Liberal following the lead of Lord Hartington as unsuitable as Lord Randolph Churchill felt his democratic Toryism to be in the Conservative Cabinet of Lord Salisbury. He cannot cut the knot as Lord Randolph did, and must, therefore, do his best to untie it. It is doubtful whether anything could bring back Lord Hartington into the Gladstone fold. It was his vote, added to that of the peers, which defeated, in the penultimate Gladstone Cabinet, Mr. Chamberlain's proposal of a National Council for Ireland. In the Cabinet deliberations of Mr. Gladstone's Government, Lord Hartington has always been much stronger in resistance than in his platform and Parliamentary declarations. It is only the personal authority of Mr. Gladstone which has kept Lord Hartington and Mr. Chamberlain in the same Government. It is doubtful whether they will ever belong again to the same ministry. A formal coalition of Whigs and Conservatives may not be imminent. What is more likely is such a reconstitution of parties as will rank the party of semi-socialistic Radicalism and experimental Democracy with Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. John Morley, and very possibly Lord Randolph Churchill, on the one side, and the adherents of the older political economy and the traditional politics of England—whether so-called Whig or Conservative—on the other.

For the moment, however, the question is, Will Lord Salisbury's Government last, and of whom is it to consist? This will be known to you in all its details so many days before this letter can be in your hands, that it would be challenging the worst fate that can imperil even a prophet, whether in his own country or in another, to venture on prediction. Lord Randolph may be in again and out once more before Parliament meets. There may be a large reconstruction of the Ministry or a paltry patching of it. The one thing certain is that there can be no result entirely satisfactory. Lord Randolph Churchill can only be an element of disturbance and distrust to any ministry which he may join or rejoin. Lord Hartington and his friends have elected to be independent auxiliaries of the Government. If Mr. Goschen were either now or in the course of a few weeks to be persuaded to come in as Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader in the House of Commons, he would be wholly out of harmony with the party which would vainly endeavor to follow him. His conservatism of the closet and of the city has nothing in common with the Conservatism of the Tory country gentleman and the Tory vestryman. In fact, there is scarcely the possibility of a real Conservative leader of the House of Commons. Such a man ought to unite the tact of the man of business, the good breeding of the country gentleman, and the combativeness of the prize-fighter. If Lord Salisbury could become Lord Robert Cecil again, the difficulty would be solved. But the House of Lords is like the other world—anybody may go there, nobody can come back from it. "Don't talk to me of Prime Ministers," said the late Sir George Lewis. "I can name half-a-dozen possible Prime Ministers. Tell me who your leader of the House of Commons is, and I will tell you how your Ministry will fare." For the moment, and probably for much longer than the moment, the policy of Lord Salisbury is reduced to the policy of keeping in—j'y suis, j'y reste—and of Lord Hartington of helping him to keep in. F. L.

THE LAND WAR IN IRELAND.

DUBLIN, January 4, 1887.

WHAT is known as the "Plan of Campaign"—that is, the united action of the tenants on each estate in demanding a reduction in rent proportioned to the fall in prices, and the payment, if the landlord refuses it, of the reduced rents to trustees, who are to use the fund to defend the tenants in case of legal proceedings—is an excellent substitute for the outrage, violence, tumult, and bloodshed which have characterized similar crises in past times. The plan has been entirely successful so far, for it has induced many landlords to recognize the inability of tenants to pay rents based on higher prices, and it has brought about many peaceful settlements. It is too soon to say how matters will end where the money refused by the landlord has actually been paid to trustees. A landlord with a long purse may possibly win; he may succeed in evicting some, and perhaps all, his tenants, if he perseveres to the bitter end; but it will only be at great money loss to himself.

There has been a good deal of discussion about the morality of the plan of campaign, much quibbling and sophistry. "Salus populi suprema lex" is, however, its one and ample justification. On the rejection by Parliament of Mr. Parnell's bill, a struggle of some kind was inevitable; it is better that it should be orderly and organized than spasmodic and accompanied with outrage, riot, and murder. The national programme will have gone far towards settling the question of the amount of rent to be paid, before the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the subject has framed its report. Meantime the situation between the Government and the Irish people is becoming more and more strained. The prosecution of Messrs. Dillon, Harrington, O'Brien, and others keeps the agitation in Ireland and the public interest in England alive. It should not be forgotten that the old Liberal party were just as ready as the present Government to resort to coercion, to make use of obsolete laws, to pack juries, and even to transgress the law in their efforts to put down agitation and to suppress the national spirit. But the old Liberal party is dead and gone, though in Ireland we have hardly realized the change effected by the last extension of the franchise. Those who in English and imperial politics are Liberals are pleased that the Conservatives should now be ringing the chapel bell, and keeping the Irish question to the front as they are doing. They are by their present policy helping towards a speedy settlement of the Irish land and home-rule questions; the issues to be settled are becoming narrowed and more clearly defined day by day. The Irish question will be as prominent next session as it ever was, and an insuperable obstacle to English and imperial legislation. English and Irish Conservatives have, it is evident, no policy of any kind on the subject, and the principle of Gladstone's Home-Rule Bill still holds the field.

Many stanch adherents of the national cause objected strongly to the details of that measure, and condemned the eagerness of the Irish members to accept it. Those who did so are as anxious for a real union between England and Ireland as any persons can be, but think that any imperial control in purely local questions will be a cause of friction, and will lay the foundation for a disturbance of friendly relations. A fallacious phraseology is current, and persons agree in words while they really mean very different things. "The supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is to be maintained." "Certainly," say both parties; but one person means that Parliament at Westminster is to be supreme to the extent of interfering, overseeing, and controlling all things as at present, while the other means that the Imperial Parliament is to be supreme in imperial matters only. Home rule would be a delusion if any English power of interference in purely Irish matters should remain. In peace and war, in colonial policy, in foreign relations, the Imperial Parliament should be supreme, but it should not have power to interfere in questions of local government or taxation, education, or administration.

A new weekly paper, to be called North and South, is about to be published in Dublin. It is intended to advocate principles of reconstruction and conciliation on the platform of home rule. Its policy will be a positive one, and not merely one of negation and attack on the enemy. C. H. Oldham, Hon. Sec. to the Protestant Home-Rule Association, has accepted the editorship. This is a guarantee that the paper will be free from all sectional taint, that it will be characterized by vigor and originality. In the political turmoil of the last six years, attack and defence have had exclusive occupation of men's minds. It is a good sign that the attention should now be directed to a consideration of our future and permanent organization. The landlord party is of course the one obstacle to home rule, but many landlords recognize that as inevitable. Some acquiesce passively in the national programme; others are only waiting in hopes that they may divest themselves of their landed property before joining the national ranks. The agrarian is inseparable from the home-rule question, and the leaders of both Conservative and Liberal parties are evidently prepared to terminate the land war by purchasing the landlords' interests. The only difference between them is, how and on what terms it is to be done. The Conservative plan is to adhere to the present system, by which each tenant purchaser is the direct debtor of the English Treasury. The Liberals would hand over the working of the scheme, and the collection of the interest, to an Irish Government which should be responsible for the repayment as a whole of whatever loans were made for this purpose. As long as the scheme is looked upon and worked as a political matter, and not on commercial principles, it will be unsound, and the taxpayer's money will be in danger. The Conservatives' plan is fraught with danger to the public purse, for with them the theory still prevails that the Irish landlord has been plundered, and that restitution is due to him. Hence the present Land Purchase Act was passed more as a landlords' relief bill than as a measure of permanent settlement.

In such a scheme the security of the public purse should be the first and paramount consideration. The danger lies not in the gross amount to be advanced, but in the possibility of imprudent lending of many small amounts. It is far more easy for administrators to say yes than no when it is a question of lending or giving other persons' money. It is unlikely that the Conservatives will be able to carry a vote of more money for this purpose on the present lines. They opposed Mr. Gladstone's bill in the alleged interest of the taxpayer, and however ready they may be to eat their words, they could not succeed in the face of Liberal and Radical opposition. John Morley, the bête noire of the landlords, is an uncompromising advocate of the necessity of a Land Purchase Bill. Over and over again he has stated in public that England was bound by every obligation of honor to the landlords to deliver them, as far as is compatible with public economy, from their evil plight; that she is bound, too, in setting up a government in Ireland, not to leave it with the burden of the present land system on its shoulders. Such a Government, he said, should have a fair start; it could not, however, until the relations of landlord and tenant were brought by some means or other into a more satisfactory state.

The prospect, then, before the Irish landlords is that of being bought out, but no longer on their own terms. In many cases they can now practically fix these. "Pay up an impossible rent, and all arrears, or buy at my price," are the alternatives given to the poorest occupiers. This is represented as a contract freely entered into, and as such the price is to be taken, according to the landlords, as the fair value of the land. Such contracts are often made without the exercise of any open duress, but with a great deal of undue influence. Any extension of the purchase system will probably include powers being given to both landlord and tenant to compel the other to sell or buy, as the case may be; the price to be fixed judicially or by arbitration. Copyhold legislation in England affords a precedent for this. That tenure having been found so inconvenient as to be contrary to the public welfare, laws and amending laws of a permissive character were passed to facilitate its abolition. Finally, and in spite of outcries of confiscation and interference with sacred rights, the present law was passed, by which either party can compel the enfranchisement of the copyhold lands. The question of the abolition of the Irish landlord and tenant system differs in principle from this only in its financial aspect. That, however, is one of the great stumbling-blocks to the average Englishman. As much money is spent annually and unnoticed in maintaining the landlord system as would carry on a considerable war; but the idea of voting directly a bulk sum for the termination of the war, and putting an end to the annual drain, has not yet been assimilated in England. A section of the Radical party is strongly opposed to any such use of the imperial credit, but if a system of prudent lending can be insured, and if the English taxpayers can be shown to be fully safeguarded, it is unlikely that this section would persevere in their opposition.

A LAND VALUER.

Correspondence.

THE INTER-STATE COMMERCE BILL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In this letter I shall try to point out what I believe to be the most important of the effects which would follow enforcement of the Inter-State Commerce Bill, and yet one which has well-nigh escaped attention.

If the short-haul rule is enforced, the result will be a vast system of local discrimination, too complex to be described. In the first place, it makes a discrimination as between the towns and the great trade centres. Obviously, the railroads will drop that part of their business which pays least, namely, the business from great cities, in order to preserve the more paying portion. This will not benefit the small cities particularly, but it will injure the great cities. The result would be a rise in the average rates of freight. This may be surprising, but it is none the less true, as the operation of a similar rule in Germany has, I believe, demonstrated. As regards the effect on our export trade, a striking example has been given by Commissioner Blanchard:

"The conference bill also absolutely prohibits taking grain, for example, from Kansas City to New York for direct Liverpool export, in national competition with the Black Sea and India, at even a fraction less than the charge to the residents of New York for grain there consumed. The former might be to the gain of every American interest involved and injure none."

Another authority points out that this provision would throw the carrying trade into the hands of the Canadian roads, which could put their through rates so low that the American roads would be compelled to drop their Chicago business altogether, in order to preserve the main body of their paying freight.

More important still, perhaps, though as yet hardly noticed, is the discrimination implied in the bill as between cities and sections having desirable water-communication and those which have not. In your issue of January 6, this appears clearly enough in the somewhat ingenuous remark of Mr. Nowell, that "The passage of this bill would make Duluth the great depot for Dakota wheat." This remark is followed up by the claim that "right then would commence the only real competition—that between carrying by water and by railroads." Why this is "the only real competition" is, I confess, as puzzling a question as why this competition should begin when one of the competitors is prevented from competing. Dakota wheat will still reach New York, whether this bill passes or not. It would practically take a very large army to prevent it. But I think it obvious that if the short-haul principle—which implicitly bases rates on distance—were put in force, "not a grain of Dakota wheat will reach the mechanics of New York." Under our present system, as Mr. Atkinson has beautifully shown in his "Distribution of Products," "the annual ration of 1,000 people can be placed in the city of New York from a point 1,700 to 2,000 miles distant, with an exertion of human labor equivalent to that of four men working one year in producing, milling, and moving the wheat." This rule simply multiplies the necessary labor.

If we examine the newspapers, we find evidence that this aspect of the bill is attracting attention, particularly in trade centres without water competition. The Cincinnati Times-Star says, "Mr. Reagan would sacrifice the commercial interest of the entire West in order that Galveston may roll in high clover. He is a patriot, perhaps, but his patriotism flows in a narrow channel." The Nashville Union says, "We cannot believe . . . that any member of Congress from Tennessee, Alabama, or Georgia . . . will vote for it. . . . Whenever he does, he signs the death-warrant of his section of country."

It may be admitted that the enforcement of this rule—a very different thing from enacting it into law—would benefit Duluth, Galveston, New Orleans, and the South Atlantic ports, though at the expense of the rest of the country. It may even benefit Chicago, St. Louis, and Toledo, though that is more doubtful. But it cannot, it seems to me, be doubted that it would be a crushing blow to Kansas, Colorado, Nebraska, the Pacific States, great parts of Texas, Dakota, and the Middle States. It would destroy nearly all those industries (or at least severely cripple them) which depend on a wide distribution, and for which extraordinarily cheap rates are as necessary as they are for coal. New York would be affected in both ways—both as a receiver of products and as a distributor of manufactures—and would probably suffer more by the actual enforcement of the short-haul principle than any other city in the country.

If any one has the fatuity to believe that the Commission created by the act would remedy the evil effects of it—if, like Mr. Richard T. Ely, he does not believe in experience as a guide, but thinks himself warranted in expecting what never yet has happened—there is still a reply. If the Commission is to dispense with the principle in these cases, does it not show there is something wrong in it? If the Commission is to let the necessities of traffic prevail in some cases, why should this not continue to be the rule in all cases as it is now? But the important thing is the actual probable result. This is, that the Commissioners—being human—would dispense with the rule wherever most "pressure" was brought to bear. Powerful centres like New York would be relieved of its operation very soon, while sections like the far West would be helpless. There would be combinations in the Commission and in Congress to favor certain cities, just as is now the case with the River and Harbor Bill. Does not this statement appeal to the common sense of the readers of the Nation?

Lastly, I wish to give two instances of the working of the commission system which have come within my own experience. In Michigan the law provides that the Commissioner of Railroads shall "approve" the maps of proposed railroads. In one case the Commissioner arbitrarily refused his approval, by an arrangement he had made with other railroads for that purpose; in the other case, another Commissioner demanded (through an indirect channel, of course) $4,000 as his price for approving the map. In the present state of public sentiment there is no remedy for such things as this. Anybody who is "agin' rail'odes" is right, and is the people's friend.

If this bill becomes law, it will be the worst instance of tyranny ever afforded by our Government—one which the framers of the Constitution could not apprehend specifically, but which they did all in their power to prevent.

CHARLES S. ASHLEY.

TOLEDO, OHIO, January 9, 1887.

THE SUPPLY OF TEACHERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have been much interested in reading your recent articles on the excessive number of teachers annually graduated at the New York Normal College—the more so because the same complaint is made with equal reason by other observers in many different localities. There is, however, a way out of the difficulty which has not yet been suggested, but which I feel sure you will heartily approve. It cannot for a moment be maintained that the supply of good teachers, either in New York city or elsewhere, is equal to the need. One of the best authorities on the subject in the country, Mr. C. W. Bardeen of Syracuse, N. Y., has truly said that there is at the present time no calling in which the very best service secures so little pecuniary remuneration, and the poorest service is so well paid, as in the teacher's. It is a notorious and disgraceful fact that the majority of teachers in the country secure and retain their places on other grounds than their ability to teach. If the authorities would devote all their attention to securing the best possible service for their money, we should soon cease to hear complaints that more teachers were graduated than could find employment.

There is nothing dangerous in encouraging the best and brightest pupils in our public schools to prepare themselves to become teachers. All we need is discrimination. At the present time thousands are pushing their way into the ranks of teachers, not because of any special aptitude or ability, but because they think they have the friends or influence to secure an appointment if they can only pass the required examination. Arbitrarily cutting down the numbers of those who are trying to prepare themselves will, under the present system, afford no proper relief. The unworthy and inefficient will struggle no less to obtain the desired diploma, trusting to influence and importunity to procure situations; and it is a significant fact that, of those who go through the prescribed courses, the best qualified are the ones who most easily allow themselves to be driven off into other vocations.

Let the business of making the appointments be intrusted to those who will recognize no title to favor except genuine desert, and the unqualified and inefficient will not be long in learning the hopelessness of their effort. I speak from long experience and wide observation when I say, that in no department of our public work is there more pressing need of reform than in the method of selecting and appointing teachers in the public schools. If you can bring your public to recognize this fact, and to sustain those authorities who seek to discriminate only on merit, you will find that the normal schools in New York and throughout the country do not furnish half enough graduates. B.

Syracuse, N. Y., January, 1887.

THE "ISSUING" OF SILVER.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In reply to your remarks on my note, I should like to say that I spoke of "issuing" silver in order to show that my argument referred only to the silver actually forced into circulation, either bodily or by means of silver certificates. There is already a considerable amount of such silver, and unless the people shall allow the Treasury surplus to be further swollen, all silver coined hereafter will be added to this amount. I do not think any one supposes that the surplus will be allowed to reach and remain at a much higher point than it has already attained; and thus, in looking to the somewhat distant future—as Mr. St. John's proposition does—the part played by the piling up of silver dollars (unrepresented by paper) is practically eliminated. F. F.

Baltimore, January 14, 1887.

[We remarked that the argument of "F. F." in last week's Nation was "thus far inconclusive." He now supplies the missing link by giving the opinion that Congress will some day force all the silver dollars into circulation, as a portion of them have already been. We can find no warrant for the statement that any silver dollars have been forced into circulation. Those that have gone into circulation have been taken out voluntarily by people who could make use of them, and have all been taken at 100 cents gold each. It is hardly proper to call that a forcing process which comes about as a consequence of the retirement of national-bank notes and of small greenbacks. It is not that kind of forcing that "F. F." has in mind, but rather, we judge, some violent expulsive movement on the part of Congress. It is certainly well to keep the possibility of this in mind, but we should like to have the process described before considering measures to counteract it.—Ed. Nation.]

THE PRESIDENT'S EXCUSE IN MICHIGAN.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the Nation for January 6 is a criticism of the Administration for its appointments to Government offices in Detroit. The facts are as "W. E. H." states them, and it may be said of the whole State of Michigan that the civil-service-reform policy of President Cleveland is a flat failure. Is the Administration, however, justly to be blamed for this? The State of Michigan has not a representative in Congress who is not an open enemy of civil service reform. She has not a public man of prominence who gives the reform more than a qualified support. There is not a newspaper of influence in the State which honestly advocates it. Moreover, it is to be doubted whether Mr. Cleveland and his advisers could have found four men in Detroit, whose reputation and experience would justify their appointment to the important offices in question, who would unequivocally endorse the President's reform policy. Which, then, is at fault, the Administration or public sentiment?

Mr. Cleveland was elected to be the chief executive of the nation—a position of large and many-sided responsibilities. Is it to be expected or desired that he should wreck his Administration by a too close adherence to a policy in which he is not supported by the sentiment of his party, and for which he is only ridiculed by his opponents?

Of the prospects of civil-service reform it must be said that its ultimate success does not depend upon the favor of a single Administration, but upon an awakened and enlightened public sentiment. This is only to be attained by organized effort through the press, by public meetings, and by the active political exertions of the supporters of the reform. Is such an agitation going on at present? Or do reformers really believe that their end is to be gained by criticism of President Cleveland's well-meant but ineffectual endeavors to make a practical application of their teachings? Surely, they will not rest satisfied with the present inadequate law. Civil-service reform may not be said to be accomplished until all the minor officers of the Government are appointed under its rules, until every State government is administered upon its principles, and every municipal and county office feels the benefits of its system. Truly there remaineth yet much more land to be possessed, and it is for the reformers to enter and take possession.

Wm. W. Hudson.

Detroit, January 14, 1887.

A STORY WITHOUT AN END.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you allow me to point out, through your columns, to the readers of the Annual which I have the honor to edit for Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, and which is republished in America by Messrs. Appleton, under the title 'The Witching Time,' that my contribution to it appears in the American edition without a tail? Messrs. Appleton have, inadvertently of course, sent the volume to press before they had received the proof of the last sheets of "Two of a Kind," and consequently, as what was intended for the point of my story appears, not improperly I venture to think, in the tail of it, it is without point of any sort. The fault is no doubt mine for not having my proof ready at an earlier date, but I must take the first and best opportunity of explaining that I am not guilty of quite such an invertebrate piece of fiction as has been presented to the public in my name. Henry Norman.

London, January 8.

Notes.

Robert Browning's new volume, 'Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in their Day,' will be published in this country by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Ticknor & Co. publish next week 'Happy Dodd,' a tale of New England life, by Rose Terry Cooke; and 'Sons and Daughters,' by Henry Hayes, author of 'The Story of Margaret Kent.'

Cupples, Upham & Co. have in press a second edition of Dr. David Greene Haskins's 'Ralph Waldo Emerson: His Maternal Ancestors, with some Reminiscences of Him.' Curious silhouettes of the poet and his brother Charles are among the illustrations. There will be also a limited large-paper edition.

Ginn & Co. announce for next month 'Spanish Idioms, with their English Equivalents,' by Sarah Cary Becker and Señor Federico Mora. Some ten thousand phrases are included.

Henry Holt & Co. will have Miss Augusta Larned's 'Village Photographs' ready in the spring.

The common dictionary has long since outgrown its primitive scheme in encroaching on the domain of the encyclopædia. Hence one is not surprised that the J. B. Lippincott Co. have added to Worcester's Dictionary a new pronouncing biographical dictionary of nearly 12,000 "personages"—something more than "names," as we conjecture—and a new pronouncing gazetteer of the world, embracing more than 20,000 places.

The derivation and history of words will always be a favorite subject of intellectual sport as well as of serious investigation. As a part of education, such exercises deservedly rank very high; and Mr. Arthur Gilman's little book, 'Short Stories from the Dictionary' (Interstate Publishing Co.) will undoubtedly, as it deserves, find a warm welcome with American teachers. Its geniality and suggestiveness recommend it above other books of the class, for those who wish more than the dry bones of etymology. This study, however, if fascinating, is perilous at times; none is more full of pitfalls. For example (p. 46), Mr Gilman accepts the derivation of saunter from sainte terre, which, we believe, is now generally abandoned. Skeat says, "origin unknown."

We have already delivered judgment on the general scheme and usefulness of the series of "Actors and Actresses of Great Britain and the United States" (New York: Cassell & Co.), edited by Brander Matthews and Laurence Hutton, of which the last two volumes are now issued. In the first of them Macready and Forrest are written of by Lawrence Barrett, who is a sympathetic and effective author: and of the more noted of their contemporaries Charlotte Cushman is done by Clara Erskine Clement, Fechter by Kate Field, Sothern by Wm. J. Florence, and McCullough by William Winter. The last volume takes up the present time. The most important sketches are that of Booth, also done by Lawrence Barrett, that of Irving by J. Ranken Towse, a very just study, Bunner's tribute to Joe Jefferson, Winter's Wallack, Miss Gilder's Mme. Modjeska, and Mr. Laffan's excellent notice of Barrett. The articles are of extremely uneven merit, and as a whole are less good than the earlier volumes in criticism and style; but the completed work affords a comprehensive view of the personalities of the stage, and is convenient for reference.

Mr. Samuel Waddington, a sonnetteer himself, and the editor of at least two collections of sonnets, has now collected in a neat and pretty little volume 'The Sonnets of Europe' (London: Walter Scott; New York: Scribner & Welford). Mr. Waddington has gathered nearly 250 examples from Italian, Spanish, French, German, Dutch, Scandinavian, Portuguese, Polish, and Greek poets, with one in Latin, erroneously ascribed. Many of these have been specially translated for this collection by Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse, Mr. W. M. Rossetti, and the editor. Mr. Dobson's rendering of the frigid "Sonnet of the Mountain" of Mellin de Saint-Gelais is admirable in its precision, and excellent also are his translations from Du Bellay and of Molière's Sonnet to La Mothe-le-Vayer. Mr. Thomas Ashe supplies a version of the famous "Sonnet d'Arvers" which alone preserves that poet from oblivion, but he is scarcely as successful as was Longfellow, whose rendering is here also. Not a few other Americans appear here as translators, including Bryant, Col. Higginson, Mr. T. W. Parsons, Prof. Norton, Mr. Lowell, and Mr. Charles T. Brooks. Mr. Waddington's introduction is brief but to the point, and his notes full and exact.

Mr. William L. Hughes, who translated into French 'Les Aventures de Tom Sawyer,' has now followed it up with 'Les Aventures de Huck Finn, l'ami de Tom Sawyer' (Paris: Hennuyer; New York: F. W. Christern), with seventy-three illustrations by M. Achille Sirouy. It would be interesting to get Mr. Clemens's honest opinion of a French artist's pictures of Jim and the King and the Duke.

M. Jules Simon, in his official capacity of perpetual Secretary of the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques, continues his notices historiques of the eminent members of that body. Mignet, his predecessor, had omitted to speak of Michelet, fearing that he might not be impartial in regard to an historian whose methods and opinions were so different from his own. M. Jules Simon, perhaps because he is not an historian himself, has not felt the same reluctance. On the 4th of December, at the annual public session of the Academy, he read his address upon Michelet, which, while emphasizing the genius of this remarkable writer, is really a refutation of his views, a protest against many of his doctrines. We are here far from the éloge académique in which nothing but praise was dealt out, far from the panegyric pronounced in the French Academy when a new member is received. Michelet's 'History of France' and his 'History of the Revolution' are not spared. M. Jules Simon does not share the four hatreds of the author whose work he describes. Michelet loved many things as few men have loved, but he shows, especially in his 'History of the Revolution,' "la haine du prêtre, la haine du roi, la haine de l'Anglais, et la haine de la bourgeoisie." But, in spite of his protests, M. Jules Simon is kindled by the fire of Michelet; he too, usually calm, glows with indignation when he speaks of things past, with which, unconsciously perhaps, he connects what is now going on in France.

The fifth volume of the 'Mémoires de Saint-Simon' has been published in the 'Collection des Grands Écrivains de la France' (Paris: Hachette). The first volume was issued in 1879. M. Wallon, noticing the work in the Journal des Savants last year, said justly that he was beginning the examination of a publication of which he should certainly not see the end. He further expressed the hope that the scholar who had undertaken it would live long enough to terminate his work. M. Boislisle, though in the strength of age, will be a happy man if he can carry out this edition of the Mémoires as he has begun it. Thirty, even forty volumes may not suffice. On many pages the notes of the editor take up a great deal more space than the author's text, and there are, besides, numerous appendices and tables. So voluminous are the annotations that for the mere reading of Saint-Simon it may be preferable to use the 12mo edition just completed, based on the text of Chéruel, and prepared by M. Adolphe Regnier fils. The fifth volume of the "Grands Écrivains" edition is wholly filled by the year 1698, and contains 240 pages of appendices.

M. Charles Bigot, of the French delegation to the ceremonies attending the completion of the Bartholdi statue, is giving in the Revue Bleue his impressions of New York in a very entertaining manner. His accuracy seldom fails, though "New Jersey City" is one syllable too long, horse-cars do run on Madison Avenue, and it was Jim Fisk (not "M. Field") whom Stokes killed. M. Bigot cannot praise the loveliness of this city, nor its rectangularity, nor its numbered streets.

The Bulletin of the Société de Géographie contains a lively account, by M. H. Duveyrier, of the journey of the French Minister at Morocco from Tangier to Fez, and his interview with the Sultan at the latter place. There are also papers on the M'Bochis, a people inhabiting the right bank of the Congo above Stanley Pool, and describing a visit to the volcano of Jorullo in Mexico. The most valuable article is a "General View of New Caledonia," by M. Opigez. After a sketch of the country, its resources, political divisions and colonists, he gives a very full and interesting account of the manners and customs of the natives. These are divided into tribes speaking thirty-two dialects, so different that, though "two neighboring tribes can understand each other very well, two separated by a third are generally unintelligible to each other." They cultivate the land, hunt and fish, but have no other industry. Their religion consists in the recognition of two superior beings, the one good, the other bad. To the former they rarely pray, saying that as he is always good, it is needless. Their peculiar marriage and burial customs are also described at length. In common with all the Polynesian races, with the possible exception of the Fijians, they are rapidly disappearing. They number now about 22,000, three-quarters of whom are men.

The December Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society contains a very instructive paper by Mr. J. Y. Buchanan, "On the Similarities in the Physical Geography of the Great Oceans," the result principally of his observations made during the voyage of the Challenger. In describing his work in the Gulf of Guinea, "a hitherto unexplored region of the ocean," he made the statement, which may prove valuable for navigators, "that for a considerable distance along the Guinea coast the salinity of the surface water was an almost accurate test of the proximity of the land." The remarkable changes of temperature along parts of the continental shores (as, for instance, at Cape St. Lucas, where the temperature fell ten degrees in less than an hour), which have been generally attributed to the direct influence of currents from high latitudes, are shown to be due to the off-shore winds. These remove the surface water, which has to be supplied from the readiest source, the deep water on the coast—that is, not "by a long surface current, but by a short vertical one." The paper is illustrated by a map and diagrams showing the temperature and density of the oceans. Maj. de Lannoy de Bissy contributes an article on "Recent French Explorations in the Ogowe-Congo Region," by which a territory one-fourth larger than France, having a coast line nearly 800 miles long, with access to 5,200 miles of river navigation, and containing eight river basins, has been acquired by the republic "without shedding a drop of blood and at the trifling cost of £90,000." There are also the usual notes, reports of societies, and recent geographical publications.

A fine portrait of the late Marco Minghetti is given in the Illustrazione Italiana of Milan for December 26, 1886. The accompanying obituary notice is chiefly occupied with the political career of this high-minded statesman; but reference is made to that versatility which has so frequently characterized the great men of his race, as, to take a not remote though a more striking example, in the case of Massimo d'Azeglio.

Mr. Edward Roth, 1135 Pine Street, Philadelphia, is nearing the end of the biographical portion of his 'Complete Index to Littell's Living Age' (first 100 volumes). His tenth number ends with Vespucci.

The first issue of the Proudhon Library is before us (Boston, P. O. Box 3366). It begins the 'System of Economical Contradictions: or, The Philosophy of Misery,' translated by Mr. Benj. R. Tucker.

Prof. Palmer's second paper on the "Possible Limitations of the Elective System," in the January Andover Review, is no less suggestive than its predecessor. He maintains that the objections levelled against the system at Harvard are really intended for "its bastard brother, laissez-faire," and he shows how far from unrestricted, if only by "conflict of hours," the choice now is. As to soft or easy courses, he says they "will exist and ought to exist. Prescribed colleges, it is often forgotten, have more of them than elective colleges." As matter of fact and experience at Harvard, the forces which the elective system sets astir have such an influence, on teachers and pupils alike, "that questions of hard and easy studies do not, as outsiders are apt to suppose, seriously disturb the formation of sound intentions." Prof. Palmer looks forward to the extension, to the whole body of students, of the system of surveillance of individual progress through a committee, now applied to the special students. He has a capital answer to those who complain that the degree of A.B. loses its definiteness.

In the January Auk, Mr. Ira Sayles attempts to solve the question whether vultures have a keen sense of smell. From his own experience he concludes that all experiments should be made with reference to the wind, and on this ground he rejects Darwin's well-known trial with the condors at Valparaiso as proving "absolutely nothing." But he forgets that, whether the parcel of meat was carried to windward or leeward, Darwin declared that no dog under similar circumstances would have let the meat go undetected.

The Forest and Stream Publishing Co. announce a new periodical, the Audubon Magazine, to be printed in the interest of the Audubon Society for the Protection of Birds. It will be issued from the office of the Society, 40 Park Row New York, and will be largely devoted to natural history and subjects of interest to the young.

The Science Co. announce the immediate publication, in connection with that weekly, of a monthly magazine, called the Red Cross, in aid of the Agassiz Association work. This will supersede the well-known department in St. Nicholas. It will be edited by Mr. Harlan H. Ballard.

A trial bibliography of the writings of the late George P. Marsh is made in the December number of the Library Journal.

Among the various schemes of instruction by correspondence now in operation in this country, room certainly existed for one in the art of reasoning. This deficiency is now offered to be supplied by Mr. Charles S. Peirce of this city, whose address is No. 36 West Fifteenth Street. Mr. Peirce is well known in all scientific circles, and his special competence for this particular line of instruction is attested by the fact that he was formerly a lecturer on the Logic of Science at Harvard and at Johns Hopkins. He proposes to proceed "entirely by means of practical exercises to be performed by the pupil, each being accompanied by the necessary explanations of how it is to be executed, and followed by reflections upon the nature of the proceeding and why it has been successful, with criticism of faults, and with answers to questions and resolutions of perplexities." Mr. Peirce has especially in mind "the wants of those young men and women who have been debarred from the privileges of a college education, and even from the training preparatory to it."

See p. 94

At Bonn, on the 15th of November, at high noon, under the auspices of the Neu-Philologischer Verein of the University, was unveiled the tablet marking the house in the Weberstrasse wherein died Friedrich Diez, author of the 'Grammatik der romanischen Sprachen' and 'Etymologisches Wörterbuch der romanischen Sprachen,' and quondam professor there. The inscription reads as follows: "In diesem Hause starb am 22 Mai 1876 Friedrich Diez, der Begründer der romanischen Philologie. Gewidmet vom Akad. Neuphilol. Verein zu Bonn." Appropriate remarks were made by Prof. Dr. Foerster, the successor of Diez. In the evening a meeting of the Verein was held, at which were present, among the guests from abroad, professors of the Romance philology from Göttingen, Marburg, and Madrid. The Fest-rede was delivered by Foerster, and speeches of a less formal character were delivered in French, Spanish, English, and German.

We take the following from a late issue of the Novosti: "Russian life is evidently beginning to have a very deep interest for Americans, thanks, especially, to the translations from the works of Gogol, Dostoyevsky, Count Tolstoi, and others of our writers, of which we have already had occasion to speak. The vast and really unexpected success of these translations has inspired some American writers to invent [the word also means 'to compose'] romances of Russian life for the benefit of the public. The New York bibliographical journals announce the appearance of several such romances. Among the rest, Marion Crawford, who is well known, and is one of the most popular American littérateurs, is preparing a long romance from Russian life under the title of 'Paul Patoff.' Crawford is not unknown to the Russian public. His romances 'Mr. Isaacs' and 'An American Politician' have been translated into Russian; the first under the title of 'In the Far East,' the second under the title of 'The Patriot.' Crawford has undertaken this novel of Russian life, not in the least deterred by the fact that he knows absolutely nothing of Russia or of the Russians, and that the whole sum of his knowledge of 'Russian customs' has been culled from the English translations of the productions of Russian authors. Moreover, as has been remarked recently by the French critic Bentzon, who has published an entire volume on American letters, Crawford, as a rule, does not trouble himself in the least to preserve historical illusion or vivid probability in his romances; in all his writings he gives free rein to his imagination, and describes only such tiny corners of the world as are connected with wonderful mysterious legends—India, for instance. It would be interesting to know what sort of a 'Russian legend' has served as canvas for this new romance of 'Paul Patoff.' The success of this story is assured, however, from a material point of view at all events, since the proprietors of the Atlantic Monthly paid Crawford a very large sum for the right of printing it, even before the MS. of the romance was completed."

— The march of Leslie Stephen's 'Dictionary of National Biography' (Macmillan) makes even the reviewer quicken his pace in order to keep up. Volumes viii. and ix. have just appeared, with a short interval between them, and break off with the sketch of Thomas Chaloner. Great is the array of the tribes of Burton, Butler, Cameron, Campbell, Carew, Carey, Carter, Cartwright, Cavendish, Cecil, and Chalmers in especial. The editor has reserved for his own most competent handling Bishop Butler, Byron, and Carlyle, and manifests once more his remarkable gift of compact narration, presenting a multitude of details alike without confusion and without dryness. As to the causes of Lady Byron's separation, he evidently holds that, rejecting the story told through Mrs. Stowe, some sufficiently weighty moral ground must be believed to have existed. Froude is tacitly censured for his execution of the literary trust confided to him by Carlyle. Byron's famous reference to his "grandad" is not forgotten in the sketch of the Admiral; but in the notice of Admiral John Byng one misses Voltaire's sarcasm, "pour encourager les autres." Under Camden the fact is mentioned that his house at Chislehurst became the refuge of Napoleon III. Isaac Butt is regarded as the probable inventor of the phrase "Home Rule." The publication of John Byrom's 'Universal English Shorthand' marked an era in the history of stenography. Henry Carey's authorship of the national anthem is held to be very doubtful. As usual, the catholicity of this dictionary produces strange juxtapositions. Elizabeth Canning, "impostor," and Margaret Catchpole, "adventuress," are admitted to good and regular standing beside the Queens Caroline and Catherine. The oddest name is perhaps that of Sir Julius Cæsar, and the oddest personage Alice (or Ellys) Carmylyon, a painter whose sex is left undetermined. It is pleasant to find (speaking of female artists) that Mrs. Julia Margaret Cameron, the Isle of Wight photographer, has not been overlooked.

— The American contact of these volumes is considerable, whether we instance Sebastian Cabot, or John Carver, or the Calverts of Baltimore, or Gen. Richard Butler of the United States Army, or Gen. Guy Carleton, or Patrick Calhoun, father of John C. Calhoun, or Alexander Campbell of the sect founded by his father, or Mathew Carey; that graceless wanderer Bamfyld Moore Carew, or the explorer Jonathan Carver. Of this last his biographer says, referring to his deed of land from the Sioux and Ojibways in 1767, he was spoken of by the Indians as "our good brother Jonathan," and makes the random guess—"whence possibly came the name of the Americans collectively." As Carver, like Trumbull, was a native of Connecticut, this does not disturb the Nutmeg State's claim to have bred the original "Brother Jonathan." "Frank Leslie" (Henry Carter) is credited with having been the first to cut up large wood blocks into small pieces for expeditious engraving. The late Randolph Caldecott, who died here, is commemorated in a space which seems disproportionate when compared to that allotted to America's great friend in her civil-war distress, the economist Cairnes. Finally, not a few friendships in this country are associated with Mary and Philip Carpenter.

—The fourth session of the Modern Language Association of America, held at the close of last month in Baltimore, was the most interesting and successful of its annual gatherings. About 150 members were present at the meetings in Hopkins Hall. James Russell Lowell was elected President for the ensuing year. The Association is emphatically a union of the younger philological scholars and teachers of literature. Some are members of the American Philological Association, but most, finding the time of meeting of that body inconvenient, or from lack of interest, had not previously been united in any common effort to promote linguistic study. The recent publication of a solid volume of transactions of 250 pages, embracing the papers read at the second meeting in 1884 (the preliminary gathering was only for organization), shows how important is the field of work which the society has assumed as its province. It contains original investigations in early English, French, German, and the different Romance dialects. A large and valuable portion is occupied with discussions of the order and method of study, and what constitutes a systematic course in the modern languages. It was necessary that the earlier meetings should devote special attention to this subject, owing to the imperfect recognition of these studies, and the fact that there was no agreement as to their relative order and position. In investigating the character and amount of attention devoted to the modern languages in the various colleges, and especially in the various papers presented upon the study of English, the Association has accomplished a valuable work. The improvement in instruction in the Southern colleges has been even more marked than in some other sections. Many of them offer thorough courses in the philology, as well as the literature, of the English language One important influence of the Society has been to stimulate the investigation of local dialects and put on record present forms which are in process of change, or are becoming extinct. The French dialects of Louisiana and of Canada have found competent investigators. The vast field of study presented by the languages of the American continent has been only in part entered upon. Having mapped out its field of work, the Association will naturally devote less attention hereafter to the purely pedagogic side, and more to literary and philological subjects. The Association publishes the Modern Language Notes, in which the most recent publications are reviewed. It also issues separate monographs which are designed to promote the study of the modern languages. These are often translations of noteworthy discussions which have appeared abroad, and whose further dissemination will promote the aims of the organization.

—President Gilman, at the opening meeting, welcomed the Association to Baltimore, and especially to the hospitality of the Johns Hopkins University. President Carter of Williams College delivered the annual address. The Secretary's report showed that the Association numbered 220 members, and that two members, Mr. William Cook of the Institute of Technology, and Prof. Louis Habel of the University of Norwich, had died during the year. The constitution of the Association was amended so as to provide for the election of three Vice Presidents, who shall form, with the other officers, a special committee upon the papers to be read at each annual meeting. The next session will be held in Philadelphia. A committee was appointed to aid in securing from American scholars contributions in aid of the monument to the Grimm brothers at Hanau. Prof. Wood and Drs. Todd and Bright of Baltimore have charge of this matter. The social hospitalities of this meeting were no small part of its attractions. President Gilman gave a reception to the members on Monday evening, December 27, and Mr. D. L. Bartlett, a prominent citizen, on Wednesday evening. On Thursday the Association left for Washington, where it was accorded a reception by President Cleveland, and where the Corcoran Art Gallery and other collections were opened to it.

—The death of Mrs. Abby Kelley Foster last week recalled the enormous change in the public relations of the sexes in this country during the past half century, in no small measure because of this excellent woman's labors and sufferings. She was a young Quaker school-teacher in Lynn when she first heard Garrison speak against African colonization, and presently went and sold her trinkets and turned the proceeds into the anti-slavery treasury. Meantime the Grimké sisters of South Carolina came to New England to lecture on slavery, and against their will (though agreeably to their conscience) were drawn into addressing mixed audiences of men and women. This impropriety, which was thought nothing of on the stage or in the concert hall, drew down upon them the famous "Pastoral Letter" of the Massachusetts Congregational clergy, and other circumstances conspired to terminate their public career. "After the Grimkés left the lecture-field, only one woman entered it" —as she, Mrs. Foster, then Miss Kelley, has herself related—"and worked as well as she was able for seven years, before another woman came to her side. The service was terrible. The cross well-nigh crushed her. Besides the usual incentives to mob the abolitionists, came the requisition of the church and clergy to keep women in their proper sphere. Not only unsavory eggs, but the contents of stables and outhouses, were hurled against her meetings. Worse still, not a few ministers of high standing preached against her, their favorite text being Rev. ii, 20, 'I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman, Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and seduce my servants to commit fornication.'" Worse still, we will add, the editor of a religious paper insinuated, in reference to Miss Kelley, that it was disreputable for a woman to be closeted with two men on a committee. Over her raged the memorable controversy in the abolition ranks concerning the right of women to participate equally with men in the direction and proceedings of the societies; and her appointment on a committee of the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1840 was made the occasion of a sectarian secession. She continued to lecture long after she was married, and lived to see female lecturers a common and unobjectionable spectacle, and women associated with men on all sorts of committees, and made equal members of school committees and State boards of charities. She was one of the most pleasing and effective speakers of her sex, and Lowell has happily characterized her in the lines (dating from 1846)—

> "A Judith there, turned Quakeress,
> Sits Abby in her modest dress,
> Serving a table quietly,
> As if that mild and downcast eye
> Flashed never with its scorn intense
> More than Nedon's eloquence. . . .
> No nobler gift of heart and brain,
> No life more white from spot or stain,
> Was e'er on Freedom's altar laid
> Than hers—the simple Quaker maid."

—That Henry B. Stanton died on the same day with Mrs. Foster (January 14) was no mere coincidence, for he had an active hand in the schism just referred to, though he cared nothing about the abstract question of woman's rights. His ambition was thoroughly political, and his aim, along with Holley, Birney, and other founders of the Liberty party, was to convert the anti-slavery organization into a political machine. He failed, and what he termed the "miserable" (and one of his associates the "confounded") woman question was one of the obstacles to his success, since female abolitionists at least could not be voters, and political action could not be exacted of them as a high moral duty. His detachment from the abolitionists was fatal to his distinction as a reformer, and won him no laurels worth remembering as a politician. He took what advantage he could of the clerical opposition to women as public speakers, so long as it aided his attack on the non-resistant (and therefore non-voting) wing of the abolitionists; but at the London World's Convention in 1840 he favored the admission of the female delegates from America, and his wife, as is well known, became one of the foremost leaders of the organized woman's-rights agitation a few years later.

—The National Review, a foremost and able organ of the younger section of English Toryism, whatever may be thought of its political principles or of the vehement tone in which its writers advocate those principles, is eminently noticeable for the thoroughness and all-round excellence of its contributions in the department of pure literature. From among several articles, in its issue for the current month, well deserving the attention of the general reader, that on Carlyle's 'Cromwell,' by Mr. Reginald F. D. Palgrave, may be especially particularized. Carlyle, it will be remembered, in his quality of reproducer of Cromwell's speeches, claims for himself the character of "a pious editor." By the epithet "pious" we are, of course, to understand a profession of inflexible fidelity. Not a little startling, then, is the demonstration, just produced, that Carlyle, instead of using with scrupulous honesty the materials available for delineating the Protector, did not hesitate to manipulate them after the fashion of a person who, resolved on making good his theory in the teeth of fatally adverse evidence, shrinks from nothing in the shape of suppression or distortion of facts, or other discreditable devices and manœuvres. Beside these practices on his part, one must recognize as dwindling to a comparative trifle the license in which he allowed himself, unwarrantable as it was, of altering, by interpolations, omissions, and otherwise, the "authentic utterances of the man Oliver himself," in cases where their import is materially retained, to such an extent that he would not have had to go very much further if he had recomposed them de novo. All this is brought out, in detail, by Mr. Palgrave, and with a cogency of convincingness which it seems impossible to elude. Of multitudinous documents of first-rate value and authority, germane to his subject, it is also evinced that the "pious editor" had no knowledge as being existent, or else, where he had that knowledge, was too indolent or too remiss to make their acquaintance. It would appear now as if there were a studied disingenuous design in the language which he all but invariably employs regarding the manifold sources whence he derived his garbled representation of Cromwell and Cromwell's doings. "Foul Lethean quagmires," "waste rubbish-continents," "shoreless lakes of ditch-water," "hideous old Pamphletary Imbroglio," "dreary old records," "very watery," "the thing called Burton," "this two-legged Rhetorical Phantasm," and "pedants and dullards," are some of the contemptuous and repellant designations with which he bespatters them, as though of set purpose to deter others from the task—no very laborious one, considering his superficial research—of attempting to verify his statements and to test the validity of his conclusions. Pretty evidently those statements and conclusions are very far from being such as an exhaustive exploration and a dispassionate estimate of relevant historical data will ultimately be found to justify. The veritable Cromwell, as pictured at full length by some future Gardiner, will unquestionably differ in important features from the supposititious Carlylean hero.

—Prof. Willard Fiske's 'Biographical Notices, I. Books Printed in Iceland 1578-1844: A Supplement to the British Museum Catalogue' (Florence), already mentioned by us as in the press, has now come to hand. It makes a pamphlet of 29 pages, including the index. The library that has furnished this list of 139 titles is probably the most complete collection of its kind, either public or private, in existence. Its beginnings were made many years ago, but while as a whole it thus represents the gradual acquisitions of almost a lifetime, its greater part has been accumulated since the visit of Prof. Fiske to Iceland in 1879. How rich it really is is proved by the present list, which, as its title indicates, is a supplement to the British Museum Catalogue of books printed in Iceland. It aims, however, to supplement but a small part of that list, which is continued down to 1880, while this ends with the year 1844; the compiler, as he states in his "preliminary note," having taken the latter date as a convenient stopping-point because of the removal in that year of the then only existing press in Iceland from the island Videy, in the harbor of Reykjavik, over to the capital itself, which event was soon followed by increased activity, by the establishment of other presses, and by marked changes in typographical methods. That some such changes were necessary appears from the fact—which, however, Prof. Fiske does not cite—that the last title of his list, and probably last issue of the Videy press, is so full of typographical errors that it has furnished a popular proverb, current in Iceland to this day: As full of errors as the Videy Njals Saga. Descriptions of books printed after 1844 and most of the books themselves may be procured without difficulty. Prof. Fiske's list is not a mere catalogue. Every title is followed by full bibliographical notes, well and carefully compiled. Title-pages and the accompanying vignettes are described in detail. From about the middle of the eighteenth century the title-page frequently bears the price at which the book was sold. For the first half century this value is usually in stock-fish; prices ranging all the way from one fish for an arithmetic, compiled from a work by the Englishman, Edward Hatton, to thirty for a church graduale. In some cases the history of the particular copy described is given in full. The first book of the list, the code of laws known as the Jonsbok, printed at Hólar in 1578, for instance, belonged originally to King Frederick II. of Denmark—his arms and those of his queen appearing on the covers. On the death of that monarch it passed into the possession of Johan Bocholt, royal governor of Iceland. Afterwards it was owned by the German historian, Christopher Besold; and the year after his death it belonged to the Benedictine Abbey of Weingarten. Ultimately it became a part of the private library of the present King of Wirtemberg, whence it was sold. Based as they are upon an unparalleled knowledge of Icelandic bibliography, the notes are overflowing with important material, which not only sets at rest many vexed questions of authorship, but completes information until now only fragmentary. The author further announces in course of preparation: (a) Francis Petrarch's treatise De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ—text and versions; (b) Studies in Icelandic Booklore; (c) a Bibliographical Record of Lorenzo da Ponte of Ceneda; (d) Works by Francis Petrarch printed in the fifteenth century—texts and translations.

—Dr. Wilhelm Junker, who has just returned to Europe, after a seven years' absence in Central Africa, was born in Moscow in 1840. Educated as a physician, the greater part of his life since 1874 has been spent in Africa. In the latter year he visited Tunis, and the following found him exploring Lower Egypt and the Libyan desert. His first important journey began in 1876, when he crossed the desert from Suakim to Kassala, and proceeded thence by Khartum and the White Nile to the Nyam-Nyam country visited by Dr. Schweinfurth six years before. Here he devoted himself particularly to investigating the sources of the Welle, with a view to solving the problem as to the course of that river, and also in order to determine the watershed between the Nile and the Congo systems. From this journey he returned in 1878, bringing with him valuable collections which were deposited in the Mu seum at Berlin. The next year, now accompanied by a white servant, he started for the same region, which was reached in the summer of 1880. He was received in a very friendly manner by the most powerful of the native kings, at whose town he made his headquarters. For two years he was busily employed in making extended excursions, to the west especially, tracing the courses of various rivers, mapping the country, making ethnographical collections, as well as in aiding the Egyptian commanders, Gessi and Lupton Bey, to rid their provinces of the slave-traders. In 1882, his companion having become seriously ill, he himself was seized with a longing for rest and home. First, however, he provided for the safety of his man, sending him to the northward with his collections. With great difficulty Bohndorff, abandoning the collections, forced his way through the districts already in revolt, to Khartum, where he saw Gen. Gordon and got his promise to aid the traveller if it was in his power. But the attack of the Mahdi's troops on the southern provinces of the Sudan, in which Lupton Bey was taken prisoner, followed soon after, and Dr. Junker was obliged to take refuge with Emin Bey at Lado, the principal station of the Equatorial Province. With him he remained till the beginning of last year, always hoping to be rescued by the English troops from the north. When this hope was finally abandoned, he started southward and reached the town of Kabrega, the King of the Unyoro, and asked permission to pass through Uganda. The King of this country, the son of the well-known Mtesa, who is almost crazy with fear of the whites, and had just refused to allow the relief expedition under the late Dr. Fischer sent by Dr. Junker's brother to go through his land, answered his request by sending an army which killed Kabrega and destroyed his town. The traveller, however, fortunately escaped, and made his way with great difficulty to an English mission station, at the south of Lake Victoria Nyanza, and thence to Zanzibar, which he reached December 4, 1886. Dr. Junker possesses in a high degree one quality essential to success in an African traveller—the ability to inspire the natives with respect and confidence. Their belief in his possessing supernatural powers saved his life on one occasion in 1881 when taken prisoner by a hostile chief. The reports of his journeys, which are undertaken at his own expense, are mostly brief, and deal largely with geographical questions. In this they differ from those of Emin Bey, which are very readable accounts of the people, their customs, traditions, and surroundings, together with graphic descriptions of scenery and the various details of a traveller's life.

McCLELLAN'S OWN STORY.—I.

McClellan's Own Story. The War for the Union, the Soldiers who fought it, the Civilians who directed it, and his relations to it and to them. By George B. McClellan, late Major-General commanding the armies. 8vo, pp. 678. New York: Charles L. Webster & Co. 1887.

In 1863 Gen. McClellan prepared a volume which was entitled 'A Report of the Organization and Campaigns of the Army of the Potomac.' This was filed in the War Department office, and in the next year an edition of it, with the addition of a sketch of his campaign in West Virginia in June and July, 1861, was published by Sheldon & Co., and used more or less as a campaign document in the Presidential election when McClellan was a candidate. The book was regarded by the Secretary of War as an extra-official paper, since it not only traversed the ground of his whole military career, the several campaigns of which had been separately reported in his current communications with the War Office, but collated and published much correspondence which did not call for new report, since it was already upon the files of the Department. It was received, however, and, after some months of delay, of which the General's friends complained, it was given to the public. It was his history of his military career, prepared as the justification of his conduct and generalship, and as his criticism of the Administration which had relieved him from command.

The present volume is in substance a revised edition of that Report, with considerable additions, a few omissions, and with some chapters of extracts from his private correspondence, chiefly with his wife. The changes are most noticeable in the earlier part of the narrative, where the discussion of relations to the Administration of Mr. Lincoln and of the organization of the Army of the Potomac naturally led him into matters which had not found place in the original edition of the Report. The chapters concerning his personal intercourse with Lincoln, Stanton, Scott, Halleck, and others, are, of course, new. Still, it will be found that the larger part of the Report, both substance and form, are embodied in the present book. Gen. McClellan's method, as indicated by his editor, seems to have been to annotate the original Report, referring to corroborating documents and correspondence. It can easily be seen that such a treatment of the material would not be so likely to lead to a full discussion of open questions as if there had been a complete rewriting of the work; though we must also remember that the earlier part of the book, which is most changed, is also that in which such discussion would naturally occur, and that the lack of it will be a sore disappointment to its readers.

In the original Report, addressed as it was to the Government, it was necessary to waive personalities, and to hold the tone of respectful narrative of fact. The change in the present edition which is most noticeable is the attribution to the Administration of Mr. Lincoln, and to the leaders of the Union party (as it was then called), of a conscious purpose to sacrifice the Army of the Potomac in order to diminish the personal and political importance of the general in command. This he speaks of as a "treasonable conspiracy," and says that it was to be carried out, "first, by endeavoring to force me into premature movements, knowing that a failure would probably end my military career; afterwards, by withholding the means necessary to achieve success" (p. 150). Although McClellan thus formulated the charge in the last years of his life, his private correspondence shows that he adopted it after the President and Congress began to be impatient at his inaction in the autumn of 1861, and that he never abandoned it.

Three questions are thus definitely raised by himself as the central ones in his public life: Did the Administration and the party in power endeavor to force him into premature movements? Did they afterwards withhold the means necessary to achieve success? And did they do this knowingly and wickedly, being "treasonably" willing to involve the country in ruin if they might thereby ruin him?

If this issue had not been thus tendered in the additions to the book written since 1881, it would seem incredible that any intelligent person could, at this distance from the war and its passions, hold any such opinion. Yet we are told that McClellan retained his full mental powers to the last, and pursued his study of military science with undiminished devotion, carefully noting all that occurred in the armies of the world, and keeping thoroughly informed of the progress of military discussion at home and abroad. The puzzle of it is, that by any possibility he could fail to see that such charges must react with destructive effect upon his military reputation, unless they are shown to be true in the light of our present knowledge of those events. As a military man he must have known that not a single writer upon our military history, of any repute whatever, thinks or believes that the supposed state of the case assumed by him when he penned his report of 1863, was the true one. The facts, as he believed them then, and as we know them now, differ in such essential particulars that arguments which were plausible then are now worthless. It is worse than blindness to repeat the old accusations and the old justifications, without acknowledging or showing any sign of recognition of the truth that his assumed facts are essentially wrong.

The central question in the controversy is one of figures. It was stated by the Comte de Paris in the volume of his history published in 1874. The French Prince had been a member of McClellan's staff, and never swerved from sincere personal friendship for him. Yet he declares that McClellan attributed to Johnston in the middle of October, 1861, "an effective force of 150,000 men, whereas, in reality, at the close of the month, it counted but 66,243 men in all, of whom but 44,131 were in active service (sous les drapeaux)." Making similar deductions from the national army, the same author gives McClellan's force as 133,201 on the 15th of October. The official reports show that on the 27th the number "present for duty" was 147,695. The French historian, as an eye-witness, further declares that up to this period, when the Confederates established batteries at the mouth of the Occoquan and at Matthias' Point, and thus interrupted navigation of the Potomac, no fault had been laid at McClellan's door, and he is himself forced to declare that at this time the General "lost the best opportunity he ever had to open a successful and decisive campaign" ('Histoire,' tome 2, pp. 163, 179).

The issue thus stated a dozen years before McClellan's death, by a writer of so friendly feeling and of so high a character, could not safely be passed unnoticed. Here was neither political nor personal enmity. The most distinguished member of his military family, one whose station and nativity were guarantees for the impartial kindliness of his judgment, had spoken. It would be impossible to summon him more authoritatively to account for his inaction in that unhappy autumn. If McClellan had in fact nearly a hundred and fifty thousand men against less than fifty thousand of his opponents, with what right can he say that urgency to take advantage of such an opportunity to open the campaign was an effort aimed at his ruin by forcing him into premature movements? Yet he has put the odious charge against the leading men of the nation in more offensive form than he had ever before publicly stated it, without making even the semblance of an effort to show that the inferiority of the enemy's force had been erroneously declared! The only estimates of Johnston's army are those contained in his original Report, and he does not even betray knowledge of the fact that they have since been universally rejected.

If fifty thousand men were holding a hundred and fifty thousand in a state of siege, were actually taking the aggressive and sparing troops to inflict a bloody repulse upon a detachment crossing the Potomac at Ball's Bluff on the upper river, and others to establish batteries and stop navigation on the lower river; if at this time the Baltimore and Ohio Railway was in the enemy's hands at Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry, and Maryland was seething with secession plots to revolt against the national Government and stop even the single remaining line of railway connection with the North, was it "premature" to use some urgency that the hundred and fifty thousand should move, or should at least strike out with vigor enough right and left to open the railway communication of the capital with the West and the water communication with the East? If, in addition to this, the Secretary of the Treasury was pressing upon the General the fact that the enormous expenditures of the war threatened quick bankruptcy, and every day added to the almost insoluble difficulties of the national finance, was this also to be regarded as the mere machination of personal hostility? If, still further, the besieged army grew from week to week till the hundred and fifty thousand in October became a hundred and eighty-five thousand in February, while the enemy in front remained substantially the same, while their batteries still closed the Potomac and the Western railway was still in their hands, was it "treasonable" that respectful questioning should grow into discontent, and that Congress should appoint a committee to inquire into the "conduct of the war"? Lastly, is it conceivable that, twenty years afterwards, the General of that great army should write his 'Own Story,' the criticisms of his friend the French Prince having been ten years in print, and yet not show even consciousness that such questions had been asked, though he aggravates the form in which he charges every one with dishonorable and unpatriotic motives who condemned his delays? Could he be ignorant that officers of that army, like Gen. Webb, who had tossed their caps for him with as great enthusiasm as ever greeted him when he rode through the camps, had been forced, when sitting down to write history, to declare the truth to be that the hypotheses in our long list of questions were facts, and that the "ifs" might be discarded?

If Gen. McClellan had been deceived by the elaborate and costly "secret service" of spies and other means of information which was part of his army organization, he, of all men, should have probed that matter to the bottom. It was worth time and labor to show whether he was misled by ignorance or treachery. As a mere question of army administration and belonging to the problems of which he was fond, it was an inquiry of first-rate importance to discover how an intelligent professional soldier in command of a great army could, through his whole military career, be so egregiously wrong in his knowledge of his enemy, and for a full year of that time believe the opposing force to be three or four times as great as it actually was. If special means of information are so much worse than useless, he was the very man to improve military science by showing why this is so, while at the same time he vindicated his own character by exposing the plausible deceptions by which he was misled. But of this, as of the other questions we have stated, his book makes no sign that he was aware.

The second part of his accusation against the Administration of Mr. Lincoln turns upon the same fatal question of relative numbers as the first. It is, that after he was engaged in his campaigns, they withheld the means necessary to achieve success. His editor insists that McClellan sent to Stanton his famous despatch from the James River after the "seven days' battles" with the closing sentences, which do not appear in the copy then given to the public by the War Department: "If I save this army now, I tell you plainly that I owe no thanks to you or to any other persons in Washington. You have done your best to sacrifice this army." If, however, his army was decidedly superior in numbers, in equipment, and in supplies of every kind, to that of the Confederates at every moment from the day he landed at Fortress Monroe till he returned to Washington, his charge reflects most damagingly upon himself. If, in front of Richmond, Lee divided his inferior army, sending Jackson to assault McClellan's flank at Gaines's Mill, and the latter, with superior forces in a central position, took no advantage of the situation, but began his retreat as soon as his single exposed corps was worsted, this surely was neither Lincoln's nor Stanton's sacrifice of the army. If, again, after Malvern Hill, Lee sent away Jackson against Pope with twenty-five thousand men, and himself remained with less than fifty thousand facing McClellan, whom reinforcements had made over a hundred thousand strong, it would seem that McClellan was not left wholly without the means necessary to achieve success. If, finally, when Halleck went to him in person, he declared that he could not safely resume the offensive without a still further addition of thirty thousand to his army, and estimated the enemy at two hundred thousand (as is shown by Halleck's uncontradicted letter in McClellan's original Report, though omitted in his 'Own Story'), it cannot be denied that it would be dangerous to rely upon his defending Washington on the line of the James.

McClellan knew that those who had investigated the subject since the close of the war were nearly unanimous in taking the views of the facts thus indicated. Yet in regard to the Peninsular campaign, as in reference to the preceding delay in the lines at Washington, he wholly ignores the vital question of the Confederate strength, except as he republishes with little change the strange estimates he made when the campaign was in progress. By what mental process he could conclude that a more injurious form of charging criminal intentions upon the Government would supply the place of intelligent discussion of these central facts, we try in vain to discover.

The personal controversies in which McClellan was involved are shown to turn upon this same central fact of his overestimate of his adversary. Here the chapters of extracts from his private correspondence throw strong light upon his character and upon the events. He was assigned to command the Division of the Potomac on July 27, and just ten days thereafter he writes of a "row with Gen. Scott," his commanding officer, growing out of a "pronunciamento" of his own "against Gen. Scott's policy." He adds: "If Beauregard does not attack to-night, I shall regard it as a dispensation of Providence. . . . I am leaving nothing undone to increase our force, but the old General always comes in the way. He understands nothing, appreciates nothing." The publication of the archives of the war makes this incident easily understood. McClellan had had several interviews with Scott, and had already urged upon the veteran his fixed idea of the enormous magnitude of the Confederate army and of the imminent danger of its attacking Washington. Scott did not accept the exaggerated estimate nor believe the enemy would attack. But McClellan was so possessed with the conviction of the peril that, to shift responsibility in case of disaster, he formally addressed the Lieutenant-General in writing, putting his warning "on record." This was his "pronunciamento." Scott immediately felt it to be one of the common devices by which an ambitious subordinate seeks to entrench himself at the expense of his superior, and sent it to the Secretary of War with some caustic comments. He said that he had been glad to confer personally with McClellan in regard to every phase of the situation and to give full weight to his opinions, but that since he insisted upon making a "record" in the matter, for the manifest purpose of putting his superior in the wrong, he distinctly stated his own belief that McClellan exaggerated the enemy's force, and that the Confederates were not likely to attack Washington. He sarcastically welcomed McClellan to the history he was making. The Secretary of War tried to persuade both parties to withdraw their letters, but Scott refused, expressing his own willingness to be retired at once.

If, then, the question of numbers be decided against McClellan, where does he stand in this quarrel with his commander? Beauregard and Johnston have published their memoirs, and show that they knew the superiority of McClellan's force and had no thought of attacking Washington. In this controversy, then, we are driven to conclude that Scott was right and McClellan was wrong. Yet the latter adhered to his illusion, and grew contemptuous in his treatment of the old General, whose judgment was the better one. On the 9th of August he reiterates that "Gen. Scott is the great obstacle. He will not comprehend the danger." On the 15th he writes: "I am almost tired out, . . . sleep with one eye open at night, looking out sharply for Beauregard, who, I think, has some notion of making a dash in this direction. Gen. Scott is the most dangerous antagonist I have." On the 16th he says: "I am here in a terrible place. The enemy have from three to four times my force; the President, the old General, cannot or will not see the true state of affairs. . . . I have no ambition in the present affairs; only wish to save my country, and find the incapables around me will not permit it." On the 20th: "If Beauregard does not attack this week, he is foolish. . . . I am gaining rapidly in every way. I can now defend Washington with almost perfect certainty." September 27: "The President sent a carriage for me to meet him and the Cabinet at Gen. Scott's office. Before we got through, the General 'raised a row with me.'"

On the 8th of September McClellan had submitted a paper to Secretary Cameron, in which, after stating that his own effective force was then "nearly 85,000 men," and that "by calling in the commands of Gens Banks and Stone it will probably be sufficient to defend the city," he gives the opinion that the enemy will take the initiative and cross the Potomac near Point-of-Rocks and move on Baltimore. "I see no reason to doubt the possibility of his attempting this with a column of at least 100,000 effective troops. If he has only 130,000 under arms, he can make all the diversions I have mentioned with his raw and badly organized troops, leaving 100,000 effective men for his real movement. As I am now situated I can by no possibility bring to bear against this column more than 70,000, and probably not over 60,000, effective troops." His proposal was "that all the available troops in Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, and at least 10,000 Illinois troops, . . . and all those of the Eastern and Northern States be at once directed to report to me for duty." Besides asking for other enlarged powers, and that the Army of the Potomac be made "not less than 300,000 men," he closes with demanding "that no one, whatever his rank may be, shall give any orders respecting my command without my being first consulted." This last demand, of course, meant the deposition of Gen. Scott from the command in chief. If, now, the enemy's force was in fact less than 40,000, and, after waiting three weeks for the initiative the enemy would not take, the President, Cabinet, and Gen. Scott began to insist upon something being done on our side, and McClellan would not hear of anything but the defensive, is it strange Scott should 'raise a row with me'? And yet McClellan writes his 'Own Story' without referring to the question of the actual force of the Confederate army at that time, according to present evidence.

On October 16 (the time mentioned by the Comte de Paris in the quotations we have given)

McClellan writes: "Washington may now be looked upon as quite safe. They cannot attack it in front. My flanks are also safe, or soon will be. Then I shall take my own time to make an army that will be sure of success. Gen. Scott did try to send some of my troops to Kentucky, but he did not succeed." On the 20th or 21st he says: "The weather is delightful. The enemy has fallen back to Centreville and Manassas, expecting us to attack there." On the 26th, Scott's defeat, at least, approaches apace. "For the last three hours I have been at Montgomery Blair's, talking with Senators Wade, Trumbull, and Chandler about war matters. They will make a desperate effort to-morrow to have Gen. Scott retired at once: until that is accomplished I can effect but little good. He is ever in my way, and I am sure does not desire effective action. I want to get through with the war as rapidly as possible. . . . I go out soon after breakfast to review Porter's division about five miles from here." The last quotation, asterisks and all, is as it stands in the text. It is noticeable, too, that the redoubtable radicals of the Senate are not at this time trying to destroy him, but are making "desperate effort" to give him unlimited power. It succeeds, and on November 3 he is able to write: "At last I am the 'Major-General commanding the army.'"

Before the close of the month, however, he is "concealed at Stanton's to dodge all enemies in shape of 'browsing' Presidents, etc." He is "pretty thoroughly tired out," preparing a paper "to place on record that I have left nothing undone to make this army what it ought to be, and that the necessity for delay has not been my fault. I have a set of men to deal with unscrupulous and false: if possible, they will throw whatever blame there is on my shoulders, and I do not intend to be sacrificed by such people. . . . I cannot move without more means, and I do not possess the power to control those means. The people think me all-powerful. Never was there a greater mistake. I am thwarted and deceived by these incapables at every turn." On November 30, his official report showed his force "present for duty" 162,727, with 248 pieces of field artillery and 133 heavy. If, when he wrote his 'Own Story,' he had any evidence to show that the enemy at this time exceeded 50,000, it has not been given to the world. The analogy of the situation when he was preparing the "paper" mentioned, with that when he was similarly "making up a record" against Gen. Scott three months earlier, will strike the most casual reader.

ENGLAND'S CASE AGAINST HOME RULE.

England's Case against Home Rule. By A. V. Dicey, B.C.L., author of 'The Law of the Constitution.' London: John Murray. 1886.

MR. DICEY'S book is better than its title. It is not solely a statement of the arguments against the grant of what is called home rule to Ireland, but a careful, thoughtful review of the Irish question from the point of a constitutional lawyer; not a mere piece of one-sided advocacy, but a temperate examination, as well of the grounds for Ireland's demand, as of the reasons why the demand should be refused by England. Yet the absence of passion is due to no lack of vivacity. The book is bright, animated, vigorous, from beginning to end. It is more like a speech than a book—a speech which, though it would occupy some three or four hours in delivery, might be listened to without weariness throughout, so well do the point and briskness of the style sustain the attention of the auditor.

The plan of the treatise involves a good deal of repetition, but the author has rightly thought that repetition is no evil in handling a subject so intricate and so much confused by the representations and misrepresentations of political advocates. Shortly stated, the order of topics is as follows: First, the meaning of the term home rule, as going beyond mere local self-government, is determined. Then the causes which have given strength to the home-rule movement in England are investigated, and the current arguments for it criticised. Two alternative solutions of the present difficulty are stated—the maintenance of the existing union, and complete separation of the two islands; and each of these is passed in review. Then the home-rule solution is subjected to a minute analysis. It is considered under four forms—as Federalism, as Colonial Independence, as the revival of the system which existed from 1782 to 1800, called for shortness Grattan's Constitution, and as the scheme of Mr. Gladstone's Government of Ireland Bill of 1886, called for shortness the Gladstonian Constitution. A few concluding remarks sum up the result to which the examination of all these forms is deemed to have conducted the reader, viz., that home rule in any one of the forms proposed for it is inadmissible, as threatening England with greater evils than those which Ireland now inflicts upon her, as necessarily leading to separation, and as being, because it so necessarily leads, in reality worse than immediate and total separation.

There is much in every chapter—we had almost said in every page—with which a fair-minded reader, whatever be his prepossessions on the Irish question, will agree. The facts are always honestly stated, the arguments are always well considered and logically sound. They are, however, the arguments rather of a logician and a jurist than of a politician. The reasoning tends to become abstract, or, as a physicist would say, to move in vacuo, rather than to present and handle the problem in its practical and concrete shape. Mr. Dicey does not ignore facts—no one admits more honestly those that are against him. But he does not see them in their perspective. They seem to lie all equally near his eye. Small legal difficulties affright him which his opponents would confess to be difficulties, but would not recoil from, because they could be evaded or neglected. He does not deny the force which sentimental considerations exert, but as he personally dislikes them, he does not feel how immensely powerful they are. He admits, for instance, that the temper of the English democracy is an obstacle to the application of a firmly repressive government by England in Ireland. He argues, most justly and wisely, that such application of repression ought to be accompanied by a policy of broad, sweeping, and generous reforms in Ireland, getting rid of landlordism, and entirely reconstructing the present indefensible administrative system.

But his antagonists would reply—and, so far as we can judge, with truth—that in neither case does he make due allowance for the strength of the sentiment opposed to the course he recommends. The dislike to what is called "coercion" among the English masses may not be strong enough to prevent an English Ministry from passing acts which restrict in Ireland the ordinary liberties of the citizen. But the experience of the last few years seems to show that it is so strong as to prevent those acts from being stringent enough and being maintained long enough in force to effect their purpose. Whipping may be good for a child or indulgence may be good for a child. But a whipping which irritates without subduing the culprit, or a whipping after which the parent apologizes and burns the rod, is worse than either severity or indulgence, for it continues the mischiefs of both.

On the other hand, the view Mr. Dicey proclaims, that repression can only be justified and the Union preserved by carrying out large measures of ameliorative social and administrative reform in Ireland, will be heartily accepted by every observer who stands outside the English conflict. "To maintain the Treaty of Union with any good effect, we must sedulously do justice to every fair demand from Ireland, must strenuously and without either fear or favor assert the equal rights of landlords and tenants, of Catholics and Protestants, and must at the same time put down every outrage and reform every abuse" (p. 280). But the outside observer will ask whether there is any hope that an English Ministry and Parliament which is governing by repression, will pass such measures or work them out in a liberal spirit. Such a Ministry will be sailing on the other tack. It will draw its support from, it will be swayed by, those whose personal interests and feelings are opposed to large reforms. An enlightened despot could and would do exactly what Mr. Dicey suggests. But neither American nor English history suggests that democracies can be expected to act like enlightened despots. This is what we mean by saying that Mr. Dicey writes more as a jurist than as a politician. He admits the fact himself, as when he says (p. 277), "To a jurist it may appear conceivable, though hardly probable, that by the vigorous aid of the British Parliament the Gladstonian Constitution for the United Kingdom might have lasted two years." With all respect for jurists, and especially for a jurist of such eminent acuteness as the author of 'The Law of the Constitution,' the reconcilement of two nations, for reconciled they will have to be if the security of England and the smooth working of her Constitution are to be insured, is an undertaking requiring much more than a mastery of constitutional law, even with the addition of an upright and earnest heart. Nations have to put up with faulty constitutions, if those constitutions are the best which the circumstances admit of; a lesson which the history of Southern Reconstruction is perhaps better fitted to impress upon Europe than any circumstances within its own experience.

The same deficient perception of existing political forces appears in Mr. Dicey's treatment of what he calls "the argument from the inconvenience to the English Parliament of the presence of Irish members bent on obstruction." He seems to think that this argument is grounded merely on the unwillingness of English members to alter the procedure of their own assembly, and assumes that it can be got rid of by amending that procedure, possibly with the addition of a change in the relations of the Executive to the Legislature, so as to render the former more independent of the latter. Such a change might mean a total dislocation of the delicate machinery of English government. But, passing that question by, any practical politician can see that the presence in a deliberative assembly of a section, numbering one-seventh of the whole, which desires to lower the character of the assembly, to derange its mechanism—in fact, to stop its working altogether—and which has no interest in the business it conducts beyond that of proving that it is incompetent to conduct a large part of its business, is a mischief that goes far too deep to be cured by any changes in the rules of debate. He may well be justified in holding that such a mischief is not alone sufficient to require the dissolution of the Union; but his own speculative attitude has prevented him from appreciating its real nature, as a much inferior member of any legislative body might do.

Subject to these limitations of the author's view, and partly in consequence of them, the book is an admirable piece of destructive criticism. It is destructive in more directions than one, for it contains an arraignment of the conduct of England to Ireland far more telling, from its calm incisiveness, than the heated harangues of Nationalist orators. The Unionist party in England have found in Mr. Dicey an ally who must surely have alarmed them by his admissions. Such admissions have a worth and use for both parties. Not only ought they to lead those who share his attitude of resistance to the Irish demand, to reconsider their position and the arguments by which they support it—to feel how absolute is the need for a "new departure" in the methods by which England has governed Ireland; but they can hardly fail to dispose his antagonists to give a fair hearing to the objections which he urges to the scheme of home rule propounded by the Gladstonian party last spring. He shows how many differences there are between that scheme and the instances cited on its behalf from other countries. He explains the relations between the British Government and the governments of the great English colonies, accentuating the points in which those relations must differ from any such as could be established between Great Britain and Ireland. He points out the inherent weaknesses of federalism, and insists on a point which, obvious as it seems to Americans, Englishmen evidently cannot have realized, that to establish a federal relation between Great Britain and Ireland means nothing less than to reconstruct the British Constitution from its foundation.

That a discussion at once so fair and so vigorous of a subject clouded by so many prejudices, passions, and misconceptions, will do good in England it is impossible to doubt. It is calculated to cool men's tempers while it clears their minds. Whether it will change opinions is another question. Those who already agree with Mr. Dicey's conclusion will find an arsenal of arguments made ready for their use which few could have forged for themselves. Those who differ from him will be apt to think that the force of his reasoning is more formal than substantial. They may be unable to break the chain of his logic, but they will feel that it has omitted to meet many of the considerations which govern their own judgment. They will say, also, that a destructive treatment of such a subject is only a half treatment. When an army is cooped up in a dangerous defile, a member of the council of war who demonstrates the risks of attempting a particular movement to the right exposes himself to the question, "What then do you advise? Some effort to escape must be made, for we cannot stay where we are." So the answer that one anticipates to this book is, "What do you propose? England and Ireland cannot go on as heretofore: that you practically admit. If home rule is so dangerous, propound your own alternative." Mr. Dicey, whose only alternative seems to be that England should utterly change her feelings towards Ireland and her manner of governing Ireland, would doubtless reply that his duty is discharged if he has shown that of all possible solutions home rule is the worst. This proposition, however, is a proposition so wide that to prove it is practically impossible, because all prediction in politics is from the nature of the matter uncertain. The controversy seems in England to have reached that phase in which the party who have got a definite plan, and a new plan, will win, not necessarily because their plan is right, but because it promises to avoid the old failures. To revert again to the experience of this country, the enfranchisement of the Southern negroes was open to a hundred objections—objections so weighty that a critic might well have deemed himself to have proved it the worst of all possible courses. Many of those objections were incontestable. Many of them have been verified by the result. Nevertheless, the negroes were enfranchised.

THE CRIMEAN JOURNEY OF CATHARINE II.

Lettres du prince de Ligne à la marquise de Coigny, pendant l'année 1787. Publiées avec une preface par M. de Lescure. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles. 1886. Pp. xxi, 69.

THIS charming little volume is one of a collection "des petits chefs-d'œuvre," and the nine letters it contains are certainly among the best of their kind. But "chefs-d'œuvre"? Well, perhaps the longest, an autobiographical sketch of twenty pages, may be so called. As for the rest, one does not ask what they are, since such as they are they are most entertaining. They are unique: letters written by a man of fifty, who had enjoyed more than almost any other man the advantages of intimacy with the most important historical personages of his time, to a woman of twenty-seven, so famous for her beauty, her wit, her charm, her pride, that Marie Antoinette said, with a smiling sigh, "I am only the queen of Versailles; it is Mme. de Coigny who is the queen of Paris." Moreover, the subject of these letters, or rather (for the subjects touched upon are most various) the framework of them, is the extraordinary Crimean journey of Catharine II. The Prince de Ligne was one of that remarkable company of travellers. It is from this point of view, we confess, that these letters seem to us of most permanent and general interest. Time has somewhat dimmed the grace of the Prince's compliments and dulled the point of his witticisms, but the brilliancy of his lively sentences reflecting the scenes about him is still possessed of magic power, and we see scarcely less vividly than he the wonderful things he saw.

Catharine, after annexing the Crimea to her own dominions, visited it under the guidance of Prince Potemkin and accompanied by the Emperor Joseph, and she carried in her suite on this six-months' journey the English and Austrian ambassadors, the Prince de Ligne (to whom she presented an estate in Taurida, as a reward, as it were, for his attendance), and the French ambassador (his intimate friend), the Comte de Ségur—the same Comte de Ségur who, five years before, as bearer of despatches to Rochambeau, had marched, if not fought, in our cause, following in the steps of his friend and connection Lafayette. He, too, gave a narrative—a much longer and more detailed, a serious and dull narrative—in his 'Mémoires,' of this magnificent "progress"; and the two friends supplement each other admirably.

In the pages of formal historians the incidents of the journey are usually summed up in sentences which take shape in the memory somewhat after the fashion of head-lines: Astonishing deceptions practised by Prince Potemkin on Catharine! He wishes to stimulate her to continued conquests! He deludes her with regard to the resources of the country! Populations migrate secretly along her path!! Temporary villages!! Fictitious highways!! Stage artifices on an incredibly stupendous scale!!! These rumors prevailed even at the time, and at the time the Prince de Ligne contradicts them. One surmises that even this shrewd and practised observer saw the things now before him a little too much en beau (and very naturally, looking at them from the Empress's carriage window); and it does more to justify the judicial blindness of Catharine herself than anything else could. The Prince says, in one of his last letters:

"I know it is not the fashion to believe . . . anything good of Russia. Even those among the Russians themselves who are vexed at not having been with us, will assert that we have been deceived and that we deceive. The ridiculous story has already been spread that pasteboard villages have been transported along our way for a circuit of a hundred leagues, that the vessels and the cannons were painted, the cavalry without horses, etc."

There may have been no pasteboard villages, but the high-born travellers give proof that men of pasteboard would have been the same to them as the villagers and peasants and serfs among whom they passed, and the Prince's pages describe only a superb "spectacle."

In January, 1787, they set off. The travelling procession was composed of 14 carriages and 184 sledges, with 40 others to be used if needed. Five hundred and sixty horses were ready at each post. When night fell, great bonfires each side of the road along the whole way made it brighter than day. Wherever they stopped to eat or sleep they "found encampments marvellous from their Asiatic magnificence in the midst of deserts"; while, on their return in the summer, "the carriages were full of peaches and oranges, and the valets drunk with champagne." February, March, and April were spent at Kieff awaiting the breaking up of ice on the river. Catharine established some of the conditions of court-life while there, and received homage from all the wild nations that surrounded her. There congregated to see her the famous Cossacks of the Don; a Prince of Georgia bringing tributes; Chinese deputies "who waggled their heads like the figures that are on the mantelpiece of your chimney"; envoys from the wandering Kirghiz; troops of "independent" Tartars, and savage Kalmucks and crowds of Poles.

On the 1st of May, the Empress, embarking in her barge, set sail on the Dnieper, followed by a stately fleet of more than eighty vessels with three thousand men. The splendid apartments constructed on the decks of the eight "court" ships glittered with gold and silk, and were furnished with elegant comfort, while twelve musicians on each barge increased the sense of luxury. Numberless boats and canoes and fast-sailing skiffs fluttered continually about the squadron, and into these the voyagers often entered, to gain opportunities of walking on the banks of the river, or through the fertile islands among which the river flows. A concourse of spectators constantly crowded the river sides, and the beautiful, sunny, verdant landscape beyond was so ornamented and disguised with triumphal arches and other architectural decorations as to produce completely illusive effects. The picture drawn of the whole scene by the trustworthy Ségur is very extraordinary.

After five days they reached Kaneff, where they were awaited by the King of Poland and his court. "Foolish Poniatowsky!" (so Carlyle depicts him) "an empty, windy creature, redolent of macassar and the finer sensibilities of the heart, . . . an elegant inane creature with vaporous sentimentalisms and sublime sorrows and disappointments." The Prince de Ligne saw only his charming side. "I went," he says, "in a little Zaporogian canoe to announce to him our arrival. An hour after, the great lords of the empire came to escort him in a brilliant sloop; and on entering it he said to them, with the inexpressible charm of his fine appearance and of his delightful tone of voice: 'Gentlemen, the King of Poland has commissioned me to commend to you the Count Poniatowsky.'" "Ornamental wholly; the body of him and the mind of him got up for representation," says Carlyle again. Stanislas and Catharine had not met since they had been lovers thirty years before. Six or seven years after that she had, as it were, given him his crown, which only a year later than this she was to take from him. The Comte de Ségur and the Prince de Ligne and others of the party, her more personal friends, anticipated with some excitement this dramatic meeting. As the King ascended the imperial barge, they pressed about him; "but," says the Count, "our expectations were almost entirely disappointed; for after a mutual salutation, grave, cold, and dignified, Catharine giving her hand to Stanislas, they entered alone an apartment where they remained tête à tête for half an hour." When they reappeared, the Count (he was tant soit peu a sentimentalist) asserts that "over the Empress hung a cloud of embarrassment and unusual restraint, and in the eyes of the King was a certain sadness." At the entertainment which followed, "little was eaten and little was said," the Count notes; but the Prince declares: "The dinner was very gay." On rising from table the King handed to the Empress her gloves and fan, and looked for his hat; the Empress seeing it sooner than he, handed it to him. "Deux fois couvrir ma tête," said the King, gallantly, alluding to his crown; "ah! Madame! c'est trop me combler de bienfaits et de reconnoissance." The poor Count finds this interview only too well fitted for history; "for it was certainly not embellished and animated by any excess of tender sentiments." But he might have been consoled by the Prince de Ligne's view, who says, "The King of Poland had been waiting for us at Kaneff, and expended three months and three millions to see the Empress for three hours."

The Emperor Joseph and Catharine were to have met at Kherson, but he, arriving there before her, hastened still forward. She learned this change of plan, and, desirous of showing equal cordiality, she suddenly disembarked, leaving almost all her suite behind her, and, getting into a carriage, came across the Emperor on the road near the solitary house of a Cossack. Here they remained for some hours, and partook of a repast prepared, in the absence of all attendants, by the hands of Prince Potemkin himself and his friends the Prince of Nassau and General Branicki, and which "was as detestable," Count Ségur declares, "as might have been expected from such noble cooks." The Emperor, while in Russia, travelled as the Count of Falkenstein, and was accompanied only by a general officer and two servants. It was "a singular journey," as the Emperor himself said, adding: "Who would have dreamt of seeing me with Catharine the Second and the Ministers of France and England, wandering in the desert of the Tartars! It is altogether a new page in history." It was sometimes like a page from the 'Arabian Nights'; and the novel sights, native to the country, which they saw with the unpractised eyes of statesmen and diplomats (very unlike the trained observation of the born traveller), combined with the gorgeous spectacles arranged by Prince Potemkin, had on them an almost bewildering effect. "I know no longer," cries the Prince, "where I am, nor what age of the world it is." He might well believe himself to be dreaming when, dropping asleep in the royal carriage from heat and fatigue, he "heard, on awaking, one of my travelling companions saying, 'I have thirty millions of subjects, as I am told, reckoning only the male population'; and the other answering, 'And I two and twenty millions, counting all.' 'I must have an army of at least six hundred thousand men from Kamtchatka to Riga,' adds the former, and the latter replies, 'Half that number is exactly what I need.'"

He continues:

"In our travelling carriage we review every State and every great personage, and heaven knows how we treat them! 'Rather than sign the secession of thirteen provinces, as my brother George has done, I would have shot myself,' says Catharine gently. 'And rather than resign, as my brothers and my brother-in-law have done by assembling the nation to talk of abuses, I know not what I would not have done,' says Joseph II. . . . They were also of one opinion respecting the King of Sweden, who is no favorite with either, and against whom the Emperor, as he said, conceived a dislike in Italy on account of a blue and silver dressing-gown, with a diamond star. Both agreed that he has energy, talents, and wit."

Their imperial majesties sometimes "felt each other's pulse about those poor devils the Turks. Hints were dropped and then they looked at each other." And it was not only the majesties who looked at each other. A few words from the Empress respecting the relations of France to the Mussulmans caused "Ségur to turn pale and Nassau to flush, while Fitz-Herbert gaped openmouthed and Cobenzl was perturbed and I laughed," says the Prince. Catharine talked a great deal of her "petit ménage," her little establishment, as she designated her vast empire. But the conversation was not always of States and great personages. One day she desired to be taught to write verses. Like the famous Malebranche she could not learn the art. His greatest success was in these lines:

"Il fait le plus beau temps du monde
Pour aller à cheval, sur la terre et sur l'onde,"

Catharine got as far as

"Sur le sopha du Kan, sur des coussins bourrés, Dans un Kiosque d'or, de grilles entourés."

They made great fun of her Majesty for being unable to get off her sofa after four hours of effort; and the scene was evidently one of very free and jesting familiarity. Indeed, the whole tone both of the Prince de Ligne and the Comte de Ségur about Catharine shows a complete bonhomie on her part, made possible by the immense admiration and respect as for a man with which she inspired these men, who called her—to her face and also behind her back—Catharine le Grand. One day she commanded them all to use the tu to her. Down came a mighty deluge of tutoi-ing—à bras raccourcis—the last always more comical than the preceding one. "I interlarded mine with the title Majesty, and I thought ta majesté did very well. Others knew not what to say, but her thou-ing and thou-ed Majesty looked none the less the autocratess of all the Russias, and almost of all the world."

In another conversation referred to here, but reported more fully by the Prince to his friend Grimm, Catharine asked them what they thought she would have become had she been born a man and a private person. The English Ambassador replied that she would have been a great legislator; the Austrian, a distinguished minister; the Prince de Ligne said she would have been a famous general. "No," she said to him, "you are mistaken; had I been a soldier I should have risked everything in the pursuit of glory, and I should have been killed before I was a captain." "I do not believe it, madam," answered the Prince, "for I am still alive." The Empress did not catch his meaning at once, but when she did she took in perfectly good part the rebuke it contained for assuming that she would have shown greater daring than he and many others.

It is impossible in these limits to give any indication of the extraordinary condition of the country through which they passed, or of the political complications and anticipations of war that chiefly occupied the thoughts of the whole party; but here is a picture from which many conclusions may be drawn respecting Catharine's modes of government:

"For two months now I have been throwing money out of the window: I have done so before, but not in the same manner. This is the fashion of it: by my side in the carriage is a great green bag, like that in which you will put your prayer-books when you become pious. This bag is full of imperials, pieces of four ducats. The inhabitants of the neighboring villages, and even from ten, fifteen, twenty leagues' distance, come to meet us, to see the Empress. This is what they do: a long quarter of an hour before her coming they lie down on their faces, and do not rise for a quarter of an hour after we have passed; on these backs and these heads kissing the earth I pelt down gold at full gallop; and this takes place ten times a day."

So, with jestings and heart-beatings, tossing millions to the prostrate peasantry, and forgetting to take them into account among the problems to be solved, talking of peace and rushing towards war, with fireworks costing 40,000 rubles and illuminations representing Vesuvius, these representatives of civilization went and came through the lands of barbarism. Civilization—barbarism? Is there a deeper meaning than he gave to it in the Prince de Ligne's own saying—"Il n'y a de civil que les gens qui ne sont pas civilisés"?

RECENT RELIGIOUS AND ETHICAL LITERATURE.

History of Interpretation. By F. W. Farrar. Eight lectures preached before the University of Oxford, in the year 1885, on the Bampton Foundation. E. P. Dutton & Co. Pp. 553.

The Philosophy of Religion, or the Basis of its History. By Prof. O. Pfleiderer. Translated from the second German edition by Alexander Stewart, M.A., and Allan Menzies, B.D. Vol. I. London: Williams & Norgate. Pp 740.

Die Nothwendigkeit der Religion: eine letzte Consequenz der Darwinische Lehre. Von Dr. F. Dahl. Heidelberg: Weise. 1886. Pp. 112.

Moderne Versuche eines Religionsersatzes. Von Dr. H. Druskowitz. Heidelberg: Weise. 1886. Pp. 90.

In Sachen der Spiritismus und einer Naturwissenschaftlichen Psychologie. Von A. Bastian. Berlin: Stricker. 1886. Pp. 216.

Jenseits von Gut und Böse: Vorspiel einer Philosophie der Zukunft. Von Fr Nietzsche. Leipzig: C. G. Naumann. 1886. Pp. 266.

Outlines of the History of Ethics for English Readers. By Henry Sidgwick. Macmillan & Co.

L'Évolution de la Morale. Par Ch. Letourneau. Paris: Delahaye. 1887. Pp. 978.

Ethik: eine Untersuchung der Thatsachen und Gesetze des sittlichen Lebens. Von Wm. Wundt. Stuttgart: F. Enke. 1886. Pp. 577.

Principles of Morals. (Introductory chapters.) By J. M. Wilson and T. Fowler. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan. 1886. Pp. 133.

THE Bampton lectureship is a great honor even for an Archdeacon of Westminster. Although the lectures must be printed within two months after they are delivered, the appointment is made long beforehand, and the lecturer has both opportunity and incentive to do his best work. Canon Farrar describes, perhaps as well as his limits permit, the fashions in Bible exegesis from ancient Jewish down to modern times—legalistic, Alexandrian, allegorical, traditional, ecclesiastical, Aristotelian, and dogmatic—in historical succession, with hundreds of references and footnotes that suggest, not so much the special scholar as a diligent general reader. He has no patience with any theory of verbal inspiration, and intimates that he is doing his best to kill off bad theories of inspiration and revelation. The very fact that method after method of interpretation has been rejected by widening knowledge, and that the Bible has survived such absurd pedagogy for so many centuries, is in fact the best of all arguments for its supreme intrinsic merit. The Renaissance seems to have started well towards a sensible and truly historical conception of the real character and treatment of Scripture, but these hopeful tendencies were strangled by the scores and hundreds of systematic theologies which followed the Reformation. The author says, in substance, that it is more blasphemous to reject the lessons of history and science than human theories about Scripture, and that to invest our conclusions about the Bible with any of its authority—the besetting sin of commentators—is an exegetical fraud. In his view the Bible itself is as unchanged as nature, but we should no more accept old views about it than we should accept the opinions of Pythagoras and Ptolemy about nature. He almost seems to agree with Bishop Herbert Marsh, who is quoted as saying squarely that the Bible must be examined by the same laws of criticism which are applied to other writings of antiquity. We hope the trustees of the John Bampton fund are less exacting in interpreting the words of his will than the critics of the Andover theology.

A really thorough and scholarly historian of the philosophy of religion, such as Prof. Pfleiderer is, finds his task by no means an easy one, for the question of utter scientific sincerity—not only his own, but that of those of whom he writes—enters as a complication, consciously or unconsciously, into every part of his work. The second volume of his history includes writers from Schleiermacher down to the present time, and is to be followed by two more volumes treating the philosophy of religion genetically and speculatively. Though these later volumes contain important additions to the first edition, on the development of the religious consciousness in its beginnings among the Indo-Germans, the Semitic race, and in Christianity, it is the first two volumes of this edition only that are here so enlarged as to constitute almost a new work. The digest of the views of Schleiermacher and especially of Kant, whose significance for religious thought is now so rapidly growing in appreciation, constitutes the best chapters in the book, because written, as is very evident in the case of Kant, with admiration and even ardor. The defect in the author's exposition throughout is his failure to reduce the abstract metaphysical phraseology, in which much of the philosophy of religion has been written, from the idealistic standpoint to the clear and concise language which all subject-matter in the metaphysical realm is now so happily seeking.

Dr. Dahl is a young zoölogist, and his thought is concise enough. He finds that, from the standpoint of natural history, religion is in the highest degree advantageous and even necessary for men. Its objective validity is a matter of no interest, and is, in fact, unknowable. We want no proofs or knowledge, but only faith. Christianity is the highest of all religions, and not merely fills gaps in scientific knowledge, but has always had, and will continue to have, the same domain. Miracles are possible, immortality sure, the Bible all true, etc.—all in a large, high, and sometimes almost esoteric sense. In fact, as Kant thought the undevout astronomer mad, Dr. Dahl is not very far from the conviction that the unchristian Darwin is defective in moral, if not in mental, insight. To know that the best survive and rise to ever higher stages of development is a new source of consolation, which tips the scale for those who die in the struggle for existence to the side of pleasure, in the insight that their death clears the way for the higher development of better organizations.

Dr. Druskowitz thinks Christianity is fast passing away—has already, in fact, lost its hold on most of the best men. Miracles, immortality, and theologies must go with it. Worst of all, neither Feuerbach, Dühring, Dubal, nor Comte has given us an adequate substitute. Social relations must be considerably changed before a worthy substitute could find a foothold, were it entirely manifest what and where it was to be found. Indeed, were these ideal social conditions realized, we should then see that man must rise above the realm of religion to higher insights. Man's duty is to strive to attain the highest development of all that is within him, but also to keep alive a sentiment of supreme loyalty to the sources of all existence.

A. Bastian's is certainly the most chaotic mind among the psychological anthropologists. He does not believe in indexes, chapters, or sections of any sort; quotes incessantly, often in half-a-dozen languages on a page, and from all sorts of known and unknown authors. Slade and the olfactorial Dr. Jäger furnish the author a text, and he shows overwhelmingly that such spiritualistic theories and performances have always been in the world and been cherished. He concludes with his well-known thesis, that the thoughts of the races of mankind must be gathered and tabulated, as the bases of a psychology that shall rest on the only solid foundation of natural science.

Nietzsche writes on the prejudices of philosophers, the essence of religion, the natural history of morals, and so forth, as introductory to his forthcoming philosophy. There is a levity, almost flippancy, in his style, which is hardly less clear and brilliant than that of Schopenhauer, his great master in a sense, and it does not impress one favorably with his seriousness. Christianity is Platonism for the people. It was rooted, perhaps, ultimately in primitive animism, but chiefly in the horror of the naïve, instinctive faith, that led Socrates to evolve the concept which Plato hypostatized as idea, etc., though the Church, in later accepting faith as an authority, partially atoned for this one-sidedness. The savant's love of wisdom is really love of his own wisdom, and philosophy is itself most introspective. Consciousness is a form of sacrificing intellect to the unconscious. This Platonic, Christian, philosophic ideolatry, or fiction of a transcendental world, which broke out as an acute religious neurosis some two thousand years ago, has tamed and domesticated man till he is insipid and degenerate, like a too much handled cat. It has, however, happily developed a tension in the mental and moral world, and given promise that we shall see things as they really are; and the new psychology, which seeks the truth to do the right and is the future queen of all the sciences, will do the rest.

M. Letourneau holds that philosophy has been separated so long from science that its abstract ideas have become mere naïve and subtle attenuations of animism. Even moral ideas and habits, from the standpoint of the anthropologist, which the author represents, are products of comparatively recent growth, the stages of which, for the benefit of pedagogues and moralists, he endeavors to formulate (after preliminary sections on heredity and the instincts and moral character and conflicts of animals) as follows: (1.) Bestial morality, including anthropophagy, war, human sacrifices, infanticide, abortion, marriage, property. (2.) Savage morality. (3.) Barbaric morality, illustrated by the ancient Mexicans, Peruvians, Egyptians, Persians, and Chinese. (4.) Industrial or mercantile morality. Metaphysical morality—or, which is the same, the morality of attenuated religion—is disparaged, and the civilized man of to-day stands without any sense of restraint from the morality of the past. He can only be saved by a new, severely scientific, and utilitarian morality, signs of the coming of which are said to abound, but which can only be inaugurated by the formation of small groups of ethical innovators, who by their words and conduct shall incite to the formation of other groups, and thus gradually metamorphose the innately perverse nerve centres whence all ethical conduct springs.

Wundt's industry is amazing. He has already written on nearly all the special departments which are covered by philosophy, and is yet but little over fifty. There is a breadth about his treatment of logic, ethics, and psychology which one seeks in vain in any other contemporary writer. Sidgwick and Lotze were more widely read and more deeply ethical in nature than is Wundt; Venn and our own Charles Peirce are far better grounded in logic than he; and Horwicz and Steinthal, Lotze and Herbart, all surpass him, except in the purely experimental chapters of psychology. But his very freedom from the traditions of the university philosophy and from much useless lumber of scholastic learning has enabled him to turn the light of fresh, modern common sense, tempered by a more or less scientific training, on to every philosophic subject he touches, vastly to its advantage. He will eventually prove, if we mistake not, chiefly an inciter and suggester of more detailed work that will supersede his own at most points by going further along the same lines. In the present imposing volume the topics are chosen and grouped in the index in an almost inspiring way. Every reader will feel that this is the basis and this the method for something like adequate treatment of ethical problems. When we turn to the special sections, however, our expectations are only imperfectly realized—not so much, after all, from any deficiency of learning or of thought, as from the vastness of the field covered, which requires general treatment, and makes methods of sufficient detail impossible for a single volume or more. Ethics has long struggled with the problem how to unite the highest well being of the individual with that of others—a proolem to which much ethical literature is now devoted. However this may be solved, two things are now clear: that for successful treatment of the latter part of the problem, one must have had long training in practical ethics, philanthropic administration, and charitable work, and must have had an internal experience of struggling to live without waste of vital energy and on the plane of the highest personal morality, or, we might say, of the highest psychological hygiene. These only can rescue the vast and ultimate problems of ethics from their present aridity. A merely literary treatment of them may be of great value, as is unquestionably this latest work of the well-known Leipsic psychologist; but it lacks, to our thinking, the one American thing needful, viz, reality.

The last book on our list is but a fragment of three introductory chapters struck off as early as 1875, before the death of Prof. Wilson, and now published by his colleagues. The second chapter, comprising more than half the book, is historical, including the period from Hobbes to Bentham, and contains a very clear presentation of the chief systems of the period.

About Money and Other Things. A Gift-Book. By the Author of 'John Halifax, Gentleman.' Harper & Bros. 1887.

Miss Mulock is one of those authors whom time kindly allows to communicate to their books only the charm of age. Her pages receive the customary welcome due to long acquaintance, but not as a mere matter of custom; they are still solidly useful, and pervaded now by that various and sweet wisdom of age which is best summed up in the word humaneness. In this volume, which is a small collection of practical essays and short tales, we have a piece of literature characteristic of the English home, in which reading for youth is thought better if it have a moral; and for this reason, perhaps, it is called "a gift book" by the author, because it is a book of good counsel, though not of pretty covers. There are in it the title-essay about the duties of the housewife in respect to the use of money for the family, full of domestic sense and honest feeling about those relations of life which grow out of the necessity for material support; the essay upon "Genius," with its rigid insisting that duty lies only the more strictly upon the youth with gifts; the essay upon what makes life worth living—the making it a Christian life. Besides this express advice, there are the "true stories" of the boyish Australian wanderer remembering in the midst of shipwreck a little incident of his English nursery, and the Scotch youth hunting for employment; and there are two pleasant pictures of vacation ramble—one of the author's house-boat on the Thames with her "six girls" for fellow-voyagers, the other of the Killarney lakes, in which glimpses of Irish character and scenery are skilfully made a plea for reconcilement and mutual kindness between races so long united in everything but in heart. In the days of 'Theophrastus Such,' with his intellectuality, and of such fiction as Daudet dedicates to his son, all this is commonplace and may even seem childish to our forward youth; but the spirit which breathes through these old-fashioned themes is the tradition of practical virtue for a boy's ideal, of kind serviceableness for a girl's, and of broad humanity for a nation's, which lies at the base of historic English character. Unambitious and slight as these pages are, their simple, direct moral teaching, their sound reflections on the common things of life, and the gracious womanliness which is felt pervading them, combine to make this volume excellent home-reading.

Romances of Chivalry. Told, and illustrated in facsimile, by John Ashton. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

THE occupation of a professional book-maker has certainly about it something of the fascination which attends a life of adventure. To be surprised one's self by what one discovers, and then to share that surprise with others, involve two feelings that are productive of special pleasure. There is the individual charm of unexpectedness in learning something which had never before been dreamed of as existing. Then, again, there is the sense of general superiority which arises from communicating to mankind what has previously been confined almost wholly to the generous giver. No wonder that the profession has a fascination which makes it the recreation of many. "In those days," writes Mr. Ashton in this work, "an idle man in search of a job in the adventure line was never long without meeting with one." So it is now. Times change, but human nature does not. Our modern knight-errants of the book-making work sally forth, not to succor distressed damsels or hapless prisoners, but to relieve the wants of suffering communities which hunger and thirst for cheap knowledge and omniscience that can be gained without toil.

These men look upon their employment as a beneficent one, and they are not entirely out of the way in so believing. They are occasionally of great use. They are constantly devising schemes for producing new works on novel subjects, and they sometimes hit upon valuable ones. Mr. Ashton himself struck out a method of portraying the social life of the past by consulting its neglected and almost forgotten ephemeral literature. The work he did might probably have been better done: it was a good deal to have originated the idea of doing it at all. He deserved, therefore, all the success with which he met. Other ventures of his, however, have not been so prosperous, and the volume before us is a failure from almost any point of view from which it can be examined. He has, in it, entered into a region of which he clearly knows little, and which, for any satisfactory account of its peculiarities, requires something more than the capacity to seize upon and chronicle the social small beer of life. It is not, in spite of what he says, an easy region to explore satisfactorily, nor an altogether delightful one to explore at all. He who ventures far into it may come back laden with sheaves; but if he does so, he will surely have to set forth with tears.

The present volume professes to be an attempt to popularize the romances of chivalry. These, Mr. Ashton assures us, are not known at all to the general reader, because no effort has been put forth to make their attractions accessible. Many of them, indeed, have been published by learned societies, but they have rarely got beyond the subscribers' shelves. They are reproduced in their original dress, and in consequence cannot be easily made out save by the special student. To remedy this state of things Mr. Ashton now comes forward with his first list of romances, told and illustrated so as to be readable and entertaining. The list includes a dozen stories such as Sir Bevis of Hampton, Guy of Warwick, The Squire of Low Degree, Valentine and Orson, and others the names of which will be familiar to many who do not know their details. It is evident from the preface that two other collections are to follow, one based upon the Carlovingian cycle of romances, the other upon the Arthurian.

If the public is not delighted, it will not be due to any half-heartedness on the part of the compiler in recommending his wares. Mr. Ashton has set about his task with all that enthusiasm which is apt to attend late acquaintance with a subject or limited knowledge of it. There is, indeed, a sort of naïveté in the almost child-like interest he manifests in the supposed treasures he fancies he has dug up. He is in a perpetual state of astonishment that some particular story has not been more popular. He assures us that these romances were not only highly sensational and full of incident, but also surprises us with the information that they were never prolix, never full of long-winded speeches, until they began to wane at the end of the sixteenth century. As belonging to the body of subscribers to some of the learned societies he mentions, it has been our privilege, or rather our duty, to wade through many of the stories of the kind which have been published. It may be that we attach a peculiar meaning to prolixity and long-windedness, but these words, we should say, denoted two most conspicuous characteristics of these romances. It is to their possession of these qualities that we are disposed to attribute largely the fact of their now being little read or of being little likely to be read. They were suited to the taste of the age in which they came into being. Out of deference to Mr. Ashton's new-born zeal in their behalf, we shall not maintain that the taste of our own age is any better; but it is certainly very different. A story about demons and enchantments and fairies in days when men believed in them could be carried along by its incidents and details; but in days when men no longer believe in demons and enchantments and fairies, there must be an unusual charm in the telling to offset the incredulity with which such incidents and details are received. To that must be added, in the superabundance of our existing literature, a decent regard for the brevity of human life. Neither one of these conditions is found in these romances; and on both grounds there is a curious lack of the literary sense in placing them, as is done in this volume, in comparison with the stories from the Norse or with the 'Arabian Nights.'

Still, there is a certain interest attaching to these romances, and, if sufficiently condensed, their substance might be worth retelling. In this form they might then become popular to a limited extent. In spite of his assurances that they are never prolix, Mr. Ashton does set out to perform the task of condensation, but he has hardly done it in a way to make the tales read by the class for which he has designed them. Let us take, for illustration, the first romance entitled "Melusine." Every now and then Mr. Ashton abandons his own method of recounting the details of the adventures recorded, and says that the story would suffer if it were not told in the very words of the original. These he then proceeds to reproduce, like any editor belonging to the learned societies he mentions. But if there was any desirability of retaining the ancient words, there was certainly no necessity for preserving the ancient spelling in works which are primarily designed to popularize what has been forgotten. Even he who may have been hungering for the knowledge of these romances, can hardly be expected to have his enjoyment heightened by finding "their" spelled "theyr," "each" spelled "eche," "build" spelled "bylde," and by deciphering a hundred similar variations of orthography. Slight modernizations of the inflections also would not affect the literary quality or the interest of the tale to the unlearned reader, for whom the work has been specially prepared. "Madam, I have been somewhat ill at ease, and have had an ague," is a statement that, in its modern English form, may perhaps lose in quaintness, but certainly gains in clearness, as contrasted with the following form in this book, "Madame, I have be [en] somewhat evyl at ease & have had an ager." The adding of the en in brackets shows, moreover, a wobbling in the mind of the editor, and would be pretty sure to puzzle the average reader. Mr. Ashton's ambition, also, to tell things he knows as soon as he knows them, is attended with the not uncommon result of his sometimes telling things before he knows them. The vocabulary of the fifteenth century presents no special difficulties, but it is evident that the editor has not invariably mastered the few that exist. There are some passages likewise in the selections reproduced in their original form, in which the early scribe or the modern transcriber must have been at fault. The grammar of no period of the English language can cope successfully with their construction, and if they are of a sort to puzzle the students of our early speech, the outlook for the masses waiting for this work is certainly gloomy. Altogether, we are unable to believe that the early English romances are destined to become absorbingly popular through the well-intentioned efforts of Mr. Ashton.

Ancient Cities, from the Dawn to the Daylight. By William Burnet Wright. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1886.

THE "ancient cities" which form the subject of Mr. Wright's little volume are selected for their relation to the Bible or to early Christianity, and all belong to the Orient except Rome and Athens. The work consists of fifteen sketches, apparently lectures, but some of them are very short for lectures; and, as the subject of the last two is the "New Jerusalem," there are thirteen cities treated. These are all designated by some characteristic epithet—"Ur, the City of Saints," "Nineveh, the City of Soldiers," "Babylon, the City of Sensualists," etc. The scholarship is adequate, although the preface disclaims all pretence to erudition, the style is animated, and the point of view (that of the minister of religion) is serious and orthodox, without being narrow. A better comment could hardly be made upon the atrocious conduct of the crusaders upon entering Jerusalem than this—"that no other sentiment has ever made men so devilish as religious zeal without the spirit of Christ." The book may be heartily commended for what it has aimed to do and for what it has accomplished. We will only make one criticism, that more unity and clearness of view would perhaps have been obtained by selecting a fewer number of cities and treating each with greater fulness.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

A Child of the Revolution: A Novel. Harper's Handy Series. 25 cents.

Adams, B. The Emancipation of Massachusetts. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.50.

A Question of Identity. (No Name Series.) Boston: Roberts Brothers.

Avery, Dr. E. M. Words Correctly Spoken. Cleveland: The Burrows Brothers Co. 15 cents.

Barrows, Isabel C. Proceedings of the National Conference of Charities and Correction. Thirteenth Annual session, 1886. Boston: Press of George H. Ellis.

Baker, W. S. Character Portraits of Washington, as Delineated by Historians, Orators, and Divines, with Biographical Notes and References. Philadelphia: Robert M. Lindsay. $5.

Besant, W. Dorothy Forster: A Novel. Harper's Franklin Square Library. 20 cents.

Bishop, W. H. The Golden Justice. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.

Browne, Francis F. Life of Abraham Lincoln. N. D. Thompson Publishing Co.

Caswell—Ryan. The Harcarolle. Time and Tune. Book II. 70 Songs. Boston: Ginn & Co. $1.

Clark, Prof. J. S. A Practical Rhetoric, for Instruction in English Composition and Revision in Colleges and Intermediate Schools. Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

Coleridge, A. D. Goethe's Letters to Zelter. Scribner & Welford.

Curtis, G. T. Creation or Evolution? A Philosophical Inquiry. D. Appleton & Co. $2.

Irelan, Dr. J. R. The Republic: or a History of the United States of America, in the Administrations, from the Monarchic Colonial Days to the Present Times. In 18 volumes. Vols. I. and II. Chicago: Fairbanks and Palmer Publishing Co. $2.50 per vol.

Keigwin, H. W. Principles of Elementary Algebra. Boston: Ginn & Co.

Lawyer's Code of Ethics: A Satire. St. Louis: F. H. Thomas Law Book Co.

Martin, G. Marguerite; or the Isle of Demons. Montreal: Dawson Brothers.

Martineau, Harriet. The Peasant and the Prince: A Story of the French Revolution. Boston: Ginn & Co. 40 cents.

Martin—Wetzler. The Electric Motor and its Applications. Illustrated. W. J. Johnston.

Melmoth, W. G. The Dogaressa. Scribner & Welford. $2.

Nichols, S. H. Monte Rosa: The Epic of an Alp. Second edition. Belford, Clarke & Co.

O'Shea, J. A. Romantic Spain: A Record of Personal Experiences. 2 vols. Scribner & Welford.

Peabody, Elizabeth P. Last Evening with Washington Alston, and Other Papers. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co. $1.50.

Pfeiffer, Emily. Sonnets. Revised and enlarged edition. Scribner & Welford.

Philbrick, Prof. P. H. Beams and Girders: Practical Formulas for their Resistance. D. Van Nostrand. 50c.

Plimpton, F. B. Poems. Illustrated. Cincinnati: Mrs. F. B. Plimpton.

Popular Synonyms. Twenty-five Thousand Words in Ordinary Use. Cleveland: The Burrows Brothers Co. 12 cents.

Preston, H. W. A Year in Eden. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.50.

Price, B. Modern Architectural Practice. No. 1. A Large Country House. W. T. Comstock. $5.

Saltus, E. The Anatomy of Negation. Scribner & Welford.

Scottish Metaphysics Reconstructed in accordance with the Principles of Physical Science. Edinburgh: William Blackwood & Sons. 40 cents.

Ségur, Mme. la Comtesse de. Les Malheurs de Sophie. W. R. Jenkins.

Sinnett, A. P. Karma: A Novel. Chicago: Rand, McNally & Co. 75 cents.

Temple, G. Britta: A Shetland Romance. Harper & Brothers. 25 cents.

Tolstoi, L. Mes Mémoires: Enfance—Adolescence—Jeunesse. Traduit par E. Halpérine. New York: Christern.

Towne, E. O. Aphorisms of the Three Trees. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co.

Van Karlstein, B. O. Gotham and the Gothamites. Englished by F. C. Valentine. Chicago: Laird & Lee.

Washburn, Prof. E. A Treatise on the American Law of Real Property. Fifth Edition, by Joseph Willard and Simon G. Crosswell. 3 vols. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

Werner, F. L. Z. The Templars in Cyprus: A Dramatic Poem. Translated by E. A. M. Lewis. Scribner & Welford.

Wharton, Dr. F. A Digest of the International Law of the United States, Taken from Documents Issued by Presidents and Secretaries of State, and from Decisions of Federal Courts and Opinions of Attorneys-General. In 3 vols. Washington: State Department.

Whitney, W. D. A Practical French Grammar. Henry Holt & Co. $1.60.

Worthington's Annual, for the Young. Worthington Co. $1.50.

Wright, F. A. Architectural Studies. Vol. I. Low Cost Houses; Store Fronts and Interior Details; Stables; Seaside and Southern Houses; Out-Buildings. W. T. Comstock. $5.

Wright, Henrietta Christian. Children's Stories of American Progress. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

Yonge, Charlotte M. A Modern Telemachus. London: Macmillan & Co.; New York: Harpers.

The Greek in English.

By Thomas D. Goodell, Ph.D., Instructor in the Hartford (Ct) High School. 16mo, pp. 128. Price 75 cents.

This book attempts to teach that limited portion of Greek which college men remember after they have forgotten vastly more—the portion which even those who wish to banish the study of Greek from our schools would admit can least easily be spared, and the portion essential to a ready command of the English tongue. This it tries to do without waste of time or labor.

 A sample copy sent, postpaid, to a teacher upon receipt of 38 cents.

HENRY HOLT & CO.,
Publishers, 29 West 23d St., New York.

4 NEW NOVELS.

A YEAR IN EDEN.

A Novel. By HARRIET WATERS PRESTON, Author of 'Aspendale,' 'Love in the 19th Century,' etc. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

AGATHA AND THE SHADOW.

The second volume in the "Old Colony Series" of novels. Uniform in size and style with 'Constance of Acadia.' 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

A QUESTION OF IDENTITY.

A new novel in the "No Name Series." 16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

MABEL STANHOPE.

A Story. By KATHLEEN O'MEARA, Author of 'Madame Mohl,' etc. 16mo. Cloth, $1.25.

CARVING AND SERVING.

By Mrs. D. A. LINCOLN, Author of 'The Boston Cook Book.' Square 12mo. Illuminated board covers. 60 cents.

RIDING FOR LADIES.

With Hints on the Stable. By Mrs. POWER O'DONOGHUE, Author of 'Ladies on Horseback' and 'A Beggar on Horseback.' Very fully illustrated by Chantrey Corbould. Square 12mo. Cloth, gilt, $3.50.

Just published and for sale by all booksellers.
Mailed, postpaid, by the publishers.

Roberts Brothers.

THE BEST MODERN ETCHINGS.

A new Illustrated and Descriptive Catalogue sent by mail on receipt of Ten Cents. FREDERICK KEPPEL & CO., London, and 23 East 16th Street (Union Square), New York.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANguages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer. 144 Tremont St., Boston.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

"In a Nutshell, a World of Philosophy."

THE MONARCH OF DREAMS.

By THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON.

No previous work by this author has called forth warmer praise from the best private sources than this brief imaginative story.

One of the most eminent American critics speaks of "its clear and wholesome depths," and adds: "It is a charming allegory, as full of nature as of fancy."

Another says that it gives "in a nutshell a world of philosophy."

A distinguished writer of fiction says: "When I first read the little book which holds so much between its slender covers I thought, it is Hawthorne over again; and I see that others have had the same idea; but afterwards it seemed to me of more far-reaching purpose and deeper insight than Hawthorne used, and much too bold and original to be compared with any other work."

The Boston Transcript says of it: "This little book has but one fault—there is not enough of it."

The Boston Traveller says: "The book is worthy to become a classic in American literature."

The Cambridge Press says: "It seems to us quite as original as anything evolved from the imagination of any English or American writer of the past or the present."

CLOTH, FIFTY CENTS.

Sold by all Booksellers, and sent by Mail, Postpaid, on Receipt of Price.

Lee and Shepard,

PUBLISHERS, BOSTON.

German Simplified.

An eminently practical new method for learning the German language. Edition for self-instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each; school edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by Prof. A. Knoflach, 140 Nassau St., New York. Prospectus free.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL,

to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

TAUCHNITZ & JOUAUST LIBRARIES.

(ENGLISH AND FRENCH NOVELS AND CLASSICS.)
Beautiful books, printed in clear type and handsomely bound, at low prices.
SEND STAMP FOR CATALOGUES TO
DUPRAT & CO., dealers in Rare and Modern Books, 5 East 17th Street, New York.

BOOKS FOR SALE.

LAROUSSE. Grand Dictionnaire universel du XIXe Siecle. 16 vols., 4to, bound in full sheepsk. New. Containing 22,100 pages. Printed in 4 columns. Latest Edition. $150.00.

LITTRÉ, E. Dictionnaire de la langue française. With Supplement. 5 vols., 4to, bound in full cloth. New. Latest Edition. $35.00.

APPLETON. The American Cyclopædia. With Index. 17 vols. New Series. 1876-1882. 7 vols. Together 24 vols., royal 8vo, bound in ½ morocco, with corners, marbled edges. New. Latest Edition. $125.00.

JOHN DELAY, 23 Union Square,
NEW YORK.

STOCK-TAKING.

Rare and surprising bargains in books. Before taking inventory in February, we offer our entire stock of Books at vastly reduced prices. Catalogue ready.

WORTHINGTON CO.,
747 Broadway, New York.

DIAMOND HAMS
AND BREAKFAST BACON.
S. DAVIS, JR., Cincinnati.
FORTY-SIXTH YEAR.

The Centennial Commission in 1876 reported an award to these Hams. "First, the excellent flavor of the meat." "Second, its good keeping quality, demonstrated by the perfect freshness of hams cured in 1873." Sold by T. Lidgerwood, D. H. Decker & Son, Houston & Steinle, S. H. Williamson, and others.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,

27 AND 29 WEST 23D STREET, NEW YORK.

HAVE NOW READY:

I. PROBLEMS AND SOCIAL STUDIES. By Rev. R. Heber Newton, author of 'Philistinism,' 'The Use and Abuse of the Bible,' 'The Book of the Beginnings,' etc. 16mo, cloth, $1.00.

CHIEF CONTENTS.—A Bird's-Eye View of the Labor Problem.—The Story of Coöperative Production and Coöperative Credit in the United States.—The Story of Coöperative Distribution in the United States.—Is the State Just to the Workingman?—Old-Time Guilds and Modern Commercial Associations.—The Prevention of Intemperance.—Moral Education in the Public Schools.—The Free Kindergarten in Church Work.—The Religious Aspect of Socialism and Communism.

II. LE ROMANTISME FRANCAIS. A selection from writers of the French Romantic School, 1824-1848. Edited for the use of Schools and Colleges, with an introduction and notes. By Prof. Thomas F. Crane, Cornell University. Being v. ii. of "French Classics" for Students. 16mo, cloth, $1.50.

III. TABLEAUX DE LA REVOLUTION Française. Edited, with Explanatory and Critical Notes, by Profs. T. F. Crane and S. J. Brun of Cornell Univ., with Introduction by Pres. A. D. White. 400 pp., 16mo, cloth, $1.50.

IV. RAILWAY PRACTICE. Its Principles and Suggested Reforms reviewed. By E. Porter Alexander. Being vol. 36 in the series of "Questions of the Day." Octavo, cloth.....75c.

V. THE SILENT WORKMAN. A Story. 16mo, cloth, 75 cents.

"He brings to the narration an earnestness which is felt in every page, and the love-story which is involved is developed with equal strength."—Buffalo Express.

"It is short, original, and striking, and told in excellent English. Mr. Ross has genuine talent."—Boston Advertiser.

VI. RISIFI'S DAUGHTER. A Drama. By Anna Katharine Green, author of "The Defence of the Bride," 'Hand and Ring,' etc., etc. 16mo, cloth, $1.00.

"The drama is written with much power."—Boston Zion's Herald.

"It is rapid in its action, strong and powerful, and from a poetic point of view is of a high order of merit."—Buffalo Express.

VII. THE ROMANCE OF THE UNEXpected. By David Skaats Foster. 16mo, cloth, $1.25.

VIII. BALLADS OF THE REVOLUTION AND OTHER POEMS. By George Lansing Raymond, Author of 'Poetry as a Representative Art,' 'A Life in Song,' 16mo, cloth, $1.25.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED:

IX. POETRY AS A REPRESENTATIVE ART. By George Lansing Raymond. 8vo, cloth extra, $1.75.

"Its results are the most important ones yet attained in its department, and, we believe, the most valuable."—Boston Globe.

X. A LIFE IN SONG. By George Lansing Raymond. 16mo, cloth.....$1.25

"Mr. Raymond is a poet, with all that the name implies. He has the true fire—there is no disputing that."—Hartford Post.

READY NEXT WEEK:

THE STORY OF THE NORMANS. By Sarah O. Jewett. Being the twelfth volume in the "Story of the Nations" series. 12mo, fully illustrated. Cloth, extra, $1.50.

Contents.—The Dragon Ships, Rolf the Gauger, William Longsword, Richard the Fearless, Richard the Good, Robert the Magnificent, Normans in Italy, William the Conqueror, Across the Channel, The Battle of Val-es-Dunes, The Abbey of Bec, Matilda of Flanders, Harold of England, The Battle of Hastings, Kingdom and Dukedom.

"No series of the day deserves more praise than the "Story of the Nations."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

"A clear, rapid, and entertaining account of the principal nations of the ancient and modern world."—New York Tribune.

"For students, whether young or old, there are few better books than these."—Lippincott's Magazine.

AMERICAN PATRIOTISM. An Essay. By Putnam P. Bishop. 16mo, cloth, 75 cents.

Chief Contents.—Genesis and Growth, Marks of Creative Wisdom, Fruits of Patriotism, The Right of Suffrage, Vices and Difficulties, Free Partisanship, The Civil Service, The Anti-Reform Spirit, The Spoils System, The Mint System.

☞ Putnam's new Classified Catalogue sent on application.

RIDGWAY'S

Nomenclature of Colors for Naturalists,

AND

COMPENDIUM OF USEFUL KNOWLEDGE FOR ORNITHOLOGISTS.

By ROBERT RIDGWAY, Curator, Department of Birds, United States National Museum. With ten hand-colored plates and seven plates of outline illustrations. 8VO, CLOTH, $4.00.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO., Publishers, 254 Washington Street, Boston.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS. NEWS-DEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

LE FRANCAIS,

REVUE MENSUELLE DE GRAMMAIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

JEAN DE PEIFFER, Rédacteur, Principal Dep. of Languages,

New England Conservatory, Franklin Square, BOSTON, MASS.

. . . The best French periodical ever founded in this country. . . —The Nation.

D. Appleton & Co.

HAVE JUST PUBLISHED:

I.

The Geographical and Geological Distribution of Animals.

By ANGELO HEILPRIN, Professor of Invertebrate Paleontology at the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, etc. Vol. 57 of The International Scientific Series. One vol., 12mo, 435 pages. Price, $2.00.

"In the preparation of the following pages the author has had two objects in view: that of presenting to his readers such of the more significant facts connected with the past and present distribution of animal life as might lead to a proper conception of the relations of existing faunas; and, secondly, that of furnishing to the student a work of general reference, wherein the more salient features of the geography and geology of animal forms could be sought after and readily found."—From the Preface.

II.

The Rise and Early Constitution of Universities.

WITH A SURVEY OF MEDIÆVAL EDUCATION. By S. S. LAURIE, LL.D., Professor of the Institutes and History of Education in the University of Edinburgh. Vol. 3 of The International Education Series, edited by W. T. HARRIS, LL.D. 12mo, cloth. Price, $1.50.

"In the history of the rise and organization of universities, the student of education finds the most interesting and suggestive topics in the entire range of his specialty. For, in the history of the development of the higher and highest education, he sees the definite modes by which the contributions of the past to the well-being of the present have been transmitted."—From Editor's Preface.

III.

Creation or Evolution?

A PHILOSOPHICAL INQUIRY. By GEORGE TICKNOR CURTIS. One vol., 12mo, 564 pages, cloth. Price, $2.00.

"The result of my study of the hypothesis of evolution is that it is an ingenious but delusive mode of accounting for the existence of either the body or the mind of man; and that it employs a kind of reasoning which no person of sound judgment would apply to anything that might affect his welfare, his happiness, his estate, or his conduct in the practical affairs of life."—From the Preface.

IV.

The Poison Problem;

OR, THE CAUSE AND CURE OF INTEMPERANCE. By FELIX L. OSWALD, M.D., author of 'Physical Education,' 'Household Remedies,' etc. 12mo, cloth. Price, 75 cents.

V.

Social Etiquette of New York.

REWRITTEN AND ENLARGED. 18mo, cloth, gilt. Price $1.00.

This book has been entirely rewritten and considerably extended. There are several new chapters, and the subject of each chapter has been brought down to date, so as to record the latest changes in social customs.

For sale by all booksellers; or any work will be sent by the publishers, by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

1, 3, & 5 Bond Street, New York.

Scribner & Welford's
NEW BOOKS.

The Anatomy of Negation.

By EDGAR SALTUS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, $2.00.

CONTENTS: The Revolt of the Orient. The Negations of Antiquity. The Convulsions of the Church. The Dissent of the Seers. The Protests of Yesterday. A Poet's Verdict. Bibliography.

Capital.

A CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF CAPITALIST PRODUCTION.

By KARL MARX.

Translated from the Third German Edition by Samuel Moore and Edward Aveling, and edited by Frederick Engels. 2 vols., 8vo, cloth, $12.00.

THE RELIGION OF SOCIALISM; Being Essays in Modern Socialist Criticism. By Ernest Belfort Bax. 12mo, cloth, $1.80.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. Contents: Vol. I. Poems, Prose Tales, and Literary Papers. Vol. II. Translations, Prose Notices of Fine Art. Now ready, 2 vols. crown 8vo, cloth gilt, bound from the author's own design, $7.20.

THE FOLK-SONGS OF ITALY. Specimens, with Translations and Notes, from each Province, and Prefatory Treatise by Miss R. H. Busk. Crown 8vo, vellum, gilt top, $2.40.

FAMOUS FIRST REPRESENTATIONS. By H. Sutherland Edwards. Crown, 8vo, cloth, $2.40.

THE YEAR'S ART, 1887. A Concise Epitome of all Matters Relating to the Arts of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture which have occurred during the year 1886, etc. With 30 full-page illustrations. Compiled by Marcus B. Huish. Crown, 8vo, cloth, $1.25.

Whitaker's Almanack.

Containing an account of the Astronomical and other Phenomena, a large amount of information respecting the Government Finances, Population, Commerce, and General Statistics of the British Empire throughout the World, With some notice of other Countries, etc., etc.

12mo, paper, 40 cents; half roan, $1.00.

Burke's (Sir Bernard) Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, etc., for 1887,

Corrected to the latest date. Super-royal 8vo, cloth, gilt, $18.00.

"Constant reference to the pages of 'Burke' enables us to testify to its invariable accuracy."—Court Journal.

From Mozart to Mario.

By LOUIS ENGEL.

2 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, $6.00.

"No such book of musical recollections has appeared in our time."—World.

"Mr. Engel's opinions concerning his art are sound, and are expressed with an entertaining frankness, and the many anecdotes, novel and elderly, with which he enlivens his pages are always briskly told, and are often well worth telling. Mr. Engel is not above history, and is able now and then to present us with an interesting fact. . . . His book is one to be not quoted, but read."—Saturday Review.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

Containing Standard Works of European Literature in the English Language, on

History,	Theology,	Natural History,
Biography,	Antiquities,	Poetry,
Topography,	Science,	Art,
Archæology,	Philosophy	Fiction,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference, comprising in all Translations from the

French,	Spanish,	Anglo-Saxon,
German,	Scandinavian,	Latin and Greek.
Italian,

$1.40 or $2 per volume (with exceptions). Complete sets in 677 volumes. Special prices on application.

The following works are recommended to those who are forming public or private libraries. The volumes are sold separately:

ADDISON'S WORKS. 6 vols.....$1.40 each.
BACON'S ESSAYS, MORAL AND PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS. 2 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON and TOUR IN THE HEBRIDES, &c. (Napier). 6 vols. 1.40 each.
BURKE'S WORKS AND LIFE. 9 vols..... 1.40 each.
BURNS'S LIFE. By Lockhart..... 1.40 each.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols..... 1.40 each.
CHAUCER'S WORKS (Prof. Skeat). 4 vols... 1.40 each.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
DEFOE'S WORKS. 7 vols..... 1.40 each.
GIBBON'S ROMAN EMPIRE. 7 vols..... 1.40 each.
GOETHE'S WORKS. 14 vols..... 1.40 each.
GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. 5 vols..... 1.40 each.
HAZLITT'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
LAMARTINE'S WORKS. 8 vols..... 1.40 each.
LESSING'S LAOKOON, &c..... 1.40.
LESSING'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 2 vols.... 1.40 each.
MILTON'S PROSE WORKS. 5 vols..... 1.40 each.
MOLIÈRE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols... 1.40 each.
PLUTARCH'S LIVES (new translation by Long and Stewart). 4 vols..... 1.40 each.
SCHILLER'S WORKS. 6 vols..... 1.40 each.
VASARI'S LIVES OF PAINTERS (with new appendix by Dr. Richter). 6 vols.. ..... 1.40 each.
BURNEY'S (Mme. D'Arblay's) CECILIA. 2 vols 1.40 each.
BURNEY'S (Mme. D'Arblay's) EVELINA...... 1.40.
FIELDING'S NOVELS. 4 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
PETRARCH'S SONNETS...... 2.00.
MANZONI'S BETROTHED (I promessi Sposi). 2.00.
PEPYS'S DIARY. 4 vols..... 2.00 each.
KANT'S CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON ..... 2.00 each.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. 2 vols ..... 2.00 each.
HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS AND TRAVELS. 3 vols.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.
STAUNTON'S WORKS ON CHESS. 4 vols... $2.00 and 2.40 each.
GILBART ON BANKING. 2 vols..... 2.00 each.
LOWNDES'S BIBLIOGRAPHER'S MANUAL. 11 parts.....$1.40 and 2.00 each.

 The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.*

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Language and Literature.

The History of German Literature.

By Professor William Scherer. Translated under the supervision of F. Max Müller. 2 vols., 12mo, $3.50.

"We have nothing to say of Professor Scherer but what is favorable. There is certainly no other living man who possesses in an equal degree the 'combination of opposite qualities' which is desirable in an historian of German literature. He is at once a philologist of the school of Müllenhoff and a literary critic of the school of Gervinus, and has at the same time a gift of attractive popular exposition which neither of those distinguished men possessed. . . . Notwithstanding its moderate size, the work is, within its chronological limits, wonderfully complete, nearly every known German writer being noticed at greater or less length. . . . We cordially welcome the appearance of this valuable work in an English dress."—London Athenæum.

UNIFORM WITH 'THE HISTORY OF GERMAN LITERATURE.'

The German Classics.

From the Fourth to the Nineteenth Century. With Biographical Notices, Translations into Modern German, and Notes by F. Max Müller, M.A. A New Edition, revised, enlarged, and adapted to William Scherer's 'History of German Literature.' By F. Lichtenstein. 2 vols., 12mo, $6.00 net.

This is an historical reading-book, designed to accompany Professor Scherer's 'History of German Literature,' containing extracts from the principal writers of prose and poetry treated in the history. Every extract is preceded by a reference to the history, and a brief biographical article. The student of German literature is thus provided with a storehouse of literary material which is obtainable in no other compact and accessible form. The basis of the work is Professor Max Müller's book; the task of enlarging and rearranging was done by Professor Lichtenstein, assisted by Professor Scherer himself.

A History of Greek Literature.

From the Earliest Period to the Death of Demosthenes. By Frank Byron Jevons, M.A., Tutor in the University of Durham. 1 vol., crown 8vo, $2.50.

Mr. Jevons has written a very scholarly, interesting, and well-arranged history of one of the greatest—certainly the most symmetrical and complete—literary developments which the world has ever known. His account of Greek literature is at once complete and comparatively brief. It goes into detail with sufficient fulness to make the story complete; but it never loses sight of the large, commanding lines along which the mind of Greece moved, and a clear understanding of which is of the first importance to every intelligent student of general history or of universal literature.

". . . With such a book as this within reach, there is no reason why any intelligent English reader may not get a thorough and comprehensive insight into the spirit of Greek literature, of its historic development, and of its successive and chief masterpieces, which are here so finely characterized, analyzed, and criticised. The reading of a book of this kind would be one of the best possible introductions to the study of the history of English literature."—Chicago Advance.

UNIFORM WITH THE 'HISTORY OF GREEK LITERATURE.'

The History of Roman Literature.

From the Earliest Period to the Death of Marcus Aurelius. With Chronological Tables, etc., for the use of Students. By Charles T. Cruttwell, M.A. 1 vol., crown 8vo, $2.50.

"Mr. Cruttwell has given us a genuine history of Roman literature—not merely a descriptive list of authors and their productions, but a well elaborated portrayal of the successive stages in the intellectual development of the Romans, and the various forms of expression which these took in literature."—The Nation.

 For sale by all booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by*

Charles Scribner's Sons,
743-745 Broadway, New York.

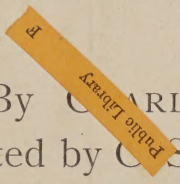
The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1126. THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

A NEW BOOK BY

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER,

With 80 Illustrations by C. S. Reinhart.



THEIR PILGRIMAGE. By CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER. Richly Illustrated by C. S. REINHART. Pp. viii, 364. 8vo, Half Leather, $2.00.

"Mr. Reinhart's spirited and realistic illustrations are very attractive, and contribute to make an unusually handsome book. We have already commented upon the earlier chapters of the text; and the happy blending of travel and fiction which we looked forward to with confidence did, in fact, distinguish this story among the serials of the year. The appearance of the complete work allows one to appreciate better the wide area and the marked diversity of scene traversed, but the justice and delicacy of Mr. Warner's observations and the lightness of his manner are as noticeable on any page as in the whole."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"Nobody will question that Mr. Warner has seen with his own eyes every landscape, every stretch of beach, every hotel piazza and dining-room, every skirt and whisker which in this book he describes. There is an intense life-likeness to it all, the figures are as real as the places: the characters are more than types; they even will recognize themselves. . . . The author's humor is a constant quality. His good-nature is contagious. His companion artist is in sympathy with him."—Literary World, Boston.

"No more entertaining travelling companions for a tour of pleasure resorts could be wished for than those who in Mr. Warner's pages chat and laugh, and skim the cream of all the enjoyment to be found from Mount Washington to the Sulphur Springs. . . . His pen-pictures of the characters typical of each resort, of the manner of life followed at each, of the humor and absurdities peculiar to Saratoga, or Newport, or Bar Harbor, as the case may be, are as good-natured as they are clever. The satire, when there is any, is of the mildest, and the general tone is that of one glad to look on the brightest side of the cheerful, pleasure-seeking world with which he mingles. . . . In Mr. Reinhart the author has an assistant who has done with his pencil almost exactly what Mr. Warner has accomplished with his pen. His drawings are spirited, catch with wonderful success the tone and costume of each place visited, and abound in good-natured fun."—Christian Union, N. Y.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

☞ The above work sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States or Canada, on receipt of the price.

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO
Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 65

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 68

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Pinkerton's Men 70
The Reorganization of the Weather Bureau 70
Mr. Edmunds's Report on the Fishery Question 71

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Laborers' Allotment Grounds 72
A Rising French Critic 73

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Sharples Portraits 74
Perversion of History 74
Legislation for the Working Classes 75
Domestic Service 75
Comparative Politics 75
Religious Statistics Once More 76
Protection against Western Wheat 76
The Derivation of Saunter 76

NOTES 77

REVIEWS:
McClellan's Own Story.—II 79
Ghibert 81
Some Recent Works on Etymology 82
The Latest Year Book 82
Thayer's Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament 83
Modern Idols 84
Raleigh 85
Introduction to a History of the Factory System 85
Essays 85
Home Life of Great Authors 85
The Electric Motor and its Applications 86

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 86

FINE ARTS:
The Salmagundi Club Exhibition 86

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.
Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

Scale of Agate lines.

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27.

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top.

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding.

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

4 to 8% INVESTMENTS Municipal BONDS

And other Securities. Call or send for Lists.

S. A. KEAN & CO., BANKERS,

UNITED BANK BUILDING,
Broadway and Wall Street, New York.
MAIN OFFICE: CHICAGO.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CALIFORNIA, San Diego, Pierce Place.

THE SOUTHWEST INSTITUTE.—Health and Education for Girls and Boys in the finest climate in the world.
Girls received into the family.
For circulars address Mrs. E. C. DERBY.
Refers by direct permission to Rt. Rev. Wm. I. Kip, D.D., Bishop of California; General Geo. Stoneman, Governor of California; General W. T. Sherman, General George Crook, U. S. A.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL — A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE.—A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls.
MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887.
Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

*THE BERLITZ SCHOOL OF LAN*guages.—Boston, 154 Tremont Street; New York, 23 W. 23d Street and 627 Madison Avenue; Brooklyn, 26 Court Street; Philadelphia, 1523 Chestnut Street; Washington, 725 14th Street, N. W.
Superior native teachers.
Conversational lessons a specialty in small classes, $10 per term; also private instruction. Trial lesson free. Terms begin any time.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

*PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI*tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY-HALL SCHOOL (50th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the Institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

*HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT AD*mits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

*ADAMS ACADEMY. — PREPARA*tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886.
For all information address WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

*GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE*paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

*HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI*tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course.
HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal.
Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D.

NEW JERSEY, Mount Holly.

BAQUET INSTITUTE FOR YOUNG Ladies.—Spring term begins February 2.
MISS HARRIET STUART BAQUET, Principal.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys.
WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. C. M. WILKINSON'S HOME School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Refers to Miss Louisa M. Alcott, Hon. John Lowell, Geo. Wm. Curtis, Esq.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PLATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill.
WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies.
Students prepared for College.
Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

Teachers.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

*JOHN W. DALZELL, PRIVATE TU*tor, 15 Appian Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

*PUPILS INSTRUCTED IN PRACTI*CAL Kindergartnering and in Quincy School methods. Address, L. E. L., care Mrs. Weil's School, 711 Madison Avenue, New York City.

School Agencies.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

SCHOOL AGENCY.—Oldest and best known in the United States. Estab'd 1855.
J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., 7 East 14th St., New York.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free.
E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

Wants.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE. — AN English journalist (of advanced views), holding a responsible engagement as Parliamentary reporter on a leading London "daily" and possessing exceptional facilities for obtaining early and authentic information on all matters, is open to accept the London agency and act as correspondent of a good American paper. Incisive, humorous, and vivacious writer. Offers and requirements, please, with copy of paper to JOHNSON,
42 Camberwell, New Road, London.

French, German, Spanish, Italian.

You can, by ten weeks' study, master either of these languages sufficiently for every-day and business conversation, by DR. RICH. S. ROSENTHAL'S celebrated MEISTERSCHAFT SYSTEM. Terms, $5.00 for books of each language, with privilege of answers to all questions, and correction of exercises. Sample copy, Part I., 25 cents. Liberal terms to Teachers.

MEISTERSCHAFT PUBLISHING CO.,
Herald Building, Boston, Mass.

F. W. CHRISTERN,

29 West Twenty-third Street, New York,
Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE COMPLETE Index.—Ten Numbers (Abbott—Vespucci) now ready. The few likely to be interested in this troublesome and expensive work may examine it in the great Libraries, Boston; Redwood, Newport; Mercantile, New York; Case, Cleveland; Michigan State, Lansing; Public, Milwaukee; Congressional, Washington; etc. Price to Subscribers, $1.50 a number; to all others, $2.00.
E. ROTH, 1135 Pine St., Philadelphia.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars.

Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

Prompt and reliable information relative to Florida and Florida Investments.

furnished by R. G. Robinson & Co., Real Estate, Loan, and General Agents, Orlando, Orange Co., Florida. Branch office, Zellwood, Fla.

7 2/3% CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures. Capital $500,000. Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets. AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

ADVANCED COURSE FOR FRENCH STUDENTS.

FRENCH EUROPEAN MAGAZINE, for school and family; 26 numbers a year, post-paid, for $1.10. Specimen number mailed to any address.
E. ROTH, 337 S. Broad St., Philadelphia.

*SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LAN*guages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

SALE OF AN OLD VIRGINIA HOME AND PLANTATION

of About 3,600 Acres of Land, by Order of the Circuit Court

OF

ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

The plantation is divided into eleven farms, ten of which contain from 150 to 250 acres each of cleared land with suitable woodland attached. On each are four (4) buildings, namely, a cottage-home of four (4) rooms, a kitchen, a meat-house; and one containing corn-house, barn, and stable. Each is divided into six (6) fields, well fenced, and with one or two exceptions all the fields of all the farms are watered by living streams. The old homestead farm of about 800 acres contains all necessary outbuildings, such as barns, stables, corn-houses, etc., quarters for laborers, bath house and dairy, a four-roomed office, and the old mansion rebuilt and added to since the war—the last two in a lawn of 8 acres. The garden of four (4) acres falls in terraces from the house to a brook that runs through a dell at the foot of a hill which is about 40 feet high, filled with shrubbery, wide, grassy roads and walks, and is altogether a fairy spot. The old mansion has a cellar under the whole, contains 8 rooms and wide halls, with closets, dressing-rooms, etc.

The lands are in the famous County of Albemarle, in the grape-growing district, of which the Monticello Wine Cellars are the centre, and are specially adapted to the culture of the other fruits, including the celebrated Albemarle pippin, and to corn, wheat, oats, tobacco, and especially to grasses. They are in the midst of a refined society, with church and school facilities, 16 miles from Charlottesville and the University of Virginia, 3 miles from Gordonsville, with a station and post-office of Chesapeake and Ohio R.R. on the plantation, 2 miles from the homestead. At this station are two residences and a country store-house (belonging to the estate), the latter of long standing and established business. These lands present a rare opportunity for investment to a capitalist desiring a delightful country home with large possessions, or to a company of settlers to divide among themselves. The railroad runs for 2¼ miles through the place.

In addition to all this, these lands lie at the base of the Southwest Range of mountains, a part of the plantation running up on Peter's Mountain, the highest peak of that range, the climate being as healthy as any in the world. Besides these advantages, there is, for 2½ miles through the plantation, a vein of hematite iron ore, accompanied by one of limestone, vertically projected, 80 ft. wide, and running parallel to the former for a distance of about 200 yds. A great bargain can be had in these lands. For further particulars, apply to JOHN M. PATTON, Commissioner of Circuit Court of Albemarle County, at Ashland, Hanover County, Virginia.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical, costing less than one cent a cup. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Eye Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

A NEW EDITION JUST READY.

THE SUN.

By C. A. YOUNG, Professor of Astronomy in the College of New Jersey.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED.

In this edition a "supplementary note" has been added, giving a brief statement of the most important developments in solar astronomy since the publication of the second edition in 1882, bringing the subject up to date as far as possible.

'THE SUN' forms No. 34 of The International Scientific Series. With a numerous illustrations. 12mo, cloth, price $2.

D. Appleton & Co.,

Publishers, 1, 3, and 5 Bond St., New York.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, NEWS-DEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

LE FRANCAIS,

REVUE MENSUELLE DE GRAMMAIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

JEAN DE PEIFFER, Rédacteur, Principal Dep. of Languages,

New England Conservatory, Franklin Square, BOSTON, MASS.

. . . The best French periodical ever founded in this country. . . .—The Nation.

To be Published February, 1887.

Catalogue XXVIII (7,000 Nos.) Theology and Philosophy.

By E. J. BRILL, Leide (Holland).

New York: G. E. STECHERT, 766 Broadway.

German Simplified.

An eminently practical new method for learning the German language. Edition for self-instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each; school edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by Prof. A. Knoflach, 140 Nassau St., New York. Prospectus free.

IS A LITTLE WONDER.

The Pocket Atlas of the World.

A comprehensive and popular series of maps, illustrating Political and Physical Geography, prepared by John Bartholomew, F.R.G.S. Beautifully printed in 32mo, cloth extra, $1.00; full leather, $1.50.

"Is a most inviting little tome, . . . legible and intelligible."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

"One of the most convenient little books ever published."—Chicago Tribune.

"A decidedly cute pocket atlas."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

"Nothing more reliable and convenient in its way has yet appeared."—Boston Globe.

"Mr. Bartholomew as a geographist is a sufficient guarantee of its accuracy as well as value."—The Churchman.

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

27 and 29 W. 23d St., New York.

JUST READY:

The Law of Contracts.

By J. I. CLARK HARE, LL.D.

One volume. 8vo. Law Sheep. 714 pages. Price, $5.00 net.

We have just issued an entirely new and very important work on this great subject by Hon. J. I. CLARK HARE, of the University of Pennsylvania. The eminent author is well known to the profession through his valuable editorial labors on the American editions of 'Smith's Leading Cases' and 'White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity,' the American notes which he prepared for these works being thorough and exhaustive and highly esteemed by legal critics. In 1851 he was elected Associate Judge of the District Court of Philadelphia, and afterwards presiding Judge in the same court. He has lectured on the subject of Contracts and Constitutional Law in the University of Pennsylvania.

The high reputation of the author, the time he has devoted to the preparation of the work, and the importance of the subject justify the publishers in the anticipation that the result is a treatise of great value to the profession and that it will have a large sale.

PUBLISHED BY

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,

254 Washington Street, Boston.

Monographs on Education.

MODERN PETROGRAPHY. An account of the Application of the Microscope to the Study of Geology. By George Huntington Williams, Johns Hopkins University. By mail, 25 cents.

THE STUDY OF LATIN IN THE PREPARATORY COURSE. By Professor Edward P. Morris, Williams College. By mail, 25 cents.

MATHEMATICAL TEACHING AND ITS MODERN METHODS. By Professor Truman Henry Safford, Williams College. By mail, 25 cents.

HOW TO TEACH READING AND WHAT TO READ IN THE SCHOOLS. By Professor G. Stanley Hall, Johns Hopkins University. By mail, 25 cents.

D. C. HEATH & CO.,

3 Tremont Place, Boston, Mass.

THE BEST MODERN ETCHINGS.

A new Illustrated and Descriptive Catalogue sent by mail on receipt of Ten Cents. FREDERICK KEPPEL & CO., London, and 23 East 16th Street (Union Square), New York.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL,

to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

EVERYTHING THAT IS

NEW IN SEEDS

RARE IN PLANTS

is offered and described in our

CATALOGUE No. 393, which this year we send out in an illuminated cover. The Catalogue is replete with new engravings of the choicest flowers and vegetables, many of which can only be obtained from us; and contains, besides, 2 beautiful colored plates, and very full instructions on all garden work. Altogether it is the best ever offered by us, and, we believe, is the most complete publication of its kind ever issued. Mailed on receipt of 10 cents (in stamps), which may be deducted from first order. Please be sure to order Catalogue by the number.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 Cortlandt St., NEW YORK.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

A Comtist Lover, and Other Studies.

By Elizabeth Rachel Chapman. Crown, 8vo. cloth, $1.50.

 "The main essays on immortality and on the Rights of Animals and the Dialogue, are all of them splendid. The clearness with which you have grasped the problems at issue, the justice you deal to your opponents, and the masterly way in which you state your own high convictions are, to my thinking, quite admirable." —Frances Power Cobbe.

The Hayward Letters.

Being a Selection from the Correspondence of the late A. Hayward, Q. C., 1834 to 1884.

With an account of his Early Life. By Henry E. Carlisle. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $7.50.

The importance and great interest of these letters cannot be better proved than by mentioning the names of some of the principal of Mr. Hayward's correspondents, viz.: Mr. Gladstone, M. Thiers, Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, Count D'Orsay, Mrs. Norton, Lady Dufferin, Lady Palmerston, M. de Remusat, Louis Blanc, Dumas, M. Mignet, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Lord Dalling, M. Montalembert, M. Merimée, Lord Lyndhurst, Mr. Lockhart, Theodore Hook, Sidney Smith, Mrs. Grote, etc.

Twenty-one Years' Work in the Holy Land.

A Record and a Summary.

June 22, 1865-June 22, 1886. Published for the Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund. In 1 vol. large crown 8vo, with 50 illustrations, $1.25.

"Likely to prove of invaluable service to all those who are interested in work in the Holy Land."—Record.

"They are invaluable labors which the society has initiated, and one can but trust that a liberal degree of public support will be assured to their continuance."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Anatomy of Negation.

By EDGAR SALTUS.

Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, $2.00.

Contents: The Revolt of the Orient. The Negations of Antiquity. The Convulsions of the Church. The Dissent of the Seers. The Protests of Yesterday. A Poet's Verdict. Bibliography.

About the Theatre: Essays and Studies.

By William Archer, author of 'English Dramatists of To-day.' Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2,50.

PREPARING FOR IMMEDIATE PUBLICATION.

Verdi: An Anecdotic History of His Life and Works.

By Arthur Pongin. With Portrait and Facsimile. Translated from the French by James E. Matthew. 1 vol., 8vo.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for international intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

CONTAINING

STANDARD WORKS of EUROPEAN LITERATURE in the ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference,

Comprising in all Translations from the French, German, Italian, Spanish, Scandinavian, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, and Greek.

687 Volumes, $1.40 or $2 each, with exceptions.

RECENT ADDITIONS.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE LATIN AND TEUTONIC NATIONS. Translated by P. A. Ashworth, Translator of Dr. Gneist's 'History of the English Constitution.'

HEINE'S TRAVEL-PICTURES: including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School. Translated by Francis Storr. With Appendices and Map.

GOETHE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH ZELTER. Selected, Translated, and Edited by A. D. Coleridge, M.A.

THE STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF HISTORICAL GEOLOGY. By A. J. Jukes-Browne, B.A., F.G.S., of the Geological Survey of England and Wales. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations.

WERNER'S TEMPLARS IN CYPRUS. Translated by E. A. M. Lewis.

"Werner was a Freemason, and his religious notions were, as the date of his writing this poem, of a theosophic order."—Preface.

PAUSANIAS'S DESCRIPTION OF GREECE. Translated into English, with Notes and Index, by A. R. Shilleto, M.A. 2 vols.

HOFFMANN'S TALES. The Serapion Brethren. First Portion, containing Thirteen Tales. Translated from the German by Major A. Ewing.

HAUFF'S TALES. The Caravan—The Sheik of Alexandria—The Inn in the Spessart. Translated by S. Mendel.

GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. A New Edition, containing pieces hitherto uncollected and a Life of the Author, with Notes from Various Sources. By J. W. M. Gibbs. 5 vols.

FOSTER'S ESSAY ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF TIME. Together with Notes of Sermons and other Pieces.

CHRISTIAN ICONOGRAPHY; or, The History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. By the late A. N. Didron. Translated from the French by E. J. Millington, and completed, with Additions and Appendices, by M. Stokes. 2 vols., with numerous Illustrations.

TALFOURD'S LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. With Explanatory Notes. New Edition, Revised and Greatly Enlarged by W. Carew Hazlitt. 2 vols.

HAZLITT'S SPIRIT OF THE AGE; or, Contemporary Portraits. New Edition. By W. C. Hazlitt.

A SELECTION.

ANTONINUS.—THE THOUGHTS OF M. AURELIUS.
BAX'S MANUAL OF THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (Centenary Edition, edited by Napier). 6 vols.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols. Translated.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols.
FAIRHOLT'S COSTUME IN ENGLAND. (Dillon.) 2 vols.
HUGO'S (VICTOR) POEMS. Translated.
MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols.
PEPYS' DIARY. 4 vols.
RICHTER'S LEVANA.
RICHTER'S FLOWER, FRUIT, AND THORN PIECES.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. Translated. 2 vols.
STAUNTON'S CHESS HANDBOOK.

 The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.*

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

NOW READY.

The Second (February) Number of

Scribner's Magazine.

25 cents a Number. $3.00 a Year.

SALES OF JANUARY NUMBER 140,000 COPIES. FIRST EDITION OF THE FEBRUARY NUMBER 125,000 COPIES.

Contents of February Number:

JULIUS CÆSAR AS PONTIFEX MAXIMUS.
FRONTISPIECE.

A striking reproduction of the noble and impressive bust in the Vatican Museum, engraved (from a photograph) by W. B. Closson.

THE LIKENESSES OF JULIUS CÆSAR
JOHN C. ROPES.

An especially interesting paper, by the well-known writer and critic in military history, on an entirely unique collection made by him during many years. Superbly illustrated with eighteen engraved reproductions of the likenesses.

THE RESIDUARY LEGATEE;
Or, THE POSTHUMOUS JEST OF THE LATE JOHN AUSTIN. Part first. THE WILL.
A Novelette. J. S. OF DALE.

HALF A CURSE.
A Story. OCTAVE THANET.

IVORY AND GOLD.
CHARLES HENRY LÜDERS.

REMINISCENCES OF THE SIEGE AND COMMUNE OF PARIS.
Second Paper. The Siege. E. B. WASHBURNE, ex-Minister to France.

SETH'S BROTHER'S WIFE.
Chapters VI-IX. HAROLD FREDERIC.

THE LAST FURROW.
CHARLES EDWIN MARKHAM.

GLIMPSES AT THE DIARIES OF GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.
Second Paper. ANNIE CARY MORRIS.

The conclusion of these invaluable contemporary pictures of Social life in Paris at the time of the Revolution, by one of the shrewdest observers of his day.

THE STORY OF A NEW YORK HOUSE.—II.
H. C. BUNNER.
Illustrated by Frost, Edwards, and Hopkinson Smith.

OUR NAVAL POLICY: A LESSON FROM 1861.
JAMES RUSSELL SOLEY, U. S. Navy.

THE DUCHARMES OF THE BASKATONGE.
A Story. DUNCAN CAMPBELL SCOTT.

AFTER DEATH.
LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

M. COQUELIN.
BRANDER MATTHEWS.

RUSSIAN NOVELS.
THOMAS SERGEANT PERRY.

FOR SALE BY ALL NEWSDEALERS.

Subscribe from the First (January) Number.

 Remittance should be sent by post money order or registered letter to*

Charles Scribner's Sons,
PUBLISHERS,
743-745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1887.

The Week.

BOTH houses of Congress have passed the Electoral Count Bill, and it only needs the President's signature to become a law. Happily there is thought to be no doubt of the President's approval. The bill passed so quietly at last, through both houses, that it is difficult to realize why it should not have become a law years ago. It removes all doubt and confusion about the counting of the Presidential vote in Congress, and thus eliminates from our quadrennial contests one of the most disturbing elements which have ever been connected with them. This and the Presidential succession law of the last session are most important achievements. If they could be supplemented now with a constitutional amendment increasing the Presidential term to six years, we should advance still further on the way to stability and freedom (for at least part of the time) from political excitement and partisan plotting.

The addition of an article to the Hawaiian treaty, by virtue of which Pearl River Harbor, the finest roadstead in the Pacific Ocean, is ceded to us, may be a wise provision for us if the Hawaiian Government are willing to agree to it. But we cannot think this at all likely. We rather incline to the opinion of the California Senators that the adoption of this article, if insisted upon by us, will cause the rejection of the whole treaty, since the cession of Pearl River Harbor is virtually the annexation of the country to the United States without any corresponding responsibility on our part for governing and defending it.

It would puzzle a professor of political science a good deal to explain to his class the moral of the late Senatorial struggle at Albany. Mr. Morton was heavily weighted, in the eyes even of those who thought most highly of his claims to the place, by the character of his chief workers. The mere activity of Platt and Erwin in his behalf gave strength to the reports that his money was being freely used in support of his candidacy, and helped to conceal or minimize the weight of his personal character and the efficiency with which he has filled other positions in the public service. Mr. Miller was his own chief worker, and consequently his ways were less known to the general public, but the sudden adhesion to his cause of the Hon. James W. Husted at the eleventh hour sent a pang through the ranks of those who had been persuading themselves that virtue was on the Miller side. It was evident, too, long before the contest closed, that the Miller machinery was far the more complicated of the two, and that it was connected by a great deal of belting with national politics. It is almost certain, the professor might say, that some good cause has gained through the failure of the Miller-Husted combination, but what cause it is, he would add, heaven only knows.

The contest has not, we regret to say, strengthened the influence of journalism. The powerful and pertinacious support given to Mr. Conkling by the World did not secure for that gentleman a single vote, or, indeed, the mention of his name. The Times began well with pushing Hiscock, but in a moment of weariness abandoned him for Miller, whom it supported with its usual enthusiasm, with occasional exposures of Morton's villany, until Miller was defeated with Morton's aid. But Mr. Hiscock's success, on the whole, pleases everybody except Mr. Miller. It pleases Mr. Morton, because it was due to his following, and contents the public generally, because there is no question that Mr. Hiscock is a Senatorial man, fit to represent the State. The queer, roundabout way in which he has reached the place, is a curious illustration of the confusion which pervades our State politics. He will now have to be as ungrateful as possible to Platt and Erwin if he wishes to keep his good name.

When the question of reëlecting Senator Dawes of Massachusetts was first raised, outsiders sympathized with the opposition to giving him another term. In his prime Mr. Dawes was never a man of the traditional standard for Senator in Massachusetts, and age has not made him wiser or broader. If the issue had been between his reëlection and the choice in his place of a man like ex-Gov. Robinson, the movement for a change would have commanded the approbation of the country. But, as the contest developed, it became evident that the defeat of Mr. Dawes would mean the establishment of a political machine of the worst type, managed by a little clique of intriguers, with Henry Cabot Lodge at its head, and that the election of Congressman Long, a "genial," weak-kneed politician, whom this ring had taken up as the anti-Dawes candidate, would only signify the submission of the party to an odious sort of bossism. For some time past, therefore, friends of honest politics have desired the defeat of the stalking-horse for this machine, and, on Mr. Robinson's refusal to become a candidate, the reëlection of Mr. Dawes becomes a cause for congratulation. Various motives are assigned for the turning over of the Democratic votes to the Senator, which decided the contest. While some of the minority may have adopted this course in the hope of promoting factional strife among the Republicans, it is probable that the controlling reason with most of them was the belief that the reëlection of Mr. Dawes would be the best thing for the State.

The Mexican war is now nearly forty years in the past, and it would be natural to suppose that a proposition to pension every man who served sixty days in that war, or the surviving widow of such a man, could not long affect the pension rolls. Yet, if precedents are of any value, it is not unreasonable to suppose that beneficiaries of the law which Congress passes in 1887 will be enjoying their allowances as far in the future as the middle of the twentieth century. The last report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows that there are yet on the rolls 1,539 survivors of the war of 1812 and 13,397 widows of such soldiers. Nor is the war of 1812 the earliest in our history which has a place in the current pension business. The Revolution ended in 1783, but there is still living in the town of Northwood, N. H., in her ninety-sixth year, a woman who in her early life married Capt. Benjamin Stevens, a Revolutionary soldier, who participated in the battle of Bennington, and as his widow she draws a pension of $16 a month. The fancy of young women for marrying the aged veterans of a bygone war, with an eye oftentimes to the pension which awaits a soon inevitable widowhood, appears to be as strong nowadays as in the early part of the century, and consequently it is quite within the range of possibility that 1950 may find the nation still paying pensions on account of the war of 1847.

The First Comptroller of the Treasury has just overruled the decision of his immediate predecessor, that the compensation of Congressmen could not be withheld to meet their liabilities to the United States. The law of 1828 (section 1766 of the Revised Statutes) in very strong and sweeping terms declares that "no money shall be paid to any person for his compensation who is in arrears to the United States, until he has accounted for and paid into the Treasury all sums for which he may be liable." But, notwithstanding this plain provision, when the celebrated "Colonel" Tom Ochiltree, who, as Marshal of the Eastern District of Texas, owed the United States about $7,000, appeared, as a Representative in Congress, before the late Comptroller, with "an able and elaborate argument," and protested against the setting aside of his Congressional salary for the extinguishment of this debt, it was held that the statute did not apply to such a case The reason given for this decision was that section 6 of the first article of the Constitution in imperative language declared that "The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States." It would appear from the published decision of the late Comptroller (iv. Lawrence, 102) that this language was so mandatory that a member of Congress himself could not, without violating the law of the land, refuse to accept the compensation provided for him. Mr. Durham seems to take the more sensible view that it simply required the legislative branch to provide salaries for "the Senators and Representatives," but that it by no means put it out of the power of the Government to withhold their compensation to balance their indebtedness on the books of the Treasury.

All good citizens will rejoice that a mandamus has been granted by the United States District Court, directing the French line of steamers to receive freight from the Old Dominion Steamship Company. We believe several of these foreign steamship companies have deliberately concluded that they would make more, or rather lose less, money by disregarding their legal and moral obligations as common carriers than by opposing the boycott set on foot by the strikers against the Old Dominion Steamship Company, as long as they had nothing to fear beyond an action for damages. A mandamus, however, carries with it the penalty of imprisonment for contempt in case of disobedience, and the prospect of a jail often has a wonderfully clarifying effect on the brain on the subject of rights and duties. In case Judge Shipman has to award this penalty, we trust he will be liberal in fixing the amount, so as to remind these great carriers of what they owe to the community. The companies which are helping to boycott the Old Dominion Company by refusing to perform their own duty, have no excuse except that they are afraid that, if they did their duty, they might suffer some loss. This reminds one of the preparations the Manhattan Railroad Company made last year to stop running trains on the Ninth and Second Avenue lines, through fear that the engineers on the other lines were going to strike. It would be useless to preach duty and moderation to the poor strikers if great corporations were to be allowed to behave in this way. So we trust the courts will show these foreign companies that if they start in business as common carriers at this port, a common carrier's business they must do, for better or worse, as long as their sign is up, or else allow their managers to be locked up for meditation in the sweet retirement of Ludlow Street Jail.

The end of the strike at the Lorillard tobacco factory would be amusing if it did not cover so much misery and humbug The strikers—or at least those of them whose places have not been filled—are going back to work, and we are told that no statement of the grievances which caused them to strike has ever been submitted to the firm. The probabilities are that, as in the case of the 'longshoremen, the great bulk of them did not know why they struck. This often happens nowadays. The strikes are ordered by Walking Delegates, nominally in the interest of an abstraction called "Labor," but really in order to show something for their salaries. This is one of the great defects of all the existing labor organizations except the locomotive engineers. In nearly all the other trades the Oral Laborers, who manage them, think their value to the organizations depends, or will be thought to depend, on the amount of disturbance between employer and employed which they are able to create in the course of the year. Until this is rectified, either by the growth of intelligence among the rank and file, or the selection of a better grade of men for the leadership, Labor will, we fear, make little progress towards a happier life.

The statement which Archbishop Corrigan has made of the McGlynn case leaves nothing more to be said on either side. No man can read it and not be convinced that Dr. McGlynn has been treated with great forbearance and kindness, and that he fully deserves the discipline to which he has been subjected. His letters are more than justification for the suspension which the Church authorities have ordered. Take, for example, these passages from the one which he wrote to the Archbishop on December 20 last:

"My doctrine about land has been made clear in speeches, in reported interviews, and in published articles, and I repeat it here I have taught, and I shall continue to teach, in speeches and writings, as long as I live, that land is rightfully the property of the people in common, and that private ownership of land is against natural justice, no matter by what civil or ecclesiastical laws it may be sanctioned; and I would bring about instantly, if I could, such change of laws all the world over as would confiscate private property in land, without one penny of compensation to the miscalled owners."

That doctrine is not only sufficient to exclude any man professing it from the Catholic Church, but from all churches, or even from preaching morals or ethics. It is the rankest socialism, and any church which permitted its clergy to preach it would be giving its sanction to anarchy. That the Archbishop, after receiving this letter, should have continued to treat Dr. McGlynn leniently, is the strongest possible evidence of his forbearance.

We are glad to say that Mr. Reilly's bill making September 1 a legal holiday, to be called "Labor Day," has passed the Senate of New York. As this is one of the steps towards the solution of the labor problem recommended by Gov. Hill, we trust the bill will be promptly passed by the House. When it becomes a law, all we shall have to do is to wait with hopefulness for the arrival of the day, and see what happens. We must repeat, however, that we think the name given to the day is a mistake. To call it a "Labor Day," when it is to be devoted to idleness, is surely an abuse of language. There ought to be inserted in the bill some recommendation as to the manner in which we should pass the day, like that which the President and Governor put in their proclamations about Thanksgiving and Fast Days. The most fruitful way of passing it would seem to be in meditating on Labor. If meditation on Labor in general should seem too vague or monotonous, we might devote a certain fixed portion of the day to meditation on a different class of Labor; for instance, from eight A. M. to ten A. M., on plumbers; from ten to twelve, on coal-heavers; from twelve to two on 'longshoremen; and from two to four on Walking Delegates, and so on.

Pinkerton's Men have begun to attract the attention of the labor demagogues in the State Legislatures. The Senate in this State has passed a resolution requesting the District Attorney to find out "by what authority persons other than police officers and the National and State militia carry or are permitted to carry arms in the city and county of New York, with a reference to the law, statute or otherwise, bearing on the subject, and what, if any, legislation is necessary to prevent or prohibit the carrying of arms by such persons." We presume the carrying of arms, provided they are not concealed, on a man's own premises, or on the premises of his employer, at the employer's request when in reasonable apprehension of danger to life or property, is a common-law right. It is in fact the right of self-defence, of which no citizen can be deprived. The New Jersey Assembly has introduced a bill prohibiting mayors and sheriffs from employing as special policemen persons who have not lived in the State continuously for three years at least, or in the county where called on for one year. Pinkerton, by the way, has no prejudices. He would as soon hire Jerseymen as any others. Another bill prohibits the employment of Pinkerton's Men as deputy sheriffs, policemen, or constables. This is all very well, but it ought also to provide some stringent penalty for the failure or refusal of local authorities to furnish police protection to persons calling for the same when menaced by mob violence and their business interfered with. In the meantime no power can prevent Pinkerton's doing a good business in furnishing a private force for the defence of houses, stores, factories, yards, wharves, and other private premises against Labor until the public get tired of the prevailing lawlessness.

The Louisville Courier-Journal falls foul of a statement of fact made by the Nation recently, that the United States Treasury, in making its payments, allows the holder of the warrants drawn upon it to take whatever kind of money he pleases, gold, silver, or greenbacks. It says:

"These sweeping assertions are misrepresentations of the practice of the Treasury, except as to bondholders, Government officials at Washington, and members of Congress. It is and has been the rule to pay these classes of creditors in gold and greenbacks, or bank checks; but, as to all other claimants, the Treasury exercises the option of all other payers, and uses either form of legal-tender currency, gold, silver, or greenbacks, which may best suit its convenience."

Turning to the list of public payments other than those to "bondholders, Government officials at Washington, and members of Congress," which, according to the Courier-Journal, belong to the privileged class of creditors, the largest item we find is that of pensions, $68,000,000. The pensioners, we are to understand, are treated differently from the bondholders, being put off with anything that comes handy, while the gold in the Treasury is carefully reserved for the privileged few. Then come the foreign ministers and consuls. One would expect to find them among the pampered classes, rioting in gold; but no—according to our learned contemporary, they are treated no better than the pensioners, having silver or greenbacks or anything else shovelled out to them haphazard. Next come the judges of the courts, the marshals and district attorneys, Governors of Territories, land officers, Indian agents, etc., all humiliated and discriminated against in the treatment they receive at the Treasury. The army and navy fare no better. We should expect the Government contractors to be in the best position of all, or no way behind the bondholders in getting the choicest places at the pay table. Far from it. They have to take anything that is left after the bondholders and the Washington aristocrats are served. We wonder that Senator Beck has not denounced this unseemly practice of discrimination. Perhaps it is because he is himself one of the beneficiaries of it, drawing his salary in gold, while the poor postmasters and gaugers of distilled spirits in Bourbon County are compelled to take the very leavings and offscourings of the public till.

They were having a good time in northern Alabama last week putting up the price of iron, organizing new companies, erecting new furnaces, issuing stock, and "booming" generally, when suddenly, as the Philadelphia Press correspondent tells us, "a shadow was thrown across the jubilation by the announcement that the Roone Iron Company of Chattanooga had just closed a contract for the purchase of 40,000 tons of English pig-iron for the manufacture of steel rails." This unaccountable mishap has, according to the same authority, led to a great revival of protectionist sentiment in that region, looking to an increase of the duty on pig-iron, which stands at the beggarly sum of six dollars per ton, or not much above 50 per cent. ad valorem. What view the Roone Iron Company, the real culprits, take of the agitation, we are not informed. They might say that they wanted the iron to make rails with American labor, and could not get it anywhere else. They might plead that their own customers could not wait for the pig to be made in this country. They might say to the "boomers" in iron mines and stocks that the ore and coal of northern Alabama would keep, and would come into use fast enough for the advantage of the American people under a duty of $6 per ton. They might put in a variety of special pleas, but everybody would be able to see that they were only clever devices for cheating American labor. The only sure way to avoid such scandals is to bring the iron-makers together in a room, and make them take a solemn oath not to charge more than the foreign price for iron, plus duty, freight, etc., and put up a pecuniary forfeit for any violation of the agreement. On such conditions, and on the further condition that they can make all the pig metal wanted, they might confidently appeal to the Roone Iron Company not to bring reproach upon the country by buying English pig.

The Rev. Dr. Hall of this city, speaking last week to the Brooklyn Young Men's Christian Association on "Moral Risks and the Insurance against Them," made one assertion which we think he would himself admit requires a great deal of qualification. He said:

"People cry out against the degraded moral tone of the newspapers, but I tell you that we, the readers of the papers, are responsible for that degradation. The readers demand a certain style of literature, and it is furnished in an honest endeavor to satisfy the paper's constituency."

Now this very excuse might be made for all vendors of obscene literature. Such literature would not be produced if there were not a certain demand for it; but when Anthony Comstock catches one of these vendors, and brings him into court, he is not allowed to plead in extenuation of his offence that he found a good market for his wares. It might, too, with one or two trifling alterations, be made to cover the case of keepers of brothels and gambling hells and liquor-saloons. If the law allowed these establishments to be multiplied in proportion to the demand for them, they would swarm in this city beyond endurance. One of the great, if not the greatest, objections to indecent and immoral literature is that it has a constant tendency to enlarge its own market—that is, to foster and spread with great rapidity the tastes to which it appeals for support. When a scoundrel gets hold of a school catalogue, and sends his filthy books and pictures to the pupils, it is not because there exists there already what the economists call an effective demand for them. It is because he expects that the sight of them will create an appetite for them which will procure him further orders.

The application of all this to newspapers is very simple. That there is a public which likes to have sensational, trivial, and indecent gossip supplied to it as "news of the day" there is no doubt. But newspaper editors have it in their power to foster this taste or to foster better ones, just as they please. In fact, every newspaper conducted with ability in greater or less degree makes its own market. All the newspapers acknowledge this in their annual prospectuses. Not one of them admits that it appeals for support to the silly, or vicious, or trifling, or ignorant portion of the community. No publisher would deliberately take refuge under Dr. Hall's plea, and claim that he was under compulsion of any kind to make an indecent or puerile or sensational newspaper. Every one of them pretends, with more or less assurance, that his influence on society is on the whole an elevating and purifying one, and makes for morality and social order, and that his journal is just the thing for "family reading." Under these circumstances it is rather hard for that portion of the public which is protesting against the recent tendency to care more for the vicious and prurient or trivial than for the serious things of life, and which has apparently produced some effect, to find a man in Dr. Hall's position helping to relieve the newspapers of their responsibility, and put it on the shoulders of the general public, which has already all it can bear. There is no arrangement which all kinds of dealers in bad literature would like better, because half the dirt is in appearance taken out of a dirty calling by finding that you can both make money in it and escape censure.

There is said to be a movement on foot in Chicago for the restoration of knee-breeches, and a number of men are exchanging pledges to wear them. Whether such a movement can succeed is doubtful, but there is no question that the opinion is spreading through the civilized world that the introduction of trousers at the beginning of the present century was a mistake, and that the advantages they were at first supposed to possess over knee-breeches have proved illusory. These advantages were the saving of trouble in the matter of buttoning at the knee, and the deliverance from criticism of persons with ill-made legs, or, in other words, the diffusion of equality in the matter of legs. The trousers have, however, revealed another sort of inequality still more odious—inequality in wealth. No article of clothing more distinctly reveals the condition of a man's purse than the trousers. The fraying at the lower edge of the leg, which is sure to come with much wear, is generally taken as a sign of very narrow means, and the bagging at the knee, which is also inevitable, besides producing a foundered appearance, like that of a horse which is "gone" in the forelegs, is a sign that a man has only one or two pairs. It is assumed by the world generally that nobody would wear trousers bagged at the knee, with all the term implies, if he could afford the number of changes necessary to prevent this phenomenon. In fact, almost the only marked difference remaining in our day between the clothes of a man of fortune and leisure and those of a toiler of moderate means, lies in the straightness and smoothness which marks the trousers-legs of the former. His wardrobe always contains a great many pairs. At any theatre, too, the make-up of a poor teacher or literary man, or poor devil of any kind, includes invariably a pair of baggy trousers. And though last not least, the condition of the trousers in muddy weather is something which it is painful to dwell on. The conversion of an inch or two of the bottom into a wet and filthy band is only preventable by turning them up, and we all know how this looks. An effort has recently been made to meet the struggles of men of few trousers to escape the bagging at the knee, by an invention of a machine called "the trousers stretcher," which is literally a metal rack on which offending trousers are stretched over night, and the deformity effaced by a powerful tension in the direction of their length. But neither nickel-plating nor any other ornamentation will ever render this device a grateful one to refined and self-respecting men.

It may therefore be said that on the whole the knee-breeches were the more democratic of the two. They undergo no degeneration in wear, except what comes from the actual destruction of the cloth. They reveal nothing as to the condition of a man's wardrobe until they reach their last stage. They always look neat and tidy, and do not come in contact with the mud, leaving that to be encountered by a boot or stocking which can be readily changed. But they are in summer a hot garment, owing to their fitting so closely round the knee—a defect, however, which is perhaps compensated by the possibility, without damage to appearance, of making them very loose. They are, too, now making a gallant effort to regain their old supremacy and oust the trousers. They have made conquests of most of the sporting men and athletes, and have made considerable gains in the Continental armies. The Turks, who abandoned them under Mahmoud the reformer, for the (on them) hideous Frankish trousers, have gone back to the breeches. Some faint attempts have been made to introduce them again into evening dress, but these have failed, owing in part to the light and frivolous character of those who have made them. If undertaken in a serious spirit by any of the crowned heads, or by great warriors and statesmen, or in this country by great railroad men or stock operators, the enterprise would probably succeed.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, January 19, to TUESDAY, January 25, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE Senate on Thursday finally passed the Electoral Count Bill, which will become a law on receiving the President's signature.

The Senate on Thursday ratified the new treaty with the Hawaiian Government with hardly a dissenting vote. Twelve only of the Senators were opposed to the treaty, and they did not demand a division on the final vote. The treaty extends for seven years the commercial relations of the United States with the islands as they now exist, and continues them indefinitely until either one of the contracting parties gives one year's notice of a desire to abrogate the instrument. A very important amendment has been made to the treaty by the Senate, and, until it is approved by the President and the Hawaiian Government, ratifications cannot be exchanged. The amendment cedes to the United States Pearl River Harbor as a coaling and naval station. Should the President and the Hawaiian Government consent to this amendment, the United States will have secured a firm lodgment in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. Edmunds, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported to the Senate on Wednesday a bill to authorize the President of the United States to protect and defend the rights of American fishing vessels, American fishermen, American trading and other vessels, in certain cases, and for other purposes. The Senate on Monday afternoon took up the bill. Mr. Frye (Rep., Me.) supported it. He said that the difficulties between the United States and Canada upon the fisheries subject would be immediately settled if the President, under the second section of this bill, should forbid the importation of Canadian fish into the United States. Referring to the passage of the new Seizure Law by the Dominion of Canada and its approval by the Queen, after the British Foreign Office knew the details of the outrages upon fishermen as communicated to it by the State Department, he said: "That is the law passed by the Dominion of Canada, and approved by the Queen, and, if allowed to go into effect, how can it help bringing on war?" The Senate, with only the vote of Mr. Riddleberger in the negative, passed the bill on Monday.

The House on Wednesday finally shelved the Blair Educational Bill, by laying on the table a motion to reconsider the vote by which it refused to table the resolution to set apart a day for consideration.

The House on Friday passed the Inter-State Commerce Bill finally by 219 to 41. It was passed by the Senate 43 to 15. It now goes to the President. The House also adopted the conference report on the bill for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians.

The protection Democrats of the House completed consideration on Monday night of their bill to reduce the surplus revenue. The bill repeals the tax on tobacco and weiss beer, and the license tax on dealers in whiskey. The question whether the tax on alcohol used in the arts should be removed, or the tax on whiskey should be reduced, is left to be decided by the House. The provisions of the Randall bill which increased the duties in certain cases, are stricken out. The free list of the Randall bill has also been increased. Lumber, goat's hair, fur used in making hats, jute, and jute butts are among the articles placed on the free list. The duty on steel rails is reduced to $13. The principal features of the Hewitt Customs Administrative Bill are incorporated in the new bill, together with some additions suggested by the Treasury Department. What is known as the "warehouse" section of the Hewitt bill, however, is eliminated. It is expected that the customs sections of the bill will effect a reduction of $10,000,000, and that the total reduction of revenue made by the bill will be from $55,000,000 to $60,000,000.

The Massachusetts Legislature in joint session on Wednesday reëlected Mr. Dawes to the United States Senate, about 80 of the Democrats joining with the Dawes Republicans, giving him 181 votes to 57 for Robinson, and 26 for Long.

The Wisconsin Republican legislative caucus on Thursday night unanimously renominated Philetus Sawyer for United States Senator. The Democrats nominated ex-Congressman John Winans. Senator Sawyer will be elected, the Republican majority being thirty-seven. After an all-night session the Nebraska Republicans in a full legislative caucus nominated A. S. Paddock for United States Senator to succeed C. H. Van Wyck. This ended the contest, and Mr. Paddock was elected at the joint session. He was previously a United States Senator from Nebraska from 1875 to 1881.

The long-term Senatorship question in Tennessee was settled on Monday night in the Democratic caucus by the nomination of ex-Gov. W. B. Bate. He was elected on Tuesday.

In the Republican caucus at Albany on Wednesday night the first ballot showed no change. After the twelfth ballot Mr. Erwin withdrew the name of Mr. Morton, and on the next ballot the Morton vote went over to Hiscock. Then Frost and Horton of Chautauqua and Taylor of Chenango went from Miller to Hiscock, and the latter was nominated by a vote of fifty to forty-three. The joint convention of the Legislature on Thursday formally elected Mr. Hiscock Senator. Mr. Hiscock has been a representative in Congress for the Syracuse district for ten years, and has a good record.

The New York Senate passed on Monday night a resolution calling on the District Attorney of this city to report by what authority persons other than police officers and the national and State military carry, or are permitted to carry, arms in the city, with a reference to the law, statute or otherwise, bearing on the subject, and what, if any, legislation is necessary to prevent or prohibit the carrying of arms by such persons. This refers to Pinkerton's men.

The North Carolina House of Representatives passed on Wednesday, by a vote of 54 to 52, a resolution declaring that "the efforts of President Cleveland to elevate and purify the public service of the United States meet with the hearty approbation of this General Assembly."

The Rev. Dr. McGlynn makes the public announcement, through his physician, Dr. George F. Shrady, that he has been prevented by his physical condition from obeying the summons to go to Rome.

The annual report of President Eliot of Harvard predicts great good from the system of voluntary religious services. The new system of requirements of admission which has been in use for the past two years, President Eliot argues, will have a most beneficial effect upon the preparatory schools, enabling them to widen the scope of their teaching. The new requirements are also expected to assist in bringing down the average age of admission to eighteen or thereabout. At present about two-fifths of the Freshmen are over nineteen at entrance. The attitude of the College towards foot-ball is left an open question. The Treasurer's report shows that the invested funds of the University amount to $5,190,772.35, an increase over the previous year of about $270,000. This amount produced last year a revenue of $260,303.01. The total income of the year was $688,218.56, and the total expenses $626,899.80.

Gen. Charles P. Stone, known from his military services in Egypt as Stone Pasha, died on Monday afternoon in this city. He was born in Massachusetts on September 30, 1824, and was graduated from West Point in 1845. After serving with credit in the Mexican war he resigned from the army and settled in California. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was in Washington, and was, it is said, the first volunteer officer sworn into the Union service. He held the rank of colonel and brigadier-general. After the fight at Ball's Bluff he was court-martialled, and was imprisoned for nearly a year in Fort Lafayette. He asserted that he was treated very unfairly. Being released in August, 1862, he rejoined the army, serving in the Department of the Gulf, and then commanding a brigade in the Army of the Potomac. In 1870 Gen. Stone accepted a flattering offer from the Khedive of Egypt to enter his military service, and his work in reorganizing the Egyptian Army was everywhere commended by military critics in the highest terms. He remained in the Khedive's service until 1883. As engineer and director of the pedestal for the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty on Bedloe's Island, Gen. Stone's name again became familiar.

FOREIGN.

The principal German parties have issued election addresses. The Progressists call upon their partisans to support only candidates opposed to absolute government and a sham Constitution, warning them that otherwise tobacco and spirit monopolies and other evils will be introduced in Parliament. "We must make a stand," they say, "to maintain the foundation of the Imperial Constitution, especially universal secret suffrage." The Conservative manifesto says the watchword of the struggle must be "No parliamentary army, but an imperial army." The National Liberal leaders severely censure the action of the majority of the Reichstag, and call upon National Liberals to elect only men determined to make sacrifices for the security of the empire against foes at home and abroad.

The new German Liberals of the Second Berlin District met on Saturday for the purpose of deciding on their action in the coming election for member of the Reichstag. Three thousand electors attended. It was resolved to support Prof. Virchow against Gen. von Moltke as their candidate. Herr Richter, in a speech advocating this policy, said he admitted that the personal merits of Gen. von Moltke were supereminent, but contended that it was not the duty of the electors to provide that the military interests of the empire should be strongly represented in the Reichstag, but rather to elect to that body those who could and would defend the civil interests of the people, to the end that there might be a proper equalization of the civil and military claims put forth. The views of eminent civilians should be recognized in opposition to the one-sided military view.

The Prussian budget was on Friday presented to the Lower House of the Diet. It shows that the trade of Prussia has improved, decreasing the deficiency in the revenues. The railway receipts for the fiscal year ending in 1887 will exceed expenses by the sum of 20,000,000 marks. The receipts from the income tax will be larger than they have heretofore been, proving that the prosperity of the urban population has much increased. The statistics show that the population in the rural districts has lessened.

Prince Bismarck made a long speech on Monday in the Lower House of the Prussian Diet, in the course of which he referred to the recent rejection of the Army Bill by the Reichstag. He said: "The main duty attached to the rights of the Emperor is the protection of the empire. This duty is also placed in the hands of the Emperor by the Constitution, and is not placed in the hands either of any Parliamentary majority or of party leaders. A portion of the press, commenting on the rejection of the Army Bill, represent it as absolutely immaterial whether the measure were accepted for three or for seven years. But the reasons alleged for acceptance for three years were unacceptable in themselves; and besides it was impossible to permit the Reichstag arbitrarily to interfere with the ordering of the military affairs of the empire. In view of Article 60 of the Constitution, which provides that an effective army shall be given the empire by law, the ordinary mode of granting it must be regarded as abolished, otherwise it would have been stated that the grant of an effective army should be renewed periodically or provided for in each budget. The Government, therefore, would be fully entitled to demand the fixing of an effective army in perpetuity; but the Government, wishing for progressive development in these matters, had agreed to accept a compromise for seven years, which, having been twice renewed, the right of custom had been established with regard to the septennate period. . . . I regard the final objects of the Progressist party as anti-monarchical and crypto-republican. I need not defend myself against the reproach of wishing to introduce absolutism in Prussia and Germany. I am far from deprecating the Guelphs' loyalty to their King. I have only attacked their system of professing such sentiments to mask other objects."

The German Army possesses a new explosive, called roburite. It is reported to be stronger than mélinite. The method of manufacture is a secret. It is exploded by intense heat.

The war rumors thickened on Monday, and there was a semi-panic on the London Stock Exchange. On the Paris Bourse there was also a sharp decline. It was asserted in Paris that Gen. Boulanger had ordered the commanders of all French fortresses to be at their posts before February 20. The British Foreign Office, late on Monday, denied officially that it had warlike advices. Boulanger also denied that he had moved any troops towards the frontier.

The French papers of all parties join in accusing the English press of inventing and circulating bellicose canards. The French journalists assert that English newspaper men engage in this alleged work from pecuniary motives, being interested in influencing the stock markets.

The Budget Committee of the Chamber of Deputies on Friday, by a vote of 18 to 6, rejected the amended budget presented by M. Dauphin, Minister of Finance, providing for an issue of bonds to the amount of 375,000,000 francs, redeemable in sixty-six years, to meet the temporary needs of the Government. M. Dauphin, consequently, was expected to resign. Contrary to expectation, the Cabinet on Saturday decided to withdraw the supplemental budget and accepted the Committee's proposals, including that for an issue of sexennial treasury bonds to cover the present deficit. This, it is believed, has averted the Cabinet crisis.

The French agent in Madagascar telegraphs that his relations with the Hovas are excellent, and that a settlement of the disputes between France and Madagascar will soon be effected.

Claude Ferdinand Gaillard, the distinguished French painter and engraver, is dead in his fifty-third year. M. Gaillard carried off the Prix de Rome for engraving in 1856, and is the author of many important plates, including portraits and reproductions of the works of old and modern masters. His paintings embrace portraits, Biblical subjects, and copies of old masters.

M. Zankoff recently submitted to the Grand Vizier at Constantinople the following proposals for the settlement of the Bulgarian difficulty: "That the Regency be dismissed and a new Ministry be formed, the foreign and interior portfolios to be given to Zankoffists, and the war portfolio to Gen. Kaulbars; that a new Sobranye be elected; that the Constitution be modified, and that the Prince of Mingrelia be elected to the vacant throne." The Grand Vizier replied that the Porte could not accept these proposals.

Although the Bulgarian situation has improved, the military preparations of the Austro-Hungarian Government continue unabated. In the event of mobilization three great armies will be formed, each corps having no less than 250,000 men. Commanders for these corps have already been designated. It is believed that these gigantic preparations have been undertaken, less from fear of war with Russia concerning Bulgaria than with a view to the contingency of war between France and Germany, which would cause additional Eastern complications. Rules governing the Landsturm which have just been published show that nothing except blindness, deafness, dumbness, and lameness will exempt men from service, and that drafts from the Landsturm will be used to fill up the gaps in the regular army and navy reserves. It is estimated that the Landsturm would supply a million additional men to the army.

Frederick Amerling, the Austrian painter, who died recently, bequeathed to the city of Vienna his collection of art antiques, valued at $125,000, on condition that it be kept intact for public inspection.

At a protracted British Cabinet council on Wednesday it was determined to press on the new Coercion Bill as soon as possible. Fear was generally expressed that it could not be carried without previous changes in the rules of procedure; therefore the Government will probably introduce a procedure bill first and a coercion bill afterwards. The impression is spreading throughout the country that the coercion proposals will have the effect immediately of expelling the Government from office.

At a meeting in Liverpool on Friday evening, Mr. Goschen denied that the separatists had the verdict of America and the whole civilized world at their backs, because many intelligent Americans had told him that they perfectly understood the cause the Unionists were defending. He set more value upon the American example in the quarrel between the North and the South than upon any resolutions cabled from Chicago.

In the course of a letter to an American friend Mr. Joseph Chamberlain says: "I cannot quite remember how the American comparison originated in our conversation, but I think I was pointing out to you that the cardinal distinctions between Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy and mine were very great; that in fact he sought to give national home rule, while I was not prepared to go further than what I may call provincial home rule, similar in character, though not in all its details, to the home rule of the United States or the provinces of the Canadian Dominion. In the course of the controversy Irishmen have frequently appealed to those precedents as justifying their demands, but of course the real fact is that a State of the American Union or a province of Canada has not, and never has had, any pretensions to the right of a separate nation; and the moment this view of national right seriously entered the minds of the citizens of the Southern States, secession and civil war were the natural results. I think that if our American friends understood this and worked it out, they would cease to be so seriously sympathetic with our Irish secessionists."

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chief Secretary for Ireland, has been invited by a number of Irish members of Parliament to visit Glenbeigh and see what cruelty the Government permits in evictions. Even the Tories in England are becoming disgusted with the evictions.

The amount of reduction of rents accepted by the tenants on the estates of Lord Londonderry, the Lord Lieutenant, was 10 per cent. The tenants had demanded a 30 per cent. reduction

The report of the British Commission appointed to investigate the Belfast riots of last summer has been made public. The Commissioners say that the royal Irish constabulary should be maintained as a police force in Belfast, the commander being free from all police authority except that of the Inspector-General, and responsible for the preservation of the peace without the control of the magistracy or of other authority than the Executive. The Chief of Police, the report says, should be empowered to forbid parades with bands of music and other public demonstrations. He should also be empowered to increase the force sufficiently to enable him to deal with riots without calling upon the police of other districts, a large enough military force also being maintained to prevent such a necessity.

Lord Randolph Churchill, replying to an inquiry regarding his letter upon national finances, says he thinks that between the years 1868 and 1874 the management of the finances was fairly good; that from 1874 to 1880 it was not quite so satisfactory, while from 1880 to 1885 it was simply infamous. He adds that if this summary be found not incorrect, the cause may reasonably be assigned to Parliamentary demoralization springing from the Irish difficulty, unwise legislation, and an injudicious foreign policy.

Sir Michael Morris, at present Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas of Ireland, has been appointed Lord Chief Justice of Ireland, vice George Augustus May, resigned.

Sir Joseph Whitworth, the eminent engineer, died at Monte Carlo on Saturday. The baronetcy expired with him. He was eighty-four years of age. In 1854 he began the manufacture of the breech-loading rifles, cannon projectiles, and other firearms with which his name is associated, being for many years a competitor with Sir W. G. Armstrong. He was made a baronet in October, 1869, and in the same year founded the "Whitworth scholarships" of £100 a year each, tenable for two or three years, for the encouragement of mechanical science.

The Belgian Government has introduced in Parliament a bill to suppress drunkenness. It provides that drunkards in public places and publicans serving drunkards or children shall be fined and imprisoned, and that debts incurred in purchasing intoxicants shall not be recoverable.

Cardinal Jacobini has resigned the office of Pontifical Secretary of State. His successor will be the Nuncio at Madrid. The Pope has accepted the resignation, and as a mark of esteem has invited the Cardinal to continue to live in the papal residence.

The Spanish Government is willing to grant amnesty to Zorilla and other political exiles provided their friends can induce them to return to Spain. It is believed that Zorilla will decline. There are rumors that he is preparing for another revolution.

Commenting on the passage of the Fisheries Retaliation Bill by the United States Senate, the Montreal Gazette, official organ of the Dominion Government, says: "It is true that there has been denied to American fishing vessels the commercial privileges extended to other vessels in Canadian ports—that is to say, the privilege to land cargo, purchase supplies, etc.; but that exclusion is no more a straining of the treaty governing the rights of Canada than is the prohibition of fishing within three miles of the shore. The attitude of the Dominion Government is not a novel one. It has been consistently maintained for nearly seventy years past, except during the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 and the Washington Treaty of 1871. There are two aspects to this question, which the Congress of the United States is apparently determined not to consider, namely, the limitation of the exclusion policy of Canada to fishing vessels, and the desire of Canada to reach a settlement of the difficulty by means of arbitration."

PINKERTON'S MEN.

The unfortunate killing of a boy in Jersey City, by a chance shot from one of Pinkerton's men employed in guarding the coal company's wharves in Jersey City against the strikers, is exciting a great deal of indignation against this organization among the strikers and their friends. That disgraceful demagogue, Mayor Cleveland of Jersey City, is particularly loud in his denunciation of them, and a great many good people are asking why an armed body of this sort, which is not under the control of or responsible to any public authority, should be permitted to figure as prominently as it does in these labor troubles. We are very glad that people are beginning to ask what it means, and why it exists, because the answer is most instructive.

It cannot be too soon or too well understood that, as an armed organization offering itself for hire for purposes of defence in various parts of the Union, Pinkerton's Men are, we must all admit, the greatest disgrace that has befallen the United States. No such evidence of our internal weakness and lawlessness as the existence and activity of this organization constitutes has been offered to the world since the present Government was founded. Its appearance in any other civilized country would fill to-day every man in it with shame and astonishment. For it is—let nobody shrink from this plain truth—an unmistakable sign of retrogression towards mediæval barbarism. Pinkerton is neither more nor less than the head of a band of mercenaries, such as each great landholder in the eleventh and twelfth centuries kept in his pay for the defence of his property and that of his vassals against the armed attacks of his neighbors. They are called into existence by exactly the same causes now as then — the absence of a public force capable of enforcing the law of the land, and affording security for life and property to the peaceable and well-disposed. Now as then, now as at every time since the dawn of civilization, no men of the Aryan race who have accumulated property of any kind will submit to be despoiled of it, or interfered with in the management of it, or allow any person or body of persons to "go upon them or send upon them," as the Barons said in Magna Charta, without trying to defend themselves. If there are courts, they will appeal to the courts; if there are police, they will call in the police; if there are troops, they will ask for the troops to defend their rights under the law; but if neither courts, nor police, nor troops will do anything for them, they will hire an army of their own. Of course, this is anarchy in its first stage. The word is not a pleasant one, but it must be used when the occasion calls for it.

The demand for Pinkerton's Men began nearly twenty years ago in the coal regions in Pennsylvania, when the Molly Maguires took possession of them, and superseded the law by a foul and murderous conspiracy. This conspiracy was then called, as some such things are now called, "Labor." Labor overawed the sheriffs, defied the courts, intimidated the juries, and marked out its enemies for assassination literally by the dozen. It reduced a large and populous district to a condition of terror and disorder which it would have been hard to match outside of Central Africa. The corporations owning the property, finding there was no help to be expected from the public force, hired a force of their own, with Pinkerton at its head; and through his exertions Labor was at last brought to justice, and twenty cut-throats righteously hanged.

Since then the need for a small private army of this sort for the defence of property has not diminished, but on the contrary has increased. Pinkerton has enlarged and improved his force. It is better armed and drilled every year, and it travels to and fro, all over the United States, a sort of moving shame and disgrace for us all. No American ought to be able to look on it without blushing to the roots of his hair. Its presence always means that American mayors and sheriffs and governors have refused, at the demand of Labor, or through the fear of Labor, to give American citizens protection for either life or property; that they stand idly by while Labor pursues poor men with brickbats, bludgeons, and pistols to prevent their accepting employment which is offered them; and that they deny to employers the means of protecting their premises from wreck and pillage at the hands of men who insist on working for them against their will. In all the great strikes which have occurred during the past year Labor has asserted the doctrine of compulsory hiring—that is, the right of certain men to be hired by certain employers on their own terms, whether the employers want them or not, and the right to assert this right by force of arms—that is, to besiege the premises with weapons of offence, and prevent, by attacks on life and property, the transaction of all business until their demands are complied with. This is not an overcharged statement. We challenge any one to mention a single strike on a large scale during the past year in which the strikers did not either actually resort to violence, or take pains to produce the belief throughout the neighborhood that they would do so if necessary.

What adds to the disgrace is, that the power against which Pinkerton's army is called on to protect property is a ludicrously small minority of the population. Labor, which has brought this shame on us, and in fear of which Governors of American States and Mayors of American cities are ready to play the mountebank in their public utterances, and violate their oaths of office, and dishonor the national flag, probably does not number 1,000,000 all told, and a large proportion of it is composed of poor and ignorant foreigners, who know not what they do, and to whom every intelligent American's first duty is to make plain that in this land of liberty the law is omnipotent.

The poor demagogue who is playing the rôle of Mayor over in Jersey City ought, however, to be the last to complain of Pinkerton's Men. If the state of things to which he and the like of him are trying to bring about in the United States should ever be realized, the Pinkerton army will be a much more formidable body than it is now. At present it is simply a guard which any man is entitled to keep on his own premises to protect him from violence, if he thinks it necessary and is willing to go to the expense. But if the country should be carried much further on the road to mediæval anarchy, and the law of the land and its ministers be brought into still greater contempt, these private armies would not remain shut up in the yards or warehouses or mansions of their employers, while demagogues stimulated attacks on them. They would sally out, mediæval fashion, and twist the necks of the Clevelands, and Hills, and Greens, and Oglesbys in very summary fashion. The fun Labor has now in battering and threatening people with impunity is due entirely to the fact that law-abiding habits are still strong among us. But they would not survive for a great while the strain which Labor is putting on them; and whenever the community gets thoroughly tired of Labor and the demagogues, it will give those who like anarchy and private war a dose of them which many generations will remember.

THE REORGANIZATION OF THE WEATHER BUREAU.

The death of General Hazen will call forth very general discussion as to the selection of his successor, and will necessarily bring the question of the civil reorganization of the Weather Bureau again prominently before the public. There ought to be no division of opinion on two points: first, that the director of the Weather Bureau should be qualified for his position by a scientific knowledge of meteorology as well as by executive ability; second, that the work of observing and predicting the weather is eminently a peaceful and in no sense a military art. We do not look for any popular support of the military opinion which proclaims, officially, that "the whole theory of the organization is, that the entire force of the Signal Corps shall be available for immediate service in case of war." What the people at large wish is simply the announcement of the "approach and force of storms throughout the United States, for the benefit of commerce and agriculture" in time of peace. Soldiers are not needed for this work, and the attempt to give the weather observers of the Signal Corps a military character has been chiefly of use in keeping the service under the control of army officers.

It is not a little curious to remark that the more notable changes introduced in the administration of the Bureau by Gen. Hazen have been distinctly civil in their nature, and this in spite of his frequently repeated statement that the Signal Corps was maintained for military service. Nothing shows this better than the assistance he has extended to the formation of State weather services, which are entirely voluntary and non military in their nature. These are now organized in many of the States, and their number is at present increasing almost every month. They excite much popular interest, especially in the South and West (where newspapers are slow to reach the out-of town population), on account of the greater publicity they give to the weather predictions by means of flag displays at railway or telegraph stations. The plan of fostering intimate relations between the general and local services is really admirable, but it is eminently a civil relation, not in the least aided by military manners. Indeed, when we review the history of the Signal Service, nothing is more distinct than the steady increase of its civil and scientific sides, so that now the share that army work has in it is left merely as an incongruous, unpleasant feature in the background. It might well be omitted altogether. A review of this change in its attitude is pertinent here.

The Signal Service, as a separate organization, may be traced back to 1860, when there was added to the staff of the army "one signal officer, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a major of cavalry." In 1866 the Chief Signal Officer was given the rank of colonel of cavalry, and his corps consisted of six officers and not more than one hundred non-commissioned officers and privates, detailed from the battalion of engineers for the performance of military duty. In 1870 the Chief Signal Officer was directed to secure meteorological observations in order "to give notice on the northern lakes and on the sea-coast, by magnetic telegraph and marine signals, of the approach and force of storms." The Signal Corps came into public notice with this order, and Gen. Myer earned the lasting remembrance of the people by his energy in instituting our weather service. In 1871 the limitation of the work to the lakes and sea-coast was omitted in the appropriation bill, and in 1872 announcement was required of the "probable approach and force of storms throughout the United States for the benefit of commerce and agriculture." In 1880 the Chief Signal Officer was given the rank and pay of a brigadier-general. During the decade 1870-1880 the number of men in the corps was largely increased. The appropriations for the support of the service run as follows:

Year.	Observations and Reports.	Telegraph Lines.	Deficiency.
1870	$15,000
1871	102,451
1872	250,000
1873	296,825
1874	355,325		$45,000
1875	415,000	$88,000	55,000
1876	300,000	45,000
1877	300,000	22,000
1878	350,000	95,000
1879	375,000	90,000
1880	375,000	75,000
1881	375,000	75,000
1882	280,000	40,000

Up to this date the pay of the men had not been included in the estimates, but came from the Army bill; hereafter it is included, and the appropriations for 1883 were $963,674,57; for 1884, $926,132.08; for 1885, $904,080.

It cannot be supposed for a moment that this enormous growth of the service was in any way an expression of the interest of the people or of Congress in the organization of a corps "available for immediate service in case of war." The recommendations of boards of trade, of chambers of commerce, and of agricultural societies have never been based on the desirableness of instruction in military signalling. Yet in the reports of the Chief Signal Officer, military signalling has been continually given the first place and the chief emphasis under the head of "Instruction," and meteorological studies have been secondary and subordinate, although the meteorological work of the corps now so vastly exceeds the military work. The importance of an experienced signal corps in every well-organized army is not disputed. This question is not in discussion in the public mind: it is taken for granted that it will be properly attended to in the regular army, along with infantry drill, cavalry manœuvres, and artillery practice, each in its proper place. It is a mere accident, partly historical, partly verbal, that there is any present connection of matters so dissimilar as weather prediction and military drill. There is now a good opportunity of dissolving this connection altogether. During the life of the late Chief Signal Officer it would have been an ungracious task to remove him after he had given his whole energies, with good result, to the improvement of the service.

There is competent opinion in favor of a civil organization of the Weather Bureau. In 1884, a committee of the National Academy of Sciences recommended, in response to Congressional inquiry, that the meteorological work of the Signal Service should be put under the general control of a non-military meteorological bureau, to which should be transferred so much of the present personnel and functions of the Signal Office as is not necessary to the military duties of that office. The joint Congressional Commission on the Signal Service and other scientific bureaus of the Government reported last summer, after an extended investigation, that the work of the Weather Bureau is civil work in its nature and character, and that military restraint is not necessary to its success. Three members of the Commission were in favor of gradual and three in favor of immediate transfer to a civil bureau. In 1884 the Secretary of War, Mr. Lincoln, stated that he entirely agreed with the Committee of the National Academy in their recommendation. He had, two years earlier, advised "that a civil establishment to conduct the Weather Bureau service be organized." It is to be hoped that the present Secretary of War will exert the weight of his opinion to the same end.

MR. EDMUNDS'S REPORT ON THE FISHERY QUESTION.

THE report submitted by Senator Edmunds on the fishery question, together with the bill which has since passed the Senate, appears to us in the main to be fair and reasonable, and not at all likely to stir up bad feeling with Great Britain. The substance of it is, that we make no complaint of the denial to us of any right not secured to us either by the Treaty of 1818 or by the recognized law of nations, but that when any rights arising under the treaty or the law of nations are denied to us in the waters of British North America, then the President of the United States may in his discretion, and by issuing his proclamation to that effect, exclude the vessels of British North America from our ports, except in stress of weather or for the procurement of necessary supplies, and may also prohibit trade between British North America and the United States.

The latter clause of the bill is of questionable utility and more than questionable justice, since its effect is to punish citizens of the United States for the misdeeds of the Canadian authorities. The clause authorizes the President, if he thinks proper, "to deny entry into any port or place of the United States of fresh fish or salt fish or any other product of said dominions, or other goods coming from said dominions to the United States. The President may in his discretion apply such proclamation to any part or all of the foregoing named subjects, and may qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation to any part or to all of the foregoing named subjects, and may qualify, limit, and renew such proclamation from time to time as he may deem necessary to the full and just execution of the purposes of this act." Under the terms of the bill the President could prevent the collection of debts due from Canadians to Americans by prohibiting the receipt of the goods with which such debts are commonly paid, and without which in many cases they could not be paid. The phrase, "any other goods coming from said dominions to the United States," includes, for instance, barley, lumber, furs, live stock—in fact, every conceivable thing that constitutes trade, whether the same be transported by ship, by railway, or by wagon. It applies to the traffic between Winnipeg and St. Paul, as well as between St. John and Boston. This is a very sweeping measure, when we consider that it punishes the American citizen equally with the Canadian, and that it inoculates all the healthy departments of trade with the fishery sore. It may be said that as it is all left to the discretion of the President, no harm is likely to come from it. But is it wise to give the President the discretion to admit horses from Canada and exclude barley, to admit salt and exclude timber, and to transpose the lists of admitted and excluded products—that is, to make and unmake private fortunes, at his own discretion, and as often as he thinks best?

This part of the bill strikes us as being incongruous and unnecessary. The fish catch and the fish trade are a mere wart upon the commerce of Canada and the United States, and there is no reason why the whole system should suffer on account of the wart. Aside from this clause, the bill affords appropriate remedies for any injustice that may be committed against us. There will be necessarily some dispute as to what privileges belong to us under the law of nations. Those belonging to us under the Treaty of 1818 are more easily susceptible of definition. Mr. Edmunds's report implies that the right to buy bait is not secured to us either by treaty or by public law. As regards the headland question, the contention is that where a bay or opening in the coast is more than six miles wide the right to fish at any point three miles distant from the nearest land cannot be controverted. This would seem to be the proper definition of the "marine league," but it is contrary to our own interpretation of it. The adoption of it now implies the reversal of our own decisions, and it is perhaps as well that they should be reversed; for when we attempt to claim exclusive jurisdiction from headland to headland along so extensive a coast as ours, it becomes a matter wholly of private judgment whether the claim includes all the space inside a line drawn from Cape Cod to Cape Hatteras, or only the space between Newport and Montauk Point, or something even less comprehensive. The spirit of the report is peaceable and non-aggressive, and this is of more importance than the specific measure recommended.

LABORERS' ALLOTMENT GROUNDS.

WARWICKSHIRE, January 5, 1887.

DURING the last two or three years every newspaper, every platform has been ringing with the 'land question" and a number of misleading statements have been made in the course of the discussion, especially on the question of laborers' allotments. These seem to come chiefly from persons who either predicate the condition of the English laborer from their study chairs, without actual, every-day acquaintance with him, or who have come down among us on a mission to extract facts about themselves from the most suspicious and reticent class in the country. We think, therefore, that it may not be unprofitable to describe the working of the allotment system in an ordinary case which lies within our own experience. The facts can be verified by any one who cares to do so.

The village of which we speak lies about three miles from Leamington and as many from Warwick. All the land in the parish (3,468 acres) belongs to Lord ——, with the exception of about fourteen acres. It is divided into sixteen farms of varying size, and about thirty-seven acres are devoted to cottage gardens and allotments. There are 107 cottages belonging to Lord ——, each with a piece of garden ground attached to it. Twelve of these cottages have one-eighth of an acre each; ten have very small patches; eighty-five have gardens of somewhat less than one-eighth of an acre. The average rent for cottage and garden is £3 10s. per annum. None are over £4, many as low as £2. The soil is excellent—a rich loam on gravel in most of the gardens. Some parts of the farms are stiff clay. The gardens about the cottages are planted with apples, pears, plums, and small fruits, besides vegetables of all kinds. Into every available corner standard rose trees, clumps of dahlias, holyhocks, sunflowers, or tall white lilies are thrust; while the narrow paths between the fruit bushes are bordered with pinks, carnations, wallflowers, and all sorts of uncommon, old-fashioned perennials. Every inch of ground is utilized. The result of fruit and flower against the 250-year-old half-timbered, red-and-black, or black-and-white houses is charmingly picturesque to the passer-by, and highly profitable to the owners.

Just beyond the last houses at the top of the gentle rise on which the village clusters round its ancient sandstone church, lie the allotments. They are of two kinds. First there are the old garden allotments, which have been in existence for forty years. This fact, by the way, disposes of the claims of certain agitators who would have people believe that until their voices were heard in behalf of the laborer, allotments were unknown. This lot contains 11 acres, 1 rod, 11 perches, and is divided into seventy-seven allotments. Their average size is 23½ perches, at an average rent of 9s. 11d. each: gross rental £38 3s. 6d., about £3 16s. an acre. In addition to these, a field of 14 acres, 1 rod, 25 perches was let out a year and a half ago in larger allotments. Four of these are each one acre, and the remaining twenty-one about one-half an acre each; the rent being £2 an acre.

This field had been for some years in rough clover grass ("seeds," as we call it in Warwickshire). The landlord broke it up and prepared it thoroughly for the tenants. On this land, last year, the main crop was wheat, which gave a very fine yield, at the rate of from thirteen to seventeen bags to the acre. Wheat in Warwickshire is reckoned by the bag of three bushels; seventeen bags, therefore, equal a yield of fifty-one bushels to the acre. Besides wheat, the tenants grew on the ground they had been able to trench potatoes, cabbages, and a few turnips, carrots, etc.

The wheat was harvested well, and threshed on the ground. The man on whose piece the threshing machine stood was paid sixpence apiece by his neighbors for the traffic on his land. The wheat was ground, and used at home. The straw was either kept as fodder for the pigs, or sold. These new allotments are now being trenched by hand from end to end. Some have already been planted with winter wheat, which promises well. The ground—a stiffish clay—is being thoroughly cleaned; and one tenant, the rat-catcher of the neighborhood, who takes special pride in the look of his land, told us that he had harnessed himself to the harrow and harrowed his whole patch, to avoid the holes a horse's hoofs would have made on the newly broken soil.

The garden allotments are splendidly cultivated. Rows of small fruits, celery, cabbages, cauliflower, potatoes, peas, beans, sweet herbs, with standard roses, pinks, and carnations in among them, and here and there a plum, damson, or apple tree, fill the patches on each side of a broad grass road that runs the whole length of the gardens. On Friday evening, in the summer, the village is worth a visit. Men and women, with huge market-baskets or wheelbarrows filled to overflowing with fruit and vegetables, come trooping in from the gardens, while great trays of cut flowers lie at every cottage door, ready to be tied up into tasteful nosegays. On Saturday morning the road to Leamington swarms with women carrying heavy baskets, or pushing little wicker perambulators full of fruit and flowers, and the village donkey-carts are loaded to a perilous extent. There is no market in Leamington, but all the garden produce, down to the smallest bunch of parsley, finds a ready sale among the residents in the town, who are only too glad to get country fruit, flowers, and vegetables fresh from the gardens, without the medium of the greengrocer's shop.

A great deal of the actual work of the gardens is done by the women, and they make a very good thing of it. We could mention many instances in which a woman has paid the whole year's rent for her cottage by the fruit she has sold in a single week; and when the husband is out of work, the garden produce becomes of course the only means of subsistence for the family.

There is, however, another side to the picture. About thirty years ago an immense impetus was given to the cultivation of gardens and allotments in this village by the starting here of the first of those cottage-garden flower shows which have since become so popular an institution in England. From that time it has been observed that the homes have suffered. The mothers, always in the gardens or on the road to Leamington, have but little time to clean and mend and make at home. The children's dirty faces and dirtier pinafores are a constant eyesore to those who have been accustomed to the cleanliness and tidiness of other parts of England. The cottages, too, are often untidy. The needlework of the horticultural mothers cannot compare with that of the older generation, and the result is that ready-made clothes, "cheap and nasty," are taking the place more and more every year of the serviceable home-made smocks and shirts of the grandmother's day.

Being on excellent terms of friendship with the laborers and tenants under the same landlord, we have had ample opportunity of finding out their opinions on the land question, and we cannot do better than repeat the substance of a conversation we had some eighteen months ago with a particularly clever, witty young day-laborer—a strong Radical to boot, as are a large proportion of our villagers. He had been out of work for some time, and was glad to take a job of road-mending, though he looked on it as a terrible descent in the social scale.

We were discussing public affairs, and I said, laughing, "How about your three acres and your cow?"

"If you gave me three acres to-morrow," was the answer, "I should be a ruined man. I have got a quarter of an acre in the allotments. And perhaps some day I may have another if I get on. But a quarter of an acre is as much as a man like me, with a wife and two children, can manage. I must depend on my daily wages, and who is to look after the land while I am at work? My mother and brother have an acre between them. [She keeps a carrier's cart which the son drives.] And with her pigs and the horse she does very well with it. But a man like me can't live off one or off three acres. If you give them to me you ruin me."

This man's opinion is that of all the more intelligent and thoughtful laborers in the village. When farmers were better off than they are now, the men used to be paid—as they are still in some parts of England—by the week, wet or fine. Now they are only paid on the days when work can be done. On the off-days, and when the men are out of work—a very common occurrence now, owing to a variety of causes—they turn to their allotments. "They are the saving of us," a laborer said to us the other day.

But, as our friend said, it is out of the question that they should make a livelihood off their allotments without regular work; and with a fair amount of weekly work, a quarter of an acre is quite as much as one man can cultivate single-handed. The holders of the acre lots are not day laborers, but men who have a little money. One owns two or three cottages, and devotes his whole time to his gardens, with a son to help him. Another is a jobbing carpenter, who has a son to help in his trade and on the allotment. Another is a jobbing gardener, who keeps a small beershop licensed for beer, "not to be drunk on the premises," and employs a man or boy most of the year. The carrier and her son share another acre.

It may be argued that the village we are describing is hardly a fair sample, on account of the ready market for all kinds of garden produce in Leamington. But we can point to numbers of villages in Warwickshire, far removed from any town, where the allotment system has worked well for the last twenty-five or thirty years, under all sorts of landlords, rich and poor, Liberal and Conservative. There is not the sale for flowers that we have here, but wheat, barley, oats, potatoes, some kinds of vegetables, and all fruits are always salable or usable, and have proved to be profitable on such allotments as those we mention. As far as our personal experience goes, we have never known a case in which, if men really wanted a bit of allotment ground, they could not get it; and this was the case long before Mr. Joseph Arch's name had ever been heard beyond his native village, which happens to lie next to ours. The landlords would be foolish, indeed, if they were not willing to let their land at such high rents to such excellent tenants.

If the allotment system should ever be extended into some scheme of numbers of small holdings, the laborers themselves predict the result. In 1885 many men in this village positively believed that if the Liberal party came into office, they would each be given, out of hand, those mythical three acres, with or without the yet more mythical cow. "What would you do with them?" they were asked. "Sell 'em," was the prompt reply. And the elder and wiser men in the village shook their heads, and told us exactly where those three acres, whether freehold or leasehold, would go—into the hands of two or perhaps three enterprising men in the place, whom he could name: men who have ambition, industry, intelligence, and a little money, and who would at any cost buy up the lots of their less thrifty and intelligent neighbors. So that the turn of the wheel that was to bring about peasant proprietors, would only bring about a fresh crop of land-owners or large tenants.

R. G. K.

A RISING FRENCH CRITIC.

PARIS, January 14, 1887.

NOT far from the Pantheon is a deserted and silent street, the Rue d'Ulm, which reminds one of the streets painted with an almost painful accuracy by Balzac. In this street is the École Normale, the great school which furnishes the French University with its best professors. The examinations for entrance are difficult, and the successful competitors remain four years in the school, where they receive instruction from the first men of the Faculty of Letters and of the Faculty of Sciences. With very few exceptions, the pupils of the school are very poor; they have to make their way by their own efforts; they live almost in seclusion; and when they come out, they are admirably trained—they are admirably versed in the dead languages and in the French language. Many of them, instead of accepting a modest professorship in the provinces, try the career of letters, and generally they begin with journalism. They are more or less envious of their predecessors—of Prévost-Paradol, of Caro, of Rigault, of Taine, of About, of Francisque Sarcey. All these said in the days of their youth, as young Rastignac did when he looked down on the great Parisian ocean from the height of Montmartre: "À nous deux maintenant." Many "Normalians" have become famous; some have become ministers, like Beulé, who wrote the history of the Roman Cæsars. The Institute, the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate, are not so far from the lonely Rue d'Ulm.

Journalism is always tempting to a young man. Some of our best papers are readily open to young Normalians, since the editors are aware that they really know how to write. The younger they are the more they are still under the influence of a strong literary discipline, ready for everything, full of information, sharp, clever, ardent, curious of life. They have been fed with the lion's marrow. They are generally brilliant writers, but sometimes they are nothing more than artists of style; they have no experience of the world, no acquaintance with the daily life of the province and the city. They are like the rhéteurs of antiquity; they are like brilliant stars shooting through the night and often expiring in the night. Few now remember Assollant, also a Normalian, who inspired great hopes at first, and who died the other day, after having consumed his life in writing newspaper articles and novels. The best men even who come out of the École Normale, find it difficult to acquire the experience which is the lot of the man of the world, of the landlord, of the lawyer. Prévost-Paradol acquired his political education in the salon of M. Thiers, to whom he was a sort of Benjamin, and wrote every morning in the Débats what he had heard the night before at the Place St. Georges, with that peculiar charm and wit which was his own; but Prévost-Paradol made a terrible mistake when he accepted office from Napoleon III. —a mistake which cost him his life.

About went to Rome on leaving the École Normale, and afterwards to Greece (a certain number of pupils are sent every year to the French schools maintained by the Government in the Italian capital and at Athens). We owe to this circumstance 'Tolla' and the 'Roi des Montagnes,' the two best novels of About's, written at a time when his talent was still in its freshness. About also was seized with political ambition; he became a journalist after the war, and M. Thiers found in him one of his ardent supporters, but did not recompense his efforts. About said once, speaking of Thiers: "He offered me everything, I accepted everything; he gave me nothing." The last years of About were spent in the work of journalism, and, to the astonishment of all, in speculations of all sorts. His ambition was to become a great financier, but he might have said as Talleyrand said: "I have always lost money at the Bourse, because I always knew everything before anybody."

Among the younger and more successful Normalians we can cite now M. Jules Lemaitre. His reputation was made almost in a day. He published a series of critical articles in the Revue Bleue, which attracted so much attention that the Journal des Débats offered him at once the succession to J. J. Weiss (also a Normalian), who wrote its theatrical feuilleton during the past few years, and is now prevented from doing so by illness. More than that, the Figaro, the great Figaro, opened its columns to him—those columns which to many young aspirants appear as the ne plus ultra of literary glory. The name of M. Jules Lemaitre, unknown a short time ago, will very soon become a popular name. It may be that M. Lemaitre will sink under his new reputation, that he will rapidly disappear in the Parisian vortex; it may also be that he will wear well. His two first volumes are certainly youthful, but they have nevertheless a certain solidity. He has, of course, chosen for his studies contemporary writers. He might have left some behind, in the cold, in the dubious light of a purely ephemeral notoriety; he ought to have turned away from some others, who have only won notoriety by the abandonment of all the rules of common decency. He has admitted to his gallery names which are entirely unknown outside of the smallest horizon; but we have read with interest and with pleasure his essays on Théodore de Banville, Sully-Prudhomme, Coppée, Leconte de Lisle, the poets; on Daudet, Renan, Zola; on Francisque Sarcey; on J. J. Weiss. M. Lemaitre is terribly modern. Speaking of Bossuet, he says:

"Frankly, I always have to make an effort to read Bossuet. It is true, that when I have read a few pages, I feel that he is, as we say nowadays, très fort, but he gives me no pleasure, while often when I open a book of to-day or of yesterday, it befalls me that I shudder easily, or am penetrated with pleasure to the marrow of my bones—so much do I like this literature of the second half of the nineteenth century, so intelligent, so uneasy, so mad, so sorrowful, so odd, so subtle. I love it even in its affectations, its ridiculousness, its exaggerations, of which I feel the germ in me and which I can make mine. And if we speak seriously, let us make our accounts. If perhaps Corneille, Racine, Bossuet have to-day no equivalents, has the 'grand siècle' the equivalent of Lamartine, of Victor Hugo, of Musset, of Michelet, of George Sand, of Sainte-Beuve, of Flaubert, of Renan? Is it my fault if I prefer reading a chapter of Renan's to a sermon of Bossuet's, the 'Nabab' to the 'Princesse de Clèves,' and a comedy of Meilhac and Halévy's to a comedy of Molière's?"

Comparisons are odious, and M. Lemaitre has a right to his preference. His enthusiasm, however, is perhaps a little too accommodating, and among the names which he cites in this passage there are certainly a few which ought not to have been cited. But this sincere love of modern literature gives a certain charm and color to his criticism. We often describe well what we like well.

The article on Renan made much noise at the time it appeared. Lemaitre belongs to the school of realists who wish to see before they describe anything. He was not content with reading Renan's books, he went to his lectures; he describes the public of the famous professor:

"Many old gentlemen, who resemble all old gentlemen; students, ladies, sometimes Englishwomen, who have come because M. Renan is a part of the curiosities of Paris. . . . He enters and is applauded. He thanks with a nod of his head, with a good-natured look. He is fat, short, red, with long features, long gray hair; a big nose, a fine mouth; moving all about as in one piece his large head between his shoulders. He seems happy to live, and he explains with gayety the formation of the historical Corpus which contains the Pentateuch."

The familiarity of Renan's exposition and explanations amuses M. Lemaitre—the slang which he sometimes uses, the simplicity of his manner. He calls him a "Labiche exégète" (Labiche is the author of some comical plays at the Palais Royal). He is somewhat disappointed also, and wonders how a man who has gone through such a terrible moral crisis can be so unconcerned, so little transcendental. He compares his face to some of those which Gustave Doré drew in his 'Rabelais' or in the 'Contes Drolatiques.' What is the secret of this gayety? In a speech which he made at Quimper, on the 17th of August, 1883, Renan said: "A critic reproached me some time ago [it was M. Scherer of the Temps] with my good humor as if it were hypocrisy, and seeing its true causes. Well, I will tell you its causes. I am very gay because, having amused myself very little when I was young, I have kept all the freshness of my illusions; but, what is more serious, I am gay because I am sure that I have made a good use of my life. I am sure of it."

It must be very comfortable to feel so much security. Lamennais, who went through the same ordeal as Renan, did not feel it.

"Pascal," says M. Lemaitre, "became mad, M. Renan is gay! If he had ever completely altered his faith, he might have the serenity which often goes with strong convictions. But this philosopher has preserved the imagination of a Catholic. He still loves what he has left. He has remained a priest; he gives even to negation the tone of Christian mysticism. His brain is a disendowed (désaffectée) cathedral (the word is Alphonse Daudet's). You can fill it with hay; you can deliver lectures in it; it remains a church."

The essay on Zola is one of the best. Lemaitre dares to say that Zola is not a true realist, and that he magnifies and transforms reality. Zola pretends to be a "naturalist," but "he is also an epic poet and a pessimist poet," if you call a poet a writer who, in view of a certain idea, transforms reality. His pessimism is frightful. In his first writings he at times glorified nature and her works. In the latest he seems to hate and to be afraid of her. He tries to insult human pride in every possible manner. He takes pleasure in showing original sin not in the spirit of a moralist, of a priest, of a philosopher, but in the spirit of a physiologist, of a vivisector. He surrounds vice and crime with the most horrible, disgusting, repulsive, and ridiculous circumstances. He degrades love; he sees in man and woman miserable brutes. He lives in a clinique. Bestiality and imbecility are in his eyes the two great characteristics of mankind. "But," says M. Lemaitre, "it would be great injustice to accuse M. Zola of immorality, and to believe that he speculates in the bad instincts of the reader." Zola remains grave; if he enters into certain details it is because he thinks it necessary.

"As he pretends to paint reality, and as he is persuaded that reality is ignoble, he shows it as such, with the scruples of a soul which is delicate in its own fashion, which has no desire to deceive us, and which wishes to give the full measure of truth. Sometimes he forgets himself—he makes a great picture from which the ignominy of the flesh is absent; and suddenly he is seized with remorse, he remembers that the beast is everywhere, and, so as not to fail in his duty, when you least expect it, he introduces some indecent detail as a memento of the universal corruption."

Many refuse to Zola what, after all, preserves the work of art, style. Lemaitre believes them to be unjust, and he defends the style of Zola—"a magnifying style, without shades, often without precision, but eminently calculated, by its monotonous exaggerations and its multiplied insistence, to give greatness to the great ensembles of things concrete."

Correspondence.

THE SHARPLES PORTRAITS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Now that there is some discussion as to the genuineness of the Sharples portraits, the following statement may possess some interest:

These portraits were exhibited once before in this country—I cannot remember the precise date, but it must have been near the time of, or before, the Centennial. Among other places, they were shown in Cincinnati. While they were on exhibition there, two of the portraits were partially cut from their frames, and it was considered evident that an attempt to steal them had been made. I saw the portraits shortly after (I think, the next day), and the manner of the cutting convinced me that it had not been done by a thief, but by some one who had an interest in advertising the pictures. Two of the pictures were cut, and both were cut in the same way. In each canvas there were four long slits, one on each side, not quite meeting at the corners, so that there was the largest possible amount of cutting that should still leave the canvas firmly attached to its stretcher. Any man who has ever cut a canvas from its stretcher (as what artist has not?) knows how it is done. One begins at one corner and cuts around until he gets back to the corner he started from, and the work is done. Now, if the cutting of these so-called Sharples portraits was done by a thief, he must have made four cuts in one canvas, still leaving it firmly attached at all four corners, and then have gone to the other portrait and done the same thing, and then have been interrupted, having done the utmost amount of cutting, with no result. Or, if there were two thieves, each of them must have gone to work in the same awkward way, and have got to the same point when the interruption came.

The improbability of either of these suppositions, together with the fact that no one ever explained how, when, or by whom the attempt could have been made, served to convince me that the supposed theft was a mere advertising "dodge"; and I have never had much faith since then in the authenticity or value of the portraits.

Kenyon Cox.

New York, January 20, 1887.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The report of the Massachusetts Historical Society upon the Sharples portraits has attracted widespread attention. In it the authenticity of the pictures is impeached upon the strength of the written testimony alone. It does not weigh any evidence which may be derived from an examination of the pictures themselves. Such an examination would at once convince any competent observer that the collection of portraits now exhibiting in the country under the name of Sharples cannot possibly be all from the same hand. It is true that the explanatory volume acknowledges that several of the ladies' portraits were worked upon by distinguished artists with a view to beautifying and making more acceptable, yet all are claimed to be at bottom the work of the one painter. In truth they bear every mark of being the work of several men.

The portrait of the wife of Alex. Hamilton is so like Maclise that that distinguished artist must have painted it outright, instead of merely touching it up, as Macready's letter says. Of the others it is not difficult to assign them to three or four different hands. The three men's portraits—those of Priestly, Fulton, and Marshall—resemble one another, and may all have been painted by Sharples, though they are very different in style from the Sharples pastels which hang in Independence Hall. But if Sharples painted them, or any of those in the general collection, then assuredly he did not paint the Washington portraits. In these the handling of the brush, the quality of the color, and, indeed, all technical details, are unlike anything in the other pictures. Not only so; the painters' conception of what a portrait should be is different. While all the others are more or less flimsy and flat, painted with little pigment and much oil, and with a constant striving after the doll-like prettiness much in vogue thirty or forty years ago, the Washington portraits are massive and round, painted with a large body of color and considerable skill. One of the heads of Washington is in profile, as is that of his wife. These profiles are erect and rigid, relieved against a dark, opaque background. It seems scarcely possible that a man who could paint so good a head, if working directly from nature, would have contented himself with this upright rigidity. It, however, corresponds exactly with what we find in the unquestioned portraits in pastel by Sharples, of which many exist.

The full face of Washington is undoubtedly from the hand of the same painter. It, however, represents a much younger man, and is in military uniform. It is well and strongly modelled, with a full brush and a good deal of skill. It at once suggests the bust made by Houdon about ten years before Sharples came to America, and a close examination of the two shows a striking resemblance.

A careful consideration of the evidence afforded by the pictures, aided by our knowledge of facts which are unquestioned, brings us to the conclusion that the profile portraits of Washington and his wife are copies by an unknown but skilful hand, from originals, either in pastel or oil, made by Sharples from life; and that the full face is the work of the same painter, who probably took for foundation a sketch by Sharples, but in finishing used the bust by Houdon. This would account for the alleged mistake in the color of the eyes, and for the strange lack of vitality, very observable in a head otherwise so well executed.

Pictor.

PERVERSION OF HISTORY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you allow me to call attention to the extraordinary way in which Messrs. Hay and Nicolay, the authors of the Life of Lincoln now appearing in the Century, have, in the January number, glossed over the acquisition of Texas? However great may be the value of Texas to the United States, and however worthy may be the Texans of to-day, the fact remains that the annexation of Texas was the consummation of a gigantic land robbery, planned and carried out in the interest of slavery, and practised upon a friendly but weaker neighbor. This national crime, of which even at this day all patriotic Americans should feel heartily ashamed, is thus described by Messrs. Hay and Nicolay:

"It was impossible to defeat or greatly delay the annexation of Texas, and it showed a certain lack of sagacity on the part of the Whigs not to recognize this fact. Here was a great empire offering itself to us, a State which had gained its independence, and built itself into a certain order and thrift through American valor and enterprise. She offered us a magnificent estate of 376,000 square miles of territory, all of it valuable and much of it of unsurpassed richness and fertility. Even those portions of it once condemned as desert now contribute to the markets of the world vast stores of wool and cotton, herds of cattle and flocks of sheep. Not only were these material advantages of great attractiveness to the public mind, but many powerful sentimental considerations reinforced the claim of Texas. The Texans were not an alien people. The few inhabitants of that vast realm were mostly Americans, who had occupied and subdued a vacant wilderness. The heroic defence of the Alamo had been made by Travis and David Crockett, whose exploits and death form one of the most brilliant pages of our border history. Fannin and his men, 400 strong, when they laid down their lives at Goliad, had carried mourning into every southwestern State: and when, a few days later, Houston and his 800 raw levies defeated and destroyed the Mexican army at San Jacinto, captured Santa Anna, the Mexican President, and, with American thrift, instead of giving him the death he merited for his cruel murder of unarmed prisoners, saved him to make a treaty with, the whole people recognized something of kinship in the unaffected valor with which these borderers died, and the humorous shrewdness with which they bargained, and felt as if the victory over the Mexicans was their own. Under these conditions the annexation, sooner or later, was inevitable. . . . Whenever a region contiguous to the United States becomes filled with Americans, it is absolutely certain to come under the American flag."

Strip off the glowing words that cover them, and you find but two arguments in the above quotation, greed and revenge—the one worthy of an Ahab, the other of a burglar whose pal has been shot in the act of housebreaking. Compare with this the views of an impartial foreigner, expressed in 1862, when the slaveholders' triumph of nearly twenty years before was bearing bloody fruit. Prof. Cairnes says in his 'Slave Power':

"The annexation of Texas . . . has long passed into a by-word for unprovoked and unscrupulous plunder of a weak by a strong Power. The designs of its authors have always been notorious. . . . Texas, as all the world knows, was before its annexation to the Union a province of Mexico—a country at peace with the Union, and anxious to cultivate with it friendly relations. Mexico, however, was a weak State, still fresh from the throes of revolution. The district in question was one of great fertility, possessing in this respect, as well as in its climate and river communications, remarkable advantages for slave settlement; it was, moreover, but thinly peopled, and was separated by an immense distance from the seat of government. So early as 1821, while Spanish authority was still maintained in Mexico, 300 families from Louisiana were permitted to settle in this tempting region under the express condition that they should submit to the laws of the country. . . . As the colony increased in numbers and wealth, it became evident to the slave-owners of the neighboring States that they had a natural right to the territory. It offered an admirable field for slave cultivation; it was in their immediate proximity; of all claimants they were the strongest and 'smartest'; in short, they wanted the country, and felt themselves able to take it, and they resolved it should be theirs. 'Manifest destiny' beckoned them forward, and they prepared, with reverent submission to the decrees of Providence, to fulfil their fate."

Going on to speak of the wild-cat land speculation, and manufacture of fictitious titles, which was used to stir up interests hostile to Mexican rule in Texas, and the attempts of the Texan settlers to evade the Mexican laws against slavery, Prof. Cairnes says:

"The project of dismembering a neighboring republic that slaveholders and slaves might overspread a region which had been consecrated to a free population, was discussed in the newspapers as coolly as if it were a matter of obvious right and unquestioned humanity. The plot having been carried to this point, the consummation of the plunder was easy. A conspiracy was hatched; a rebellion organized; filibusters were introduced from the border States; and a population which, at the commencement of the outbreak, did not number 20,000 persons, asserted its independence, was recognized by the Federal Government, and with little delay annexed to the Union."

Now, in regard to this matter, it is not too much to say that Prof. Cairnes's statements are history, and Messrs. Hay and Nicolay's are not. This might be unimportant were it not that many thousands of the Century's readers have grown up since the annexation of Texas, and are likely to take the truth of Messrs. Hay and Nicolay's statements for granted. Then, too, when the Whig party is criticised for a lack of political wisdom in thinking with Lowell,

"Slavery, the earth-born cyclops, fellest of the giant brood,
Sons of brutish Force and Darkness, who have drenched the earth with blood,
Famished in his self-made desert, blinded by our purer day,
Gropes in yet unblasted regions for his miserable prey;
Shall we guide his gory fingers where our helpless children play?"

—such a calling of evil, good, and good, evil, should not pass unnoticed. B.

PHILADELPHIA, January 22, 1887.

LEGISLATION FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You are, I know, strongly opposed to anything that savors of the paternal in government; it did not need the humorous remarks appended to my previous letter to inform me as to that. Nevertheless, I have always believed that one man's rights end where another's begin, and that it is the business of Government to enforce this principle thoroughly. You would yourself be indignant, I think, if a hotel-keeper allowed you ignorantly to sleep in a room previously occupied by one having a contagious disease. But suppose you knew little about the danger of contagion, and that the choice lay between taking that room or sleeping in the street; you might, perhaps, occupy that room even if not wholly ignorant of its danger. But would that excuse the landlord for not having had the room disinfected?

Now, these two cases are exactly parallel to those of poor workpeople who undertake work that is either dangerous in itself or by its surroundings: either they do it in ignorance, or, not being wholly ignorant, they have virtually no choice—it is that or hunger and exposure. What I say is simply that the State should interfere and require employers not to expose work-people to avoidable dangers—dangers to which they would not willingly expose themselves. I shall make my case plainer and stronger by a few examples.

At a factory in my neighborhood there is much filing of iron. The filers get their lungs filled with angular bits of iron: consumption follows, sickness, and death. The evil might be averted by the use of magnets, as is done in some factories; it is even found that the iron collected almost pays the interest on the extra plant. The owner of the factory in question has had his attention called to the matter, but refuses to make the change on account of the cost; his workpeople continue to suffer.

A house in my neighborhood is liable to have its cellar overflowed several times a year. This could be prevented by the expenditure of a hundred dollars, which the owner will not make. The house is occupied by a large family of very industrious and worthy workpeople. Last autumn every member of the family was down with typhoid. The house continues to be overflowed.

A factory makes red prussiate of potash, largely used in the arts for making one of the varieties of Prussian blue. The work is so dangerous that it has to be carried on in the open air. None of the people employed being willing to work the stirrer, a raw hand (of course ignorant of the danger) was engaged. When I had occasion to visit the factory, this man, at the end of a month's work, had his lungs fatally injured. Two other men, within a few days, had been overcome and rescued at the risk of life, by others.

You will say perhaps that these are exceptional cases. If they were, they should not exist even as exceptions. Unfortunately they are not. Many forms of manufacture are surrounded with danger. Thousands of hands are employed in making phosphorus matches. The vapors of phosphorus produce necrosis of the jaw-bone, which crumbles to pieces. This may be prevented, either by the use of a certain (more expensive) variety of phosphorus, or by very perfect ventilation. Should not one or the other be made obligatory? The manufacture of bichromate of potash, now used in immense quantities in the arts, tends to the production of terrible ulcers, and to the destruction of the septum between the nostrils. In the production of some of the aniline colors, arsenic acid, a very dangerous form of arsenic, is used by the ton.

In all these cases the amount of danger to the workman depends upon the amount of precaution used. Precaution means expense: the man who incurs least can the better compete with other manufacturers. Shall his workpeople be left to his mercy? Are you quite sure that inspectors are as superfluous as you seem to say?

M. C. L.

PHILADELPHIA, January 15, 1887.

DOMESTIC SERVICE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION.

SIR: The trouble with domestic service in this country arises from the fact that the rules governing the intercourse of mistress and house-servant are an importation from Europe, where society is organized on a totally different basis. Europe is a country of classes, differing essentially from each other. Lord and peasant are as distinct breeds as Jersey and Durham cattle; or, if not so in fact, yet society is organized on the supposition that they are, and men fill the positions to which they find themselves born. But among white Americans there are no classes at all. There are individual differences, but nothing more. In the next generation the children of the servants may be the gentlefolk, and the children of the gentlefolk the servants, and such changes are often seen. And yet the average American woman no sooner gets money enough to be able to hire a housemaid than she assumes a manner towards her which implies that she considers the distance between them something immense. And if the mistress be very rich, she acts as though her servants belonged to an inferior order of beings.

If you live in the country, you will find no difficulty in hiring an American man-of-all-work, coachman, or gardener, provided you do not want him to wear livery. If you get the right sort of a man, you will find that he is neither servile nor over-familiar, but he will show by his actions that he does not think that the receiving of your money for his work constitutes you in any respect a superior being to himself. His daughter is willing to work, and would like to earn money, but nothing will induce her to enter your wife's service as cook or housemaid, because it is an implied condition of such service that the servant shall take a distinctly lower social position, be treated as if belonging to a different class, and sacrifice something of self-respect. And so your wife is compelled to put up with the service of ignorant foreigners, who, being in fact of a different class, can be treated as such.

It seems to me that the fact that American girls will not go out to service under present conditions, but prefer much harder and less remunerative labor as seamstresses or teachers, or in factories or shops, is not only not a bad symptom, but is a distinctly good one. It shows that they prefer self-respect to money. The blame for this state of things rests, not upon the servants, but upon the mistresses, and we shall never have a better state of things until ladies learn how to treat their servants.

This does not by any means imply that employers and servants are to live in the same rooms or eat at the same table. Any intelligent hired girl will understand that the employer's family prefer to be by themselves, especially at meal time. But it implies a general change of manner, and, more than that, of feeling. Take the case mentioned by your Philadelphia correspondent, "A. S.," of the lady who went out to service as housemaid, but left the situation because her employers "seemed unconscious of her existence." Such insulting behavior is as much out of place towards your housemaid as towards your lawyer or your doctor, both of whom are, in a sense, your hirelings. Even the kindness and the favor usually shown by mistress to maid generally come in the form of condescension, de haut en bas, and are more irritating than downright insults.

The reform will have begun when mistresses learn to say from their hearts of their servants as Job said of his, "Did not he that made me in the womb make him, and did not one fashion us in the womb?" But, of course, it will take two or three generations of changed conduct to convince American girls that domestic service is respectable.

These views are not mere theory. An experience of about forty years in one household conducted on these principles has—I cannot say, avoided all trouble, for then would the millennium have come—but has made life much easier for this household than it has been for the most of our neighbors. R.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The duties of a cook, and still more of a maid-of-all-work, demand more general intelligence and technical skill than are often found among uneducated women, and more muscular strength than is often found among educated women. The requisite intelligence is developed in great numbers of poor girls by the public schools, and if the same schools afforded a thorough muscular training by means of calisthenic exercises and a well-appointed gymnasium, the supply of competent domestics would, no doubt, be greatly increased.

SUE HARRY CLAGETT.

PORTLAND, OREGON, January 16.

COMPARATIVE POLITICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The history of representative government, as I have frequently remarked, is the history of a struggle for power between executive and legislature; and the future of that government depends in great measure upon the solution of the problem of their relations. The observation of political students is, therefore, directed largely, and more or less consciously, to that point, and I ask permission to call in two or three witnesses.

(1.) Dr. Th. Barth is a member of the German Reichstag, and those who were so fortunate as to meet him in this country cannot have failed to be impressed with his broad views and clear intellect. Speaking in his own paper, the Berlin Nation, of our politics, he says:

"There is, perhaps, in no country where a parliament exists, a sovereign who, in cases of conflict, stands armed with such power against the parliament as the President of the United States has against the House of Representatives. He is the elected trustee of the people just as much as the Representatives, and, moreover, the trustee of the whole people. Equipped with this authority he can successfully withstand the will of a parliamentary majority, and is never compelled to sacrifice his ministers to such a majority. How different in constitutional monarchies. The monarch is something permanent and withdrawn from public opinion. The parliament is the only form of constitutionally organized public opinion. In cases of conflict it is only through a dissolution of parliament that the monarch can obtain proof that his advisers represent public opinion better than parliament."

This statement is no doubt true as regards the negative power of the President, but unfortunately it is not true of positive power, of which, except by illegitimate methods, he has none at all. With all his position as the chosen agent of the whole people, he can only veto, he cannot initiate a policy. He can resist Congress, he cannot compel it. It is just in order to remedy this defect that the admission of the Cabinet to seats in Congress is advocated.

(2.) A correspondent of the London Times, speaking of the resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill, says that "it forces on our notice another dangerously weak place in the arrangements of the British Constitution. We have been brought full in view of a further crumbling away of parties. We have been full in view of a serious diminution of our defensive and aggressive forces. We have been in view of a resignation of the Government, and a change in the British Government may have consequences extending from Canadian fishermen to Burmese dacoits. It is one of the most widely extending catastrophes which can occur in the world." Then, after treating of the financial methods of Parliament and our Congress, the writer proceeds:

"Under the French Constitution, which is a muddle of the American Federal and of the British Constitutions, such a Committee as has been sketched proposed the other day a financial policy wholly different from that adopted by the Ministry, and, the Chamber of Deputies having adopted the recommendation of the Committee, the Ministers resigned. Of course, so long as the British Constitution exists, no Government can be prevented from taking the sense of the House of Commons on financial proposals which it considers to be fatal or dangerous to its efficiency and from resigning upon defeat. But it is clear that if the House is ever to resume its financial powers, there ought to be an understanding that differences from the Executive Government not going to the root of policy are not to involve the retirement of Ministries. The sensitiveness as to the confidence of the House of Commons which British statesmen affect, may seem at first sight a tribute to its authority, but in reality it is the means of depriving the House of the greatest part of its power, by attaching to its most important and perhaps most necessary resolutions the penalty of dismissing the whole Executive Government and perhaps convulsing the whole of the empire."

So far from the fixed term of President and Cabinet being an objection to the latter appearing in Congress, it may well prove to be an advantage in that they can fight out their battles with Congress, leaving to the country at the elections to decide between the two. The following extract from the London Spectator will speak for itself, if for the words "Lord Salisbury" and "Premier" is read "Cabinet." It turns upon the fact that Lord Salisbury, as a Peer, has no seat in the House of Commons:

"During the whole of the recent crisis, the first and greatest difficulty was obviously this—that while our Government is deliberative and not personal, and while all real power centres in the House of Commons, the head and soul and mouthpiece of that Government could not open his lips within that assembly. Suppose next month Mr. Smith has to talk about an Austrian alliance. The Premier can take no part in debate, can announce no personal resolution, can give no direct aid whatever towards the carrying of the vote on which the fortunes of the empire may depend. A more utterly stupid waste of a man than is committed when Lord Salisbury is locked up in the House of Lords, with a great debate going on in the Commons and all England thirsting to hear what he has to say, cannot be conceived; yet both parties bear it, as if his mouth were closed by some law of nature. Where is there any solid reason why the Premier, if already a member of one House, should not walk into the other and say what he wants to utter and the House wants to hear? That he should not vote is intelligible, for votes represent electors; but that condition does not impair his right to speak in the House, which is not given him as a personal boon, but for the general benefit of the nation. Every wretched little member may talk till the House is sick of him, and long after; but the Premier may not open his mouth, even when war and peace may be hanging on information which he alone fully possesses. It will be observed we are not asking for a great constitutional change. All over the Continent the Ministers of the Crown or the Republic sit ex officio in either house from the day they are appointed. The present Minister of France, for example, has never been elected to either Chamber; but we are not asking for such a change as that, though we deem it advisable. We have too deep a respect for British nerves. A mere relaxation of etiquette would, in fact, enable both houses to admit any head of Government to explain anything they wish to have explained; yet we suppose that in this country of sensible men we might as well propose that a jury should consist of thirteen. We felicitate ourselves that we are not as Chinese, but for some ceremonials we would all die." G. B.

BOSTON, January 22, 1887.

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS ONCE MORE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Limited knowledge" may be accurate as far as it goes, but it may lead one into very great inaccuracies. You have committed yourself so explicitly on the matter of religious statistics that I am afraid you are in the toils. It is not necessary to resort to the methods you describe to make up the "deficiency" of $112,522 in the receipts of the Board of Foreign Missions of the (Northern) Presbyterian Church, as compared with the amount reported in the General Assembly's Minutes, when the Woman's Board acknowledges $224,025, leaving the "deficiency" the other way to about the same amount, and showing (what I have always observed in my own experience) that it was impossible to get adequate reports from the churches of what is actually done, as so much does not pass through the church treasurer's hands.

With regard to home missions, I have not the figures, but can readily account for the difference without reckoning $191 as sent to each man commissioned by the Board. In the Southern Presbyterian Church we are instructed to fill up the blanks with the amount sent to the Central Committees and kindred objects. A vast amount of home-mission work is done with which the Committee (or Board) has nothing to do. The church of which I am pastor, for instance, has this year built a mission school-house, and a thousand dollars will be reported as given to home missions that the general agency never saw. If we give several hundred dollars towards the endowment of a chair in a theological seminary, we report it as given to the cause of education, but it will not appear in the report of the Committee on Education. So a good deal of money goes direct to the foreign field for building churches and for other enterprises, where the Committee feels unable to undertake them. It is, of course, reported as given to foreign missions.

Then where is the objection to reporting money that is given to an undenominational object? A church of another denomination was destroyed by the great fire in this city last year. To my mind the money given by my church to rebuild it is a higher illustration of loving one's neighbor as one's self than if it had been given to a Presbyterian church.

With regard to statistics of membership, the case is different. As one who makes an effort to have the church rolls purged annually, I know it is a difficult matter. We have to carry every year a certain number that cannot be shelved, and yet that are practically not with us.—Very respectfully, PEYTON H. HOGE.

WILMINGTON, N. C., January 12, 1887.

[If Dr. Hoge will look again, he will see that he is completely in error in his reference to the Woman's Board. The $224,025 referred to was all turned over to the central treasury and acknowledged by it among "donations from the churches"; this being fully taken into the account in our reckoning. We do not see how Dr. Hoge, after his last two sentences, can escape being made a victim of the Independent's deadly argument (which it seems to regard as a complete reductio ad absurdum), "We never heard of this before."—ED. NATION.]

PROTECTION AGAINST WESTERN WHEAT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following clipping from an Ohio newspaper may serve to illustrate the growth in logical consistency of some advocates of protection. The oft-repeated suggestion of the Nation that if protection is beneficial as applied to our foreign trade relations, it should be equally beneficial as a regulator of inter-State traffic, seems here to be adopted in good faith and seriousness. It should be stated that the clipping is not from an editorial, but from an interview with a man prominent in local railway matters; but the opinions expressed do not seem to the editor to call for reprehension or even comment:

"I think the Inter-State Commerce Bill will be a good thing. It will cause the railroads to pay more attention to the local traffic, and the people will get the benefit. By killing off some of the through shipments from the West, these Eastern farmers will get more protection. You see, there are large tracts of land out there in the West, and the men here with capital buy up a few thousand acres and send out a company of immigrants to till it. The grain that these people in the West raise comes here in competition with that of Eastern farmers, who have taxes to pay and large expenses for cultivation and labor. By shutting off these through shipments, the people here will be benefited. The local trade will be stimulated by lowering local rates, which the Inter-State Commerce Bill will do if passed."

The protection of the local grain producer is not ordinarily dwelt upon by the advocates of the claims of the American laborer to protection. C.

OHIO, January 16, 1887.

THE DERIVATION OF SAUNTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I thank you for your very kindly notice of my 'Short Stories from the Dictionary' and for pointing out one of the "pitfalls" in the way of the student of the history of words, even though you indicate it by means of a slip in my little book. My pages show that I based my work on Webster's Dictionary, the accomplished editors of which have fallen more completely into this particular pitfall than I have in my incidental reference to the word "saunter" on page 46. The fact that saunter is also written "santer," seems to afford some support to the theory of its connection with Sainte Terre, which has been asserted from 1755 (when it was given in the revised edition of Bailey and by Dr. Johnson) to the days of Webster's latest revision, though it seems more probable that it bears some relation to the Italian santa terra or the French sans terre (homeless one). No one has yet remarked that the French expression is not Sainte Terre, but Terre Sainte, which would, of course, upset the theory of the derivation of saunter from it. In justice to myself perhaps I may be allowed to say that Skeat's Dictionary was published in parts, and that the portion treating saunter had not come into my hands at the time that 'Short Stories from the Dictionary' was written, though I was aware that the derivation was questioned, and I ought to have referred to the fact.—Yours truly,

ARTHUR GILMAN.

CAMBRIDGE, January 21, 1887.

Notes.

C. N. CASPAR, Milwaukee, sends us a Supplement to his 'Directory of Antiquarian and Second-hand Booksellers of the United States,' which will, he states, be shortly out of print. He now issues the prospectus of a more ambitious work, viz., a 'General Directory of the American Book, News, and Stationery Trade, and Kindred Branches, Wholesale and Retail, of the United States and Canada.' The second division of this directory will contain a digest of the lists of the American publishers—"a systematical and analytical key to the nature and kind of all books published" in the two countries. This, of course, will be based on the 'Trade-List Annual,' and its value is obvious. The third division will be a digest of price-lists. Subscriptions should be made through the Publishers' Weekly, 31 Park Row, New York.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia, are about to publish, in connection with Adam and Charles Black, Edinburgh, a new library edition of the Waverley Novels in twenty-five volumes. The typography is very bold and distinct.

A new and thoroughly revised edition of 'Nuttall's Standard Dictionary,' edited by the Rev. James Wood of Edinburgh, in which etymologies as well as pronunciation will be given, and which will be freely illustrated, is in the press of F. Warne & Co.

Mr. Charles R. Hildeburn has just issued the second and last volume of his full and accurate work, 'A Century of Printing: The Issues of the Press in Pennsylvania, 1764-1784' (Philadelphia). The first volume, which was noticed in these columns in November, 1885, brought the list down to 1763, and contained 1,935 titles; the present records 2,707 titles for the years 1764 to 1785. An index of authors and titles, with a few subject entries, ends the volume. It is a question of conscience with an index-maker how far he shall permit himself the use of the block system, and annex to indexed words simple lists of all the pages on which they occur, thus ornamenting the page with symmetrical and economical blocks of figures, while effectually blocking the progress of the hunter after references. Mr. Hildeburn has restricted himself to names of individuals, and to the subjects "Proclamations" and "Votes." No advantage seems to be gained by printing the catchword in capitals.

We had intended to mention, in connection with the conclusion of Mr. Lodge's edition of Hamilton's Works, Mr. Paul Leicester Ford's 'Bibliotheca Hamiltoniana,' privately printed, in an edition of 500 copies, by the Knickerbocker Press, in typographical conformity to Mr. Lodge's volumes. It includes works written by or relating to Hamilton, and indicates the libraries in which they may be found. It is an excellent performance.

Apropos of this statesman, it is significant that he is not cited in the eulogistic compilation of 'Character Portraits of Washington,' selected and arranged by W. S. Baker (Philadelphia: Robert M. Lindsay). This was perhaps hardly ingenuous, since a quotation is made from Robert C. Winthrop in which the following passage occurs: "From his illustrious friend, Alexander Hamilton, I need not cite a word. His whole life bore testimony, more impressive than words, to an admiration and affection for his great chief which could not be exceeded, and which no momentary misunderstandings could shake." Twenty quarto volumes like this would fail to show the true character of the Father of his Country.

The 'Beecher Book of Days' (Cassell & Co.) has been edited by two ladies with unusual aptness, for often they place beneath the name of the eminent man born on the given date some remark of Mr. Beecher's about him, or some sentiment appropriate to his character.

In 1883 Carlton McCarthy, Richmond, Va., began publishing a series of pamphlet "Contributions to a History of the Richmond Howitzer Battalion." The fourth appeared before the close of last year, and the end is not yet. They well deserve to find a place in every public library and in any private collection on the war. To a large extent they consist of diaries; in the case of the battle of Big Bethel, both the Confederate and the Federal official reports are appended to the narrative. The value of these unpretentious reminiscences and records is very great, as assisting both to a knowledge of military events and to a conception of the soldier's life. Many shrewd observations find expression, as this: "It is my opinion that it takes a better, braver, and cooler man to stand by his 'piece' during an engagement than it does to charge any line of battle ever formed, and for this reason"—the artillerist's comparative freedom from excitement, and want of protection and of that moral support which animates a charge in line. One finds here, of course, the lost cause still judged the better one, but it is something to "come to the solemn, reverential conclusion that God fought that battle [of Gettysburg], and that neither party of the combatants was responsible for its issues."

The Brooklyn Magazine will, on April 15, change its name to that of the American Magazine, and provide illustrations of a high class.

The Art Review (New York) for December announces that Mr. Muybridge, the original photographer of the 'Horse in Motion,' has for three years, under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania, been collecting material for a work on 'Animal Locomotion,' human beings included. The Photogravure Company of New York is now making the 781 plates, the letterpress to which is to be furnished by professors of the University. A hundred plates make a "volume," and the subscriber may select them from the total number, at the price of $100 or so. More than half the edition is said to be subscribed for.

L'Art (Macmillan), in the two numbers for December ending the past year, continues its articles on American art museums, coming to the Metropolitan Museum of this city, of whose director M. A. de Latour speaks in terms that would be libellous here. A series of papers on the collections at Chantilly is begun, and is illustrated by a portrait of the princely donor, and by many views of the Château and its art treasures. As attractive as any of the full-page illustrations is an etching of "Un Mousse" after Ulysse Butin. In the first January number, there is a superb etching by Daniel Mordant after Nicholas Maes, "The Dreamer."

French art is honored in the Portfolio for January (Macmillan) in the person of the sculptor Auguste Rodin, of whose works there are several spirited examples, including the admirable bust of Victor Hugo. In an article on Mr. G. F. Watt, apropos of his first gift to the National gallery, Mr. F. G. Stephens describes the works of this English master of the brush now deposited at South Kensington; but the sole illustration is of the hugest and the least inspired of the canvases which were exhibited in New York—the carter and his horses, or "Mid-day Rest." It gains by being etched. There is also an etching of Temple Bar. Mr. Reginald T. Blomfield, writing of the old half-timber houses in the Weald of Kent and its neighborhood, undertakes to fix the approximate date of the introduction of chimneys into this class of houses at 1591, or thereabouts. Collaterally he cites Shakspere in "King Henry IV., Part I, act 2, scene 1, where the carrier in the inn yard says: "Charles' wain is over the new chimney." The first edition of this play appeared in 1598.

The editor of the Photographic Times of this city has compiled from it an 'American Annual of Photography, and Photographic Times Almanac for 1887' (Scovill Manufacturing Co.), adding much besides of great interest and convenience to members of the craft, whether professional or amateur. Yet how greatly its practical value would have been enhanced by making the index analytical, bringing the articles on lenses, plates, films, toning, developing, washing, printing, etc., together in one view. Several silver and heliotype prints serve to adorn this volume. The advertisements should not be omitted in enumerating the useful matter it contains.

From John Heywood, Manchester, we have Almonds and Raisins, the Vegetarian Society's annual for 1887, in its fifth issue. For a frontispiece it has a steel engraving (from 'Lodge's Portraits') of Gen. Eliott, the heroic defender of Gibraltar, and a vegetarian and teetotaler. Shelley's vegetarianism is insisted on, in another article, as being "in keeping with his whole character, and essential to his imaginative style of writing." Mr. W. E. A. Axon sets forth the vegetarian aspect (among others) of Buddhism, and contributes several short poems. Recipes close the annual.

We have received the bulky 'Estadística Comercial de la República de Chile' for the year 1885, compiled by Señor Juan B. Torres, chief of the department of commercial statistics. It has to report a general falling off in the trade movement, in keeping with that which marked the principal nations of the civilized world during the same period. The imports from the United States to Chile fell away nearly 35 per cent., the most marked discrepancy being in machinery and tools. On the other hand, our imports from Chile increased nearly 22 per cent.

From Dietrich Reimer, Berlin, we have four more sheets of the great map of Attica prepared by officers of the Prussian General Staff. No. 13 shows Pentelicus; No. 14, Markópulo; Nos. 14, 15, Cape Sunium. The contour lines, the heights, the roads, the indications in red of ruins or of traces of former structures, characterize these plates as they did their predecessors; the scale being 1:25,000. The text to accompany this and the preceding set is reserved for the concluding issue, which is now not far off.

The publishers of Petermann's Mittheilungen have just issued their index number to the eighteen volumes which have appeared during the years 1875-1884. It has the same general character as the previous index, but is much larger. Instead of two there are now four sheets of index maps, which are so divided by various kinds of colored lines, accompanied by figures and in many cases by the names of travellers, that it is comparatively easy at a glance to see whether there is a map of any particular part of the world, the volume in which it is contained, its scale and character (as, for instance, whether it is simply geographical, or geological, or statistical). A study of these index maps is interesting as showing the directions which recent geographical investigation has taken. In Europe, Germany and the Balkan States; in Asia, the Afghan frontier, have been the greatest points of interest, while Equatorial Africa still surpasses all other parts of the world in the number of maps devoted to it.

We have before now remarked on the extreme frequency with which French writers for the young "annex" American books, arranging or adapting them very much as French plays are arranged and adapted for the American theatres. Among the announcements of the always admirable Magasin illustré d'Éducation et de Récréation, founded by the late P. J. Stahl, is "Les Jeunes Filles de Quinebasset," by J. Lermont, "d'après S. May"—a wholly inadequate acknowledgment, it seems to us, yet beyond redress till we join the Copyright Union.

A year or so ago we noted the most amusing misprint of a French word in an English book, whereby Mme. de Maintenon was styled a "glorieuse modiste," and we have now to note a droll blunder in an English word in a French book. In M. Alfred Copin's 'Talma et la Révolution' (Paris: L. Frinzine & Cie.; New York: F. W. Christern)—the first of three volumes on Talma's life, likely to be both interesting and useful—there is quoted a letter of Regnier's in which he adduces, as evidence of Talma's knowledge of English, the fact that he had in his library at his death a set of "Shakspere's Aromatic Works"—as strange a misprint for "Dramatic" as one could well imagine.

Frinzine & Cie., by the way, are now issuing a handsome octavo edition of M. Jules Barbey d'Aurevilly's "Les Œuvres et les Hommes," of which the third volume, 'Sensations d'Histoire,' has just appeared. The preceding volumes were 'Sensations d'Art' and 'Les Critiques, ou les Juges jugés.' The papers of which these volumes are composed have appeared during the last thirty years in various Parisian newspapers, especially the Constitutionnel, Pays, and Nain jaune. Many years ago the first five volumes of the series appeared in a much less luxurious form than the present one, but this original edition has long been out of print, and now the publishers announce a new and enlarged edition of these also, uniform with the three volumes that have recently been issued. The first of these, 'Les Philosophes,' is announced as in preparation. The other volumes to be republished are 'Les Historiens,' 'Les Poètes,' 'Les Romanciers,' 'Les Bas-Bleus.' M. Barbey d'Aurevilly is himself a novelist and a poet as well as a critic. To which of the various categories the new work upon the Middle Ages that he is now preparing belongs, it would be difficult to decide.

A second, "revised and enlarged" edition of Dr. Georg Brandes's 'Moderne Geister: Literarische Bildnisse aus dem Neunzehnten Jahrhundert,' has just been published in Frankfort-on-the-Main. This issue, in addition to the articles upon Paul Heyse, Renan, Flaubert, John Stuart Mill, Hans Christian Andersen, Tegnér, and Björnson, reprinted from the edition of 1882, contains four additional "literary portraits." The essay on the Danish poet Frederik Paludan-Müller has been omitted, for the reason, as stated in the preface, that it can be found by German readers elsewhere, namely, as the introduction to Emma Klingenfeld's translation of the poet's best known work, 'Adam Homo.' Of the chapters added to this edition, the one upon Henrik Ibsen was included in Prof. Anderson's translation, entitled 'Eminent Authors of the Nineteenth Century,' so that to American readers but three chapters, some sixty-eight pages in all, are new. These treat of Max Klinger, Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, and Turgeneff, and, with the article on Ibsen, constitute the latest work of Brandes included in the book, being dated (the first two) 1882 and (the last two) 1883. Readers familiar with Brandes's productiveness need hardly be told that he has since written enough to make several volumes of the size of 'Moderne Geister.'

No. 2, vol. i, of the Revue Générale du Droit et des Sciences Politiques (Bucharest), contains an article by Prof. Gneist on the administrative reforms accomplished in Prussia by the legislation of 1872-1876. This series of laws is concerned with local self-government in the Circle and Amtsbezirk (administrative subdivision of the circle). It also treats of the bureaucratic officials in province, district, and circle, in so far as they entertain appeals from, and preside over, the local self-governing organs. This great system originated in the brain of Baron vom Stein, and has been elaborated and carried out by Bismarck—not the least among the many debts that Germany and humanity generally owe him.

—Mr. Henry J. Morgan's 'Annual Register' (Toronto: Hunter, Rose & Co.) for 1885 is not so unpunctual as our notice of it, which, after all, must needs be somewhat perfunctory. To this excellent work every one must turn who wishes a summary review of what is going on across the Canadian border. The great events of 1885 in the Dominion were the Riel rebellion and the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and among the minor happenings are to be noted the smallpox outbreak and fanaticism in Montreal, and the return of the Canadian voyageurs from Wolseley's expedition up the Nile. The chief deaths of the year were those of Riel and of Sir Francis Hincks. Our neighbors were, like ourselves, occupied with the liquor question, with civil-service reform, with restriction of Chinese immigration. In regard to the last, the expedient was adopted of taxing every incoming Chinaman (with certain exceptions) fifty dollars, as recommended recently for all immigrants to this country by a correspondent in these columns. In dread of evils not yet experienced, Parliament assumed its constitutional right to fix the qualifications of Dominion voters, the rule heretofore having been that the voter qualified for State suffrage was thereby entitled to vote for representatives in the Dominion House of Commons. To pass this bill without complications, Sir John Macdonald allowed the provision for female suffrage to be slaughtered, though professing sympathy with it. An écho de France is the fate of a bill to punish seduction, which did not get beyond a second reading. It had thrice in former years passed the House, but had been killed in the Senate, where we may suspect the French Canadian influence to predominate. Mr. Morgan's review of literature is this year confined to a bare list of 122 copyrighted works. The Library of Parliament, having grown national in its proportions, was provided by law with two librarians, one general and one especially Parliamentary—a luxury at which we have not yet arrived. The National (alias Protective) Policy may be studied in the debates here reported; the Government eulogizing its workings, and the Opposition lamenting them.

—After nearly two years' delay, the Dunlap Society is at last ready to begin. Its first two publications will be sent to the members in a few days, and the third will follow shortly. It is simply a publication society, all its receipts being spent in books and pamphlets for its subscribers, and these relating to the stage in America. Its first publication will be the comedy of the "Contrast," written by Royall Tyler, afterwards Chief Justice of Vermont, and acted at the John Street Theatre in 1787, just a century ago. It was the first play by a native author which was acted by a professional company, and it contained the first "Yankee part." In his interesting introduction to the present reprint, Mr. McKee shows that the success of a purely American play with American characters was largely instrumental in the change of public opinion about the drama, and in relaxing the laws against the theatre. The second publication of the Society will be "The Father, or American Shandyism," the first comedy of William Dunlap, who was the historian of the American Theatre, and namesake of the Society. "The Father" was the second play by a native author acted by a professional company. The introduction to this is also the work of Mr. McKee, who supplies an outline sketch of Dunlap's career, and an elaborate and much-needed list of Dunlap's plays, with the dates of their writing, performance, and publication. Both of these books have been beautifully printed at the De Vinne Press. They can be had only by members. The annual subscription is five dollars, which may be sent to Mr. Thomas J. McKee, Treasurer, No. 338 Broome Street. As the third publication of the Society, Mr. Laurence Hutton is preparing a collection of the poetic addresses written for the opening of various American theatres during the past century and a quarter. Among the later issues will be Dunlap's "André," edited by Mr. Brander Matthews, with an introduction considering the many other plays on the subject of Arnold's treason. It is in contemplation to issue during the year a volume of 'Transactions,' containing a theatrical bibliography, Mr. Lawrence Barrett's recollections of Charlotte Cushman, etc.

—"The passage in Pliny," writes a correspondent, "to which Mr. Windsor, in No. 1123, was unable to refer for proof that the effect of oil on stormy waters is not a modern discovery, is in 'Historia Naturalis,' book ii, ss. 105. It consists, however, only in four words, namely, 'Omne [mare] oleo tranquillari.' He might have found a better proof-text for his purpose in the 'Natural Questions' of Plutarch. No. 12 in this series is headed, 'When the sea is sprinkled over with oil, why does it become calm?' He asks further, 'Is it, as Aristotle [died 323 B. C.] says, because the winds, slipping on the smooth oil, have no force, nor cause any waves?' He adds, among other things, 'It is to be considered whether the sea which is uneven is compacted and made smooth by the dense oil,' etc., etc. No student of Plutarch will hearken to doubts about the storm-stilling power of oil, based on that opinion's being a novelty. The venerable Bede tells a story in his 'Ecclesiastical History' which may be the earliest historical ground of our phrase concerning storm-soothing oil. His words, in the quaint old version, are these, verbatim et literatim: 'A certain priest, when he was sent into Kent, A. D. 651, to fetche Kinge Edwine's daughter to be married to King Oswin, went to Bishop Aida beseeching his prayers, etc. The Bishop blessing them, and committing them to the goodness of God, gave them also hallowed oil, saying, "I know that when you shall have shipping, a tempe-t shall rise upon you sodirnly [sic]. But remember that you cast into the sea this oyle that I geue you," etc. All these things were fulfilled. Truly at the beginning of the tempest, when the waues and surges did chiefly rage, the shipmen essayed to cast ancar, but all in vaine. For the whaues multiphied so faste that nothing but present death was looked for In this distress, the priest at the length remembering the bishop's words, took the oyle-pot and did cast of the oyle into the sea; which being done, the sea calmed—and the ship passed on with a most prosperous voyage. No common reporter of uncertain rumors,' Bede adds, 'but a priest of our church, Cynimund by name, shewed me the process of this miracle.' The potencies of oil are traced far back of Bede or Plutarch by Menzel in 'Christian Symbolism.' According to his legendaries, the 'leaf plucked off' which the dove brought in her mouth to Noah was taken from the olive tree, the mother of oil, in pre-established harmony with the magical might of oil on water. He also intimates that children about one's table are called 'olive plants,' as being peacemakers in conjugal storms, or at least adapted to be."

—Mr. Thomas Sinclair, whose numerous contributions to imaginative literature have been for the most part either ignored or damned without even faint praise by English critics, has found for his last work a German translator who likes him. Toward the close of 1885, Mr. Sinclair published a collection of miscellanies under the name of 'Humanities,' and a part of this book now lies before us in a German version bearing the title 'Humanitätsstudien.' The original was published by Trübner & Co. of London, and the translation bears the imprint of Karl J. Trübner of Strassburg. The translator, Hans Schiffert Müller by name, explains that he was drawn to his author by the "worth of the man, by his [Sinclair's] pure love of beauty, and by the hope of regenerating the nations through the agency of a neu sich bildende Kunst," that is, we suppose, through a new Renaissance. This may be a pretty enough programme, but we greatly fear that Mr. Sinclair and his translator combined have accomplished but little toward carrying it out. The former gentleman has as a writer two unfortunate characteristics which will interfere with the success of his doctrine. The first is a lack of lucidity—a literary virtue which may not be absolutely necessary to a crier in the wilderness as such, but is quite indispensable to an evangelist who expects to move the world by an appeal to the æsthetic instinct. The other is a radicalism of view, or at least a violence of statement, which will repel the very people who need to be persuaded. The essay on Humanism, the only really readable portion of the volume before us, has as its burden the now familiar idea that Christianity destroyed a better civilization than it has yet given birth to. Nerva, Trajan, Antoninus, represent higher types of character than the world since their time has produced. "Judaizing Christianity," with its hostility to the beautiful, has been a long calamity to mankind. One of the saddest sights in modern Rome is to see old classical temples, in all their wholesomeness and purity, employed for the barbarous cult of Christianity, and so forth. We have heard all this before, from Heine, from Mlle. de Maupin, from Mr. Swinburne, and others. It is a gospel which offends not only the religious mind (its promulgators of course glory in that), but the scientific mind also. It proceeds upon a one-sided and false view of antiquity, a view very different from that reached by sober and careful scholarship. But how in these days is a great reform to make its way with both religion and science against it?

— A very exciting debate took place at an extra session of the Municipal Council of Milan, on the 29th of December last, upon a proposal to erect a statue to Louis Napoleon in the new square to be opened in the old parade-ground surrounding the arch of triumph built by Napoleon I. In the end the resolution was passed by the large majority of sixty-eight votes to six of the assembled councilmen. The history of this statue is very curious. One of the most memorable events in the progress of the Italian regeneration was when Victor Emanuel and Napoleon III., after having defeated the Austrians in Lombardy, entered, as liberators, the city of Milan, at the head of the allied armies of France and Italy. The enthusiasm of the Milanese for the patriot King and the French Emperor was unbounded. There was nothing they would not have done to testify their joy and gratitude. Almost, had anybody proposed to erect altars and worship the King and the Emperor as divinities, they would have voted it unanimously, as their ancestors the Romans had done to their Emperors. But with regard to Napoleon III. this enthusiasm soon waned away, for, after the victory of Solferino, on his own authority, and without consulting his ally, he signed a treaty of peace at Villafranca, in which, though liberating Lombardy from Austria, he allowed this Power to retain Venice and the fortresses of the quadrilateral. Moreover, he inserted in the treaty a provision that the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Modena, who had been expelled from their States, should be restored, and that Bologna, which had rebelled against the power of the Pope, should return to its allegiance; and, further, that a confederacy of all the Italian States should be formed under the "honorary" presidency of the Pope. The news of this treaty caused a painful dismay throughout Italy; Victor Emanuel signed it reluctantly, and Cavour was so indignant that he immediately resigned his premiership, and the King had some difficulty in calming his anger against what he considered the Emperor's duplicity. Louis Napoleon skulked back into France, passing hastily through Milan and Turin under very different auspices from those of his arrival.

— It is no wonder that even the Milanese cooled down considerably in their enthusiasm for Louis Napoleon. Their revulsion of feeling was intensified by his continued occupation of the Roman State to uphold the Pope, and by the defeat of the Garibaldians at Mentana, brought about by his French troops. But when his misfortunes came, with his terrible defeat at Sedan in 1870, a feeling of pity arose in many hearts in Italy, especially in Milan, where the people who had been oppressed by a foreign tyranny for nearly half a century could not forget the debt which they owed to the Emperor and the French army; and when, three years after, came the news of his death, the Milanese felt the old enthusiasm and sense of gratitude revive. A committee of citizens was formed for a public subscription to raise a statue to him, as to one who had contributed to liberate Lombardy from the Austrians. It was soon collected, and many eminent names appeared in the list of contributors, even among those whom one would have supposed hostile to it—for example, Gen. Sirtori, who had been Garibaldi's chief of staff in most of his campaigns. In a letter in which he defended his action against the attacks of some Radicals who accused him of inconsistency in his political principles, he stated that his act had no political meaning whatever; that it was merely one of gratitude—gratitude towards a man who might be reproached with many grave errors and wrongdoings, but to whom gratitude was certainly due for the part he took on that special occasion. The statue was ordered and finished, and is said to be a superb work of art; but when the question arose as to its being accepted by the city and erected in some public square, such strong opposition was manifested by the Radicals and irredenti that the Committee decided to let it remain where it had been exhibited, and where it still is. In this last session, however, most of the city Councilmen were known to be in favor of its acceptance and erection in a public place. The Mayor, who was a strong partisan of the project, brought the matter up, taking advantage of the improvements about to be made in the old parade-ground, and the proposition was voted by the large majority stated above.

—The new volume of 'Ersch and Gruber's Encyklopädie' is the thirty-ninth of the second section, and extends from Koeppen to Kriegk, being the eighth devoted to the letter K. Like its predecessors, it contains many titles which will be looked for in vain in any other encyclopædia, with the possible exception of Larousse's "Grand Dictionnaire." Among these may be mentioned the following, which do not appear at all in the 'Britannica': Peter von Köppen, Russian archæologist, and ethnographer, 1793–1864, occupying five pages—(this title occurs in 'Appleton's American Cyclopædia'); Korah (two pages, by Kautsch); Kordax, a dance of the older Greek comedy; Korórofa, a kingdom of Central Africa, mentioned in the second volume of Barth's travels, and visited by Robert Flegel in 1879 and 1882; and several others, some of which, however, are the names of German savants whom one would hardly expect to find in any but a German book. The article on the Copts occupies a page and a half in the 'Britannica' and five pages in 'Appleton's'; in 'Ersch and Gruber' there are twenty-four pages, of which ten are devoted to history, etc., twelve to language and literature—these two articles being by Ludwig Stern—and a third article of two pages, by another writer, on the Coptic Church. The article on the Koran covers nine pages, about the same space devoted to it by Nöldeke in the 'Britannica,' but does not treat of the position of the Koran in the dogma of Islam, or of its influence on the development of Mohammedan literature and science, referring for these topics to the article Mohammedanism, not yet published. It produces an almost odd effect to find in so learned a dissertation the following passage: "In Mecca Mohammed was a plebeian whose persistence occasionally became burdensome to the public, as does the shouting of the Salvation Army to the citizens of London, and whose personal history and activity among his adherents produced no deeper impression on the masses than the doings of 'General' Booth in the bosom of his 'Army.'" Other long articles are Cossacks, eleven pages; Kosegarten, ten pages; Kotzebue, nine pages, while Koerner has only four and a half; Corinthians (Epistles to the), eight pages; Crusades, fourteen pages. As indicating versatility may be mentioned articles on the Crossing of Breeds in Animals and Plants, on Cranes (derricks), three pages, and particularly one on Cosmetics, which would not be looked for in a work of erudition. It extends to three pages, and gives practical instructions for preventing baldness, removing dandruff, caring for the teeth, etc. An article of six pages is assigned to Humboldt's 'Kosmos,' and one of eight pages to War, the latter enumerating six causes of war, much as Touchstone mentions the seven degrees of the lie, to wit, "the Retort courteous, the Quip modest, the Reply churlish, the Reproof valiant, the Countercheck quarrelsome, the Lie with circumstance, the Lie direct."

McCLELLAN'S OWN STORY.—II.

McClellan's Own Story. The War for the Union, the Soldiers who fought it, the Civilians who directed it, and his relations to it and to them. By George B. McClellan, late Major-General commanding the armies. 8vo, pp. 678. New York: Charles L. Webster & Co. 1887.

In regard to his relations to Secretary Stanton, who is the bête noire of the story, the new matter of the volume has value—both that written by McClellan for publication and the correspondence added by his editor. In substance it is, that soon after reaching Washington he was introduced to Stanton, who was then a private citizen, as "a safe adviser on legal points," though what need he had of such advice, unless from the Attorney-General of the United States, is not clear. Stanton "did his best to ingratiate himself with me, and professed the warmest friendship and devotion. . . . The most disagreeable thing about him was the extreme virulence with which he abused the President, the Administration, and the Republican party. . . . He never spoke of the President in any other way than as the 'original gorilla.' . . . At some time during the autumn of 1861, Secretary Cameron made quite an abolition speech to some newly arrived regiments. Next day Stanton urged me to arrest him for inciting to insubordination. He often advocated the propriety of my seizing the Government and taking affairs into my own hands" (p. 152). Under date of November 17, his private correspondence shows that he goes "to Stanton's to ascertain what the law of nations is on this Slidell and Mason seizure" (p. 175). In the same letter he says he must "devote the day to getting our Government to take the only prompt and honorable course of avoiding a war with England and France," and declares himself "heavy at heart when I see the weakness and unfitness of the poor beings who control the destinies of this great country." It was a few days later that he was "concealed at Stanton's" to escape "'browsing Presidents,' etc.," noticed above. During McClellan's illness in December he learned from Stanton that the President, who had been denied access to the General, had committed to McDowell, Franklin, and Meigs the duty of inquiring into the state of the army, and what should be done if McClellan were to die. He says that Stanton put it, "They are counting on your death, and are already dividing among themselves your military goods and chattels" (p. 155). It was from Stanton that he got the information that the President and Cabinet were to hear the report of the three generals on January 12, and he "mustered strength enough to be driven to the White House, where my unexpected appearance caused very much the effect of a shell in a powder magazine. It was very clear, from the manner of those I met there, that there was something of which they were ashamed" (p. 156).

Diverging for a moment from the thread of the relations between Stanton and McClellan, it is necessary to note the extraordinary frame of mind which the last statement indicates. He had been ill for some three weeks—so ill that, although he professes to have directed business from his sick-bed, "it more than once happened" (as he himself says) that the President called and was "denied admittance" (p. 155). He also does not deny that his leading generals were ignorant of his plans, if he had any. When an officer is so ill, in time of war, that the Commander-in-Chief is denied admittance to him, it would require no apology and give no cause for being "ashamed," but, on the other hand, would have been the most ordinary and simple exercise of right, to have turned over the command to the next in seniority. It was widely believed at the time that the illness was exaggerated, and that the denying admittance to the President was an affront for which the sickness was a pretext rather than a reason. If, though it happened "more than once," it had been really due to the accident that the General was asleep after "intervals of wakefulness" when the President called in person at his house, it can hardly need to be said that the imperative duty of the General was to see that a very prompt opportunity was offered for an interview at the earliest moment at which he was fit for any business whatever. There is no pretence that this was done, and the revelation that Mr. Stanton found no such difficulty in reaching him does not help to clear up this period of McClellan's personal history. So far as it goes, it supports the old accusation that he took refuge in seclusion to escape pressure to act.

But to return: Stanton was nominated Secretary of War the day after the events last spoken of. McClellan says that Stanton immediately called upon him to confer with him as to its acceptance. He (Stanton) said "that the only possible inducement would be that he might have it in his power to aid me in the work of putting down the rebellion; that he was willing to devote all his time, intellect, and energy to my assistance, and that together we could soon bring the war to an end. If I wished him to accept he would do so, but only on my account; that he had come to know my wishes and to determine accordingly. I told him that I hoped he would accept the position" (p. 153). In his letter to Stanton himself, under date of July 8, 1862, McClellan uses stronger language, and says: "When you were appointed Secretary of War I considered you my intimate friend and confidential adviser. Of all men in the nation, you were my choice for that position" (p. 477). The disclosure of Stanton's previous attitude to the Administration and to Mr. Lincoln personally, if correct, raises the troublesome question how McClellan could, consistently with his loyalty to the President, either have made Stanton his confidential adviser previously, or favored his assuming the confidential relation of Cabinet officer to Mr. Lincoln. If he had really advised McClellan to make a coup d'état and seize the Government, as the General says he had "often" done, to make him Secretary of War when renewing assurances of personal devotion has too ugly a suggestion of willingness to coöperate illegally, and McClellan, in making such a statement, starts more perilous problems than he solves. Assuming that it was only wild talk (McClellan calls them "ebullitions of an intense and patriotic nature"), we cannot help asking if this was fair dealing with Lincoln? We have not the space, nor are we now concerned, to examine Mr. Stanton's side of the controversy. McClellan credits him with being consistent in declaring his wish to put down the rebellion at any cost, and implies that the "patriotic" idea of a coup d'état was thought of as tending to that end. The idea was not unfamiliar to him. As early as August 9, the time of his first "row" with Scott, he writes that he "receives letter after letter, has conversation after conversation, calling on me to save the nation, alluding to the Presidency, dictatorship, etc." Although he earnestly disclaims such an aspiration, he adds: "I would cheerfully take the dictatorship and agree to lay down my life when the country is saved" (p. 85). If Mr. Lincoln had known of this, no doubt he would have said to McClellan, as he did afterwards to Hooker, that if he would crush the rebellion he would take the risk of the dictatorship. Perhaps Lincoln knew more than the General thought, and it is barely possible that a painful interview between them, narrated on page 196, concerning "a very ugly matter," may have been connected with such knowledge; and he who listened to "conversation after conversation" suggesting treason could hardly be surprised when Mr. Lincoln used the word in connection with things attributed to him.

We are told that Stanton's manner changed immediately after he became Secretary of War, and McClellan concludes that it was because he had all along been in secret alliance with "the radicals," who "were unwilling that I should be successful." It is possible for those less prejudiced to think that when Mr. Stanton officially learned the extent to which the resources of the country had been put at McClellan's disposal, he, too, went through the process of disillusion which so many have undergone before and since. McClellan's editor supplements the charge of duplicity against Stanton by contrasting the Secretary's letter of July 5, 1862, at the close of the "seven days' battles," assuring the General of his real friendship and of his ardent desire that he may be victorious, with the statements of Secretaries Welles and Chase as to his hostility. Unfortunately, such contrasts were not confined to Stanton's side of the matter. In reply to the letter mentioned above, McClellan wrote to Stanton on July 8, saying, among other things: "It is with a feeling of great relief that I now say to you that I shall at once resume, on my part, the same cordial confidence which once characterized our intercourse" (p. 478); yet only five days thereafter he writes to his wife: "So you want to know how I feel about Stanton, and what I think of him now? I think . . . [asterisks in the text]. I may do the man injustice. God grant that I may be wrong! For I hate to think that humanity can sink so low. But my opinion is just as I have told you. He deceived me once; he never will again. . . . I now know you were right. Enough of the creature" (p. 447). As the editor selected and printed the above, and also wrote the note accusing Stanton of "private treason to a general in the field," is it not possible that the same leniency which does not find duplicity in the letters of July 8 and 13 might cover the Secretary with the same mantle of charity? And will not one who thoughtfully reads the whole story of McClellan's relations to both Lincoln and Stanton in his own narrative, as well as in the private correspondence which the editor has, discreetly or indiscreetly, added, find that he, at least, was living in a "glass house"?

There is abundant proof that Mr. Lincoln did his own thinking, and that, in this matter of the policy of the war, McClellan was dealing with him personally. It was he who criticised the General's plan of sailing to the peninsula, and pointed out the fact "that going down the bay in search of a field, instead of fighting at or near Manassas, was only shifting and not surmounting a difficulty; that we should find the same enemy and the same or equal entrenchments at either place" (p. 277). The letters of Lincoln show a clear and sound judgment on military matters in nearly every particular, and he made no error at all comparable with the fatal one by which the professional General multiplied his enemy at every juncture. It was McClellan who failed to take account of the fact that, even by the much-abused "Cram map," a line of four miles would connect Yorktown with the affluents of the James. It was he who failed to reckon upon the probability that the Confederates would entrench such a line in advance, when in fact they made three such lines, by either of which McClellan was as completely "bottled" as Butler at Bermuda Hundreds. It was he who declared the roads on the peninsula were passable at all seasons, when he found them impassable as soon as he arrived there. It was he who argued that on that line his right would be secure, when his communications were forcibly cut on that flank and the terrible "seven days" began in that way.

The criticism of Mr. Lincoln for recalling McDowell when Jackson appeared in the Shenandoah would have been just if he could have relied upon McClellan's activity and "push." But he could not do this in the face of his experience of the previous year, and the event showed that Lee could occupy McClellan with a much inferior force, while a detachment under Jackson was striking telling and distant blows. But besides all this, there remains the stubborn fact, which his 'Own Story' does not attempt to meet, that his army and his resources were still superior to his enemy, and that he was baffled by his own imagination, which continued to magnify his opponents.

Perhaps the most painful thing in this volume to those who once made Gen. McClellan their idol, is to see the revelation of blinding self-esteem which it exhibits. Neither in the state nor in the army does he find one man capable of guiding affairs. The country is ruled by rogues and incapables, and at the Chickahominy he declares that "it would be utter destruction to this army were I to be disabled so as not to be able to take command." McDowell, Halleck, Burnside, and Pope, as they by force of circumstances became his rivals, are stupid, dishonest, incompetent. He has some praise for a few of the regular officers who had been devoted followers of himself, or had been far removed from his sphere, but this is all. He has no word of recognition for the military achievements of Grant or Sherman or Sheridan.

Yet the army was devoted to him—so devoted that it was unjustly thought they would tolerate no other commander, and might mutiny if he were supplanted. Their enthusiasm for him was an advantage which determined his last appointment to command. There were several reasons for this—some of them good, some of them not so good. From headquarters the belief pervaded that great army that the skill of their commander saved them in conflicts against overwhelming odds, and had preserved them from being precipitated against a hundred and fifty thousand foes entrenched at Manassas. If they had known the truth as the pitiless pen of history is now picturing it, would they have been so enthusiastic? Would they have thought it a glory to have made good their retreat from the Chickahominy to the James, if they had known that by far the greater part of the enemy was engaged with Porter's single corps at Gaines's Mill? They took their commander at his word, and honestly believed that his genius had made them at least partly successful in a struggle of one against three or four, and that hardly "Father Abraham" had been just in estimating the odds opposed to them. A philosopher has said that "the sense of impossibility quenches all will," and the army was persistently and scientifically indoctrinated with the conviction that they were assigned to a task nearly if not quite beyond their physical powers. Braver men, better soldiers were never seen, and if there is any lack of the full accomplishment they were capable of, their commanders must bear the blame, and each of these in turn received the fatal legacy of a weak morale growing out of a false theory of the facts. For twenty years friend and foe have alike challenged the first commander of that army to justify his assertion that his enemy was multifold his superior in force. He has answered, and his answer is the silence on this point which is confession. To the soldiers who followed him is bequeathed the sad duty of doing justice to the Administration of Lincoln, and of readjusting the account of praise and blame, of glory and of humiliation.

GHIBERTI.

Ghiberti et son école. Par Charles C. Perkins. Paris: Jules Rouam. 1886.

LIKE previous works of the late lamented historian of the arts of Tuscany, this exhaustive monograph, on one of the most original of the Renaissance artists, is rather to be noted for its patient and thorough research, its compendious assimilation of the art studies of other authorities and its catholic appreciation, than for critical acumen or originality. It gives us all the material which exists for completing our idea of Ghiberti as a figure of his epoch and in his relations with his fellow-artists, but we shall look in it in vain for any luminous or original expression of the character of his art, or for subtle distinctions of artistic qualities in that of his epoch. Generous and comprehensive, even enthusiastic, as an amateur of the arts, Mr. Perkins somehow misses in his commentary the fundamental divisions which separate the vital and immortal manifestations of art from the emulations and semblances which the former always develop. His judgments never failed from want of research, but rather from want of fine discrimination between the considerations presented to him.

That with regard to Ghiberti Mr. Perkins was at a loss to form a definite and satisfactory estimate, is shown by his perplexity as to the artist's relation to the antique. It appears clearly enough, from the ensemble of the documents presented, that Ghiberti was sufficiently acquainted with antique sculpture to have undergone its influence as completely as any of his contemporaries; and his having been so slightly influenced as he was, according to Mr. Perkins, should have pointed directly to the cause in the limitations of his artistic faculties. Says the author:

"The field of observation being so restrained for Ghiberti, the influence of the antique, which shows itself in his 'Isaac,' is so much the more remarkable that this influence, which began to show itself so early, and which made him later one of the best connoisseurs and most famous collectors of his epoch, never incited him to treat classical subjects, nor to work in the Greco-Roman style. There is in this an enigma which is not easy to solve; and what surprises us still more is, that the antique had not sufficient influence on him to prevent the kind of picturesque debauch (débauche pittoresque) which characterizes his second manner. In fact, he seems there to ignore completely the natural limitations of sculpture which the ancients have always respected with such scrupulous care."

Now, nothing is clearer, among the comparisons which a wide study of art develops, than that which is here so nearly touched and yet missed. Ghiberti was not influenced more by Greek art for the simple reason that that art is one of ideals, of types, and Ghiberti had no sympathy with types. If we take the best Greek work in which there is any departure from the typical tendency and an attempt to tell a story, we must confess that the attempt is very lame—the pediments of the Parthenon not excepted, which, magnificent as are their broken fragments even, can have only been, in their most perfect state, a collection of types, very unsatisfactorily expressing the event they commemorated. Now, in none of Ghiberti's single statues is this study of type noticeable, but, on the contrary, the effort to develop the story-telling side of art. He had far more sympathy with Gothic art, which is primarily decorative (and by this alone kept within the limits of true art), and thus with the narrative-literary, as we might now call it. Naturally, as artist, he must have felt the supreme qualities of Greek sculpture, so far as its technique went; but there is nothing in his own art to show that he had any appreciation of what is the vital quality of the pure Greek art, the subjective development of types of beauty. Ghiberti was essentially modern in all his tendencies and achievements, and consequently without any root of sympathy with the motives of Greek art, however much he may have admired its technical triumphs.

The enigma which our author finds so difficult to solve ought to be no enigma at all—we see it repeated again and again in Veronese, in Rembrandt, wherever in art the decorative element dominated the ideal. We are disposed, besides, to differ with the author, though with less positiveness, in what he says of Ghiberti's work as that of a painter-sculptor—an idea which, however, he shows (p. 57) was not original with him, but due to Rumohr:

"In his first manner, such as it appears in his 'Sacrifice of Abraham' and in the bas-reliefs of the first door of the Baptistery, Ghiberti is much less painter-sculptor than in the second door, made after linear perspective, codified for the use of artists by Brunelleschi, had placed at his disposal resources until then unknown. Let us say, however, that the author of the doors worked as a painter from the beginning as much as was possible without the aid of perspective. In his bas-reliefs, in fact, he used landscape as background for his figures, and gave to these a peculiar lightness and flexibility (plasticité), calculating his shadows as an essential element of the effect sought for."

This is, while cognizant of certain distinctive qualities of the artist's work, and suggestive of their significance, not so close to the truth as not to be misleading. Ghiberti was not so much a painter-sculptor as a decorative sculptor. The general effect of his work as decoration was of vital importance; the particular value or perfection of parts, of very little. And with all due deference to any judgment differing from ours, we always have felt in presence of the gates of the Baptistery that the ornamental work par excellence, the borders and medallions of the first door, show a happier feeling and a more complete art than the more ambitious and intellectual subject bas-reliefs. But it is not the feeling of the painter, and perhaps if Mr. Perkins had been asked to define more clearly what he meant by painter-sculptor, and had not been misled by Rumohr, he would have said "designer in relief," for it is this character of designer in the more modern sense of the word—the decorative designer more distinctly—which distinguishes Ghiberti among his contemporaries. But so far from admitting that the term painter-sculptor was one which defined the quality of the artist, we should be disposed to say that it was owing to a deficiency of feeling for the aims of the painter and the charms of color, that his powers over relief were so subtle and remarkable. No just nomenclature of art will admit the use of the word "painter" where it is clear that the palette has no place and the resources of the artist are precisely those which dispense with color, as is the case in the work of Ghiberti.

Mr. Perkins traces the influences of prior art which had fallen on Ghiberti, but we apprehend that he carries too far complaisance to a certain worship of Dante which is much in vogue with the admirers of the art and thought of the Middle Ages, when he reckons him as the inspirer of Ghiberti.

"After having spoken of technique, let us consider the style of Ghiberti, which is that of an epoch already in part freed from the control of theology. Symbolism, allegory, convention, tradition, formulas, in fact, are no longer required; the artist enters into more direct relations with his epoch, he works under the double inspiration of nature and the antique. He owes his emancipation especially to the great poet of the 'Divine Comedy,' who, while solving in terms of the Middle Ages the problems which preoccupy him, does not lose sight for an instant of humanity and the real world."

This seems to us strained and inconsequent. That a culture which has vital causes in the spirit of its epoch should awaken the artist to efforts analogous to those of the writer, is most natural and probably of continual occurrence; but that there is any distinct relation between any form of literary work and the style or purely artistic side of the artist's work, we are disposed to deny entirely. The literary causes which enter into the character of a work of art, as distinguished from the purely pictorial, are always of inferior vitality; and, where they dominate, the art is always an inferior art. Not only is the picture which owes its effect to the story which it illustrates of a lower art, but the style which imitates or emulates literary qualities is invariably an artificial one, and, when its fashion is past, is sure to be consigned to the limbo of abortions. Dante might furnish subjects to Giotto or to Michael Angelo or Doré, but to suppose that he had any influence on the style of his illustrator is to go outside the capabilities of true art. Nor is it clear how the poet can affect the style of the artist, since they deal with elements the analogies between which are so remote that the translation is almost inconceivable. No more do the themes of Ghiberti or his contemporaries borrow their vitality from the 'Commedia.' The mediæval hell was not invented by Dante, but was accepted by him as it was, and, as was the religion of his time, as a mélange of paganism and a doctrine of a hopeful and progressive immortality. If Dante had invented his Inferno, no one in his time would have believed in him or it. To say, therefore, that painters were influenced by Dante because they painted the Inferno, is a most insufficient reasoning; and our author's dictum is one which could not occur to an art critic pure and simple—it borrows reasons from literature, which are always fallacious.

It is a refinement of critical acumen which makes Ghiberti's work so superior to that of other sculptors in his vein. As decorative ensemble, no doubt they are the most remarkable of their kind in existence, and Michael Angelo's hyperbolical commendation has done as much for them as their real merits; but as sculptor and in statuary he may easily be overrated, and, in fact, it seems to us that the very limitations of his genius were the cause of his remarkable success in what must, after all, be accepted as a secondary work of sculpture.

It seems to us unfortunate that Mr. Perkins had not (if he has not) written his work in English, because his French does not compensate for his native language: it reads heavily. But, to cease fault-finding, which is the reviewer's chief business, we must render complete homage to the thoroughness of the work done by Mr. Perkins in the collation and weaving into one of the most interesting of art biographies the materials for Ghiberti's life. The publisher's part is ill done—the illustrations are in the worst vein of process work, and most unworthy the book or any illustrated book in this day of perfected processes. An American publisher of good standing would be ashamed to furnish so important a book with a so poor artistic outfit.

SOME RECENT WORKS ON ETYMOLOGY.

Précis de Grammaire historique de la langue française. Par Ferdinand Brunot. Paris: G. Masson; New York: F. W. Christern. 1887. Pp. 692.

Dictionnaire étymologique. Par L. Pourret. Paris: A. Fourant; New York: F. W. Christern. 1886. Pp. 520.

An Etymological Dictionary of the French Language. By A. Brachet, translated by G. W. Kitchin. 3d edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan & Co. 1882. Pp. 407.

The Life of Words as the Symbols of Ideas. By Arsène Darmesteter. London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co. 1886. Pp. 173.

M. BRUNOT'S 'Grammaire historique' is much more ambitious than the analogous work published by M. Brachet twenty years ago. As the latter and his able translator, Mr. Kitchin, have not kept the older publication up to the requirements of modern science, it is natural that it should be superseded and surpassed. It may be doubted, however, whether the time has even now come when a complete French historical grammar can be written. There is as yet too little unanimity among the specialists of this branch of learning. The simplest forms give rise to too many contradictory statements. A single example may serve to show how much uncertainty yet exists in regard to the derivation of the commonest words. It is not necessary to look in very old French grammars to find the word oui, yes, explained as being the past participle of the verb ouïr, to hear. Then came the more logical and historical explanation, which accounts for the old form of the word, oïl, deriving it from hoc illud. This is probably accepted now by 99 per cent. of those who, without being specially etymologists, have generally correct ideas on French derivations. But of very late years the learned in phonetic changes have proved by analogy that the words hoc illud could never have given oïl, but only oël, so that one of them proposes as a solution the words hoc illic as the original of oïl. This etymology, for reasons which it would be pedantic to develop here, satisfies all the laws of letter changes from Latin to French. M. Clédat, in his 'Grammaire élémentaire de la vieille langue française,' already noticed in the Nation, rather shirks the question, although lately, in his edition of the 'Song of Roland,' he proposes o (Lat. hoc) and the personal pronoun il. In this M. Brunot follows him; so that, according to him, the answers to the questions, "Do you go?" "Does he go?" would have been o je and o il, as the answer to "Do we go?" would have been o nous; o il taking later the place of all the other forms. Hence, in view of all these newly discovered "belles choses," the professional etymologist must feel like exclaiming with Molière's Madelon: "Si l'on ignore ces choses, je ne donnerais pas un clou de tout l'esprit qu'on peut avoir."

M. Brunot is familiar with the latest researches, though in this elementary book he wisely gives only the results. After a very clear chapter on the general history of the French language, he devotes ninety pages to the now all-important branch, phonetics. But the main portion of the work is occupied with the forms and the syntax of the language. As to the syntax, scarcely anything good is to be found in former elementary historical grammars. M. Brunot has tried to do more than his predecessors, and in many cases has succeeded. The comparatively full treatment of the moods and tenses is especially to be noted. The book has a very complete table of contents, which, however, does not quite make up for the absence of an index.

The long sub-title of M. L. Pourret's work will do more than any analysis to give an idea of the author's intentions: "Vocabulaire des racines et des dérivés de la langue française, précédé de notions générales sur l'étymologie et la dérivation, à l'usage de tous les établissements d'instruction." This promises much, but the execution is not equal to the promise. The etymologies given are often more confusing than instructive, since they are seldom explained. The book is a typographical curiosity, being printed in two colors, red and black. The black is for the French words and the etymologies attributed to them; the red for the primitives, which are given mixed in with the French words, just as they come, in alphabetical order. Thus, after fétu, in black, we have in red "Fetwa, ARABE: fetfa," which might be puzzling even to pupils who had gone beyond the établissements d'éducation. Thus, again, in one column, besides the French words, we find: hedera, Latin; hedjra, Arabic; hedra, Greek: heester, Flemish; hei, Dutch; heigero, Old-High German; heis, Greek; etc. The author has evidently taken great pains to obtain a very meagre result.

The 'Etymological Dictionary' of M. Brachet, translated by Mr. Kitchin, received a long notice in the Nation when the first edition appeared in 1873. The second edition, in 1878, was a very great improvement on the first. The third edition does not differ materially from the second. It is but fair, in a notice of works on French etymologies, to recall this excellent book, one of the best printed by the Oxford Clarendon Press (New York: Macmillan). The 'Etymological Dictionary,' as improved by the translator, is far superior to the original work of M. Brachet, of which a very large number of editions have been issued with no material changes, though many are needed.

There has long been a promise of a French dictionary by MM. Darmesteter and Hatzfeld. In this we may expect, judging from the previous works of the authors, not only a careful presentation of the derivations, but also a logical classification of the meanings in the order of their development. The Dictionary is announced as in the press in the last work of M. Darmesteter, 'The Life of Words as the Symbols of Ideas.' The author delivered in London last year a short course of lectures which have been translated from the manuscript, as they have not yet been published in French. He says modestly in his preface that his book deals "almost exclusively" with that language. This is true as to the selection of examples only, for, while not addressing specialists, he touches with a light and graceful hand upon the very deepest general questions. His little book is very suggestive. Linguistic points thus treated, thus artistically presented and classed, may excite interest in the daintiest of readers. There are scattered throughout the work pages of exquisite beauty. Where all is so logically connected, it is difficult to quote, but a passage like the following may serve to indicate the general tone, where examples and diagrams are not made to teach the necessary lesson:

"A whole world of vague impressions, of indistinct sensations, live in the unconscious depths of our own thoughts, a sort of obscure dream which each of us carries in him. But words, rough interpreters of these inner worlds, allow only an infinitely small part of them to appear externally, those which are the most apparent and the most easily seized, and these are received by the listener, who in his turn gives to them the various fugitive and shifting aspects with which the basis of his own imagination furnishes him. . . . Thus each of us bears about with him a world of ideas and thoughts which remain in the subjective state, and which he is almost powerless to convey to others."

It would be misleading not to state that a great portion of the book is made up of examples often repeated. It deals less with general assertions than with a few (never exhaustive) details. The translation reads well, though fault might be found with the renderings of a few idioms. Thus: Triste comme un bonnet de nuit sans coiffe is rendered, "As melancholy as a nightcap without a tassel." Now, coiffe never meant tassel, and as sans coiffe (now always omitted) is what explains the queer expression triste comme un bonnet de nuit, the translator's version is misleading. The phrase may be found explained in Littré under coiffe. In conclusion it may be said that the impression left by M. Darmesteter's 'Life of Words' is that language is eminently a living organism, subject to the same laws as all organic life. If those who are trying to fetter thought in Volapuk or other conventional strait-jackets would but understand this, they might see the futility of their efforts.

'Le Démonstratif ILLE et le Relatif QUI en roman' (Paris, Vieweg) is a short essay by M. Darmesteter, in which he clearly and learnedly establishes the fact that the hitherto unsatisfactorily explained French lui was formed by analogy under the influence of the relative cui.

THE LATEST YEAR BOOKS.

Year Books of the Reign of King Edward the Third. Years 13 and 14. Edited and translated by Luke Owen Pike, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, author of 'A History of Crime in England.' London: Longmans & Co. 1886.

A YEAR and a half ago we gave some account of the translated new Year Books of the twelfth and thirteenth of Edward III., then lately published under the editorship of Mr. L. O. Pike. The gap in the old black-letter volumes, between the tenth and seventeenth years, is now still further reduced. Another volume has appeared, containing the reports of the thirteenth and fourteenth years of the same king, beginning with the Michaelmas (October–November) term of 1339, and ending with the next or Hilary term (January-February), 1339-1340. Edward's regnal year began with January 25. This volume is marked by the same excellent qualities that characterized the last one—the same comparison of various texts (more than seven in the case of this volume), the same occasional reproduction of a second report, and especially by the same careful collation with the original records. "Not only," says the editor, "are the references to the records in the present volume more numerous [than in the last one], but they must very nearly exhaust the possibilities of identification." No one who has not inspected the great and almost unsearchable bulk of these records can justly tell what labor this has involved on the part of the editor; it is very great. One fact we are glad to learn—that the Year Books have reported nearly all of the most important cases: "The Year Books are, in fact, to those who know how to use them, the most perfect guides to almost all that is most important in the rolls."

The editor confirms, by all he says and does, the opinion, which is growing in this country, no less than in England, that the old printed Year Books should be reëdited. It is gratifying to learn, from various sources, that this important task is likely to be undertaken before long. The idle and shallow opinion that the Year Books are obsolete and useless, is fast passing away. To legal students who would be thoroughly grounded, they are invaluable; and it is certain that a new, translated, and thoroughly edited set of the old Year Books, with all gaps supplied and the text brought into relation with the records and with the newly printed volumes, will be heartily welcomed by many persons on this side of the water, no less than on the other. There can be no doubt that in such scholars as Mr. Pike and Mr. Maitland, England has men that are fit for the task.

In this volume, as in the last, there is interesting matter touching the early infiltration of equitable principles into the common-law courts; especially in the case of Staunton vs. Staunton and wife (pp. 16-37), and Uppecote's case (pp. 83-98), and in the editor's comments on these cases at pp. xxxvi-xlvi. He remarks upon the uniformity given to the administration of justice by the constant supervision of the King in Council; and by the fact that a case brought in a common-law court might be carried into the Chancery at almost any stage. The system was "that of proceeding by established forms so long as they sufficed, and of assistance from the authority to which they originally owed their existence where they sufficed no longer. . . . The unity of principle which is thus discernible may perhaps afford some assistance towards the comprehension of a very remarkable observation made by Stonore [C. J. of the Com. Pleas] in Uppecote's case. He said . . . : 'We see, on the one hand, that, according to good conscience and the law of God, it would be contrary to what is right (or reasonable), if the plaintiff speaks the truth, that by such a fine which is void he should be disinherited; and on the other hand, it is a strong measure, having regard to the law of the land, to take an averment which may annul the fine; wherefore we wish well to consider it.' The point in dispute was, like that in Staunton's case, the admissibility or otherwise of an averment relating to a fine, and one which presented an unforeseen difficulty. It is not impossible that Stonore's hesitation may have been caused in part by the decision of the Council in Staunton's case. In both cases he was clearly of opinion (though in Staunton's case the Council decided otherwise) that the averment was inadmissible in law; but in Uppecote's case he thought that in conscience or equity it should be admitted. It is not certain that he had any intention of applying the principles of conscience or equity in the Court of Common Pleas, but he may have thought that if this point were taken before the Council which listened to appeals for justice 'pur dieu' (made as for God's sake), the decision might be the same as in Staunton's case, and he may have taken time to consider whether he would follow that decision as one which did substantial justice, or act on his own opinion as to the strict law."

The learned reader will recall other cases in the Year Books that illustrate the same topic, e. g., a case in Y. B. 39 Ed. 3. 35. A, where in strictness the plaintiff was entitled to judgment, but the court suspected some practice on the plaintiff's part and made an examination of the defendants, which tended to confirm their suspicions. The plaintiff insisted upon his right to judgment, but the Chief Justice refused, saying:

"The manner in which it is done is suspicious and 'vicious,' and in a like case of Giles Blaket it was spoken of (parle) in Parliament, and we were directed that when any such case came before us and we could see any vitiosite, we were not to proceed to judgment without good advisement; car il soit malveis ensample. Wherefore sue to the Council; and as they wish that we should do we will do; and otherwise we will do nothing in this case."

Mr. Pike has interesting remarks and suggestions on the puzzling topics of the secta and the early jury, and the way in which witnesses may have been used with the jury. "Upon the whole," he says, "it seems a reasonable inference that at the period of the reports in the present volumes there had not come into existence any trial by jury in the modern sense, any hearing by the jury of oral evidence given in court upon oath as a preliminary to their verdict." In the note on p. liii there is an error in the citation of the important case of Y. B. 17 Ed. 3. 48, pl. 14: both year and page are wrongly given. The editor's interesting speculations as to the custom of inserting in counts and declarations the names of witnesses who were never examined, might perhaps be illustrated by the practice, of which there are traces in the Year Books, of mentioning in the counsel's address to the jury the names of witnesses who were not examined.

In these Year Books, as in others, there are matters of a more general interest. The editor remarks upon the replication, in a certain action of Waste, that whitethorn is a tree upon which a graft can be made: "There is not, from a modern point of view, anything very remarkable in the statement, as it is well known that the whitethorn is used for grafting purposes. But it is not by any means so well known that fruit was cultivated with so much skill in the first half of the fourteenth century." The early history of surnames is another subject which is illustrated here. In the case of the Abbot of Glastonbury vs. Sir Richard Pyke, it is said: "idem Ricardus et Thomas Richardsheyward Pyke attachiati fuerunt ad respondendum." The editor adds: "It is hardly necessary to say that 'Thomas Richardsheyward Pyke' is not an instance in which two baptismal names stand before a surname. . . . It may not, perhaps, be equally apparent that this Thomas had no surname at all. Thomas Richardsheyward Pyke is, however, in all probability, only an idiomatic expression which might be rendered in modern English, Thomas, the hayward of Richard Pyke. This is not a mere conjecture, but an inference founded on many similar instances. . . . The custom prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the land" Another instance is given from the record of a case in this volume, and two more from certain Durham records:—Edward, servant of John de Chiltern appears as Edward Jonesservant of Chiltern; William, servant of William Litster of Gateshead, as William Williamservant Litster of Gateshead; and Nicholas, servant of Robert of the Woghes, as Nicholas Robertservant of the Woghes. "The only reasonable explanation of the formula seems to be that at a time when family names were not very definitely fixed, even throughout the whole of the higher ranks, persons in the lowest ranks had no family names and no surnames of their own at all."

Mr. Pike announces in his preface, dated in August last, that the material "is in a forward state of preparation as far as the end of the sixteenth year of the reign." We may hope, therefore, to see before long another volume of his scholarly and thoroughly good work.

THAYER'S GREEK ENGLISH LEXICON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament; being Grimm's Wilke's Clavis Novi Testamenti, Translated, Revised, and Enlarged by Joseph Henry Thayer, D.D., Professor in the Divinity School of Harvard University. Harper & Bros.

THE long-expected appearance of this book is matter of special rejoicing, not only to theological students and all ministers who use the Greek Testament as they ought, but to any other persons who have a fair general knowledge of the language, and would like to make careful reading of the New Testament in the original. Dr. Robinson's Lexicon was a useful book, but never satisfactory. Edward Robinson was the creator of modern Biblical geography, and in that department a great honor to American scholarship. But he had no special talent for philological work, and his lexicon is unscientific. Moreover, the German works on which his was based were far inferior to that of Grimm, now translated and greatly improved by Dr. Thayer. From the first appearance of Grimm's book (completed in 1868, with a second edition in 1879) its great superiority was recognized by scholars in all countries. We know of an American theological teacher who at once made his students throw away Robinson and use Grimm in the Latin, though the average American student does not do that with delightful facility, and will no doubt distinctly prefer the English.

Robinson (whose second edition appeared in 1850) gave only the words and forms found in the Greek Testament of Hahn, a now forgotten follower of Griesbach. We are still far from having any single standard for the Greek text. Grimm wisely gave whatever was in the so-called Textus Receptus, with all the additional words and forms found in Griesbach, in Lachmann, or in Tischendorf; Thayer has now added every word or form found in Tregelles or in Westcott and Hort, even the marginal readings; so that whatever Greek Testament is read, this Lexicon will meet the reader's wants. We were at first inclined to regret that Dr. Thayer did not follow the example of Robinson and of Grimm in constructing an independent work on the basis of a predecessor. This would have been more convenient and agreeable to beginners and to the majority of general readers. But Grimm's book has attained such generally recognized preëminence that scholars would have been constantly desirous of knowing whether his view was precisely the same as that given in the American work. Upon the whole, therefore, we are satisfied that Dr. Thayer has pursued the wisest course. He translates Grimm throughout, putting in square brackets his own additions and intimations of dissent. We think these additions are of such extent and value as to warrant its being called Thayer's Lexicon. The translation itself is remarkably good. A German writer's Latin is apt to retain in some measure the Teutonic lack of lucidity, and a translation of it into idiomatic, clear, and agreeable English is really not a very easy task; but

Dr. Thayer had already disciplined and exhibited his skill by translating from the German the great works of Winer and Buttmann on New Testament Greek Grammar. He of course does not here content himself with rendering Grimm's Latin definitions into English, for, besides other considerations, a good many Greek words or uses of words can be more exactly paralleled in English than in Latin.

The additions consist in large measure of references to recent works in every department, including lexicons, grammars, and commentaries, Bible dictionaries, and articles in leading periodicals, and records of learned societies of Germany, England, and America. These references have been prepared with great labor, and, so far as we can judge, with wise discrimination. They will be of great use to students having access to large theological libraries, and many of them can be turned to account by the better furnished pastors. The views of the writers referred to are sometimes summarily stated, and it is often intimated that they do not agree with Grimm. One wishes that the substance of the corrective or additional matter from these authorities could have been more generally given, however briefly, for the sake of the numerous ministers who do not possess, or have not time to consult, the books to which reference is made. Yet it was probably seen that this would too greatly enlarge the work, and that it would be difficult to present opinions contrary to those of Grimm without frequently undertaking to decide between them, which would have produced confusion. Dr. Thayer has modestly shrunk from putting forward his own opinions, and even where he unquestionably dissents strongly from Grimm, he is usually content to say, "Others think," etc. It is certainly graceful to make a lexicon so far as possible impersonal, and many are very anxious to rely on such a work as an impartial authority. They know that a commentary gives only the views of its author; but they wish to think otherwise as to a grammar or lexicon of the original language. Yet, after all, no such work can free itself from the personal prepossessions of those who construct it. As Addison Alexander once casually said of Robinson, "a lexicon is only a commentary in alphabetical order." Dr. Thayer has recognized this fact in his preface, and in defining terms, or particular uses, concerning which there is a difference of doctrinal opinion, he has usually referred to leading treatises on both sides. His breadth of view and studious fairness are evident at all points. It is probably through inadvertence that he has sometimes failed to intimate dissent where Grimm, in dealing with a case of "discrepancy" between two Gospels, has remarked, as a matter of course, that one or the other is in error, without hinting at the possibility of reconciliation.

A notable and readily helpful class of additions consists in the discussion of groups of synonyms. Here the editor, of course, frequently draws upon Trench and the recent elaborate work of Schmidt; and he gives a number of choice bits from the commentaries of Bishop Lightfoot. His own statements are very discriminating and carefully guarded. The common vice of writers on synonyms in any language is that they make their distinctions sharper, and push them more consistently through the entire use, than facts will warrant. Grimm's etymologies were somewhat meagre, and occasionally quite erroneous, his talents or attainments not seeming to lie in that direction. Thayer has here also made valuable additions, with references to recent German works of great importance.

We observe fewer additions to the discussion of particles than to that of nouns and verbs. Grimm is especially full and complete in these portions of his work, and here not so much has been added by recent specialists. It is not clear whether Dr. Thayer himself takes less interest in the study of particles than in other departments of lexicography.

Great pains have been taken to make use of the recent remarkable progress in Semitic studies, wherever light is thus thrown upon the use of words in the New Testament.

The appendix to the American work is a very important feature, both for advanced students and for beginners. The copious list of forms of verbs will not only help the tyro, but will relieve some good Greek scholars, when they first begin to read Westcott and Hort and are puzzled by unfamiliar inflectional forms or peculiarities of orthography. The other lists will furnish important help to advanced students, and are evidently the fruit of unstinted labor. They comprise (1) Greek words in the New Testament which are not found in general Greek use till after the time of Aristotle; (2) words borrowed from Hebrew, Latin, etc.; (3) words and significations found only in the New Testament; (4) words peculiar to individual New-Testament writers. Here careful attention has been given to differences of text, as found in leading critical editions.

The book is admirably printed. In a pretty careful examination, and some daily use, we have stumbled upon no error of the press; and the well-known difficulty of attaining accuracy in proof-reading is in such a work raised to the second power. Some junior students will probably wish the publishers had printed in closer lines and on thinner paper, so as to rival the German edition in cheapness; but the cost would not thus have been greatly diminished to them, and their eyesight will in all probability begin to fail before this excellent work is superseded.

Having referred at the outset to readers of the Greek Testament who are not ministers, it may be well that we should add a word concerning the present choice of editions. Such as prefer the Textus Receptus may get either Scrivener's Greek Testament, which gives the text of Stephens, and at the bottom of the page the principal differences of reading presented by several leading critical editions; or Scrivener's other edition, which attempts to give the precise Greek text followed by King James's translators, and indicates the departures from this made by the recent Anglo-American revision. Those who sympathize with progress in this respect will, in our judgment, make a great mistake if they choose any edition of Tischendorf, whose apparatus of text-criticism is unrivalled, but whose unsound and vacillating judgment has led to the production of a text that is highly inconsistent and in every way unsatisfactory. It is far better to take Westcott and Hort, whose text alone may now be had in very cheap editions. Some of their particular decisions will doubtless be corrected by future progress, but the work is constructed on a scientific method, and as a whole is very good. It is pleasant to observe that the text offered by the most progressive and fearless criticism leaves the doctrinal, ecclesiastical, and ethical teachings of the New Testament substantially unaltered. Some readers might prefer Palmer's Greek Testament, which presents the text followed in the recent revision; this text, we think, is nearly always right in so far as it departs from the Textus Receptus, but ought to go further still.

Modern Idols. Studies in Biography and Criticism. By William Henry Thorne. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. 1887.

MR. THORNE is a very honest critic. He has told his readers just what he thinks about Arnold, Browning, Ole Bull, Burns, Carlyle, George Eliot, and George Sand; and the virtue of frankness in this case involved, one would think, that of courage. He is a man interested in poetry, but not in Arnold's—whose career therein he thus summarizes from start to finish: "Like most English schoolboys of refined feelings and lofty aspirations, he began early to scribble verses, and the fact that in his twenty-first year he won the Newdigate prize for his poem on Cromwell led him to waste a great many of his earlier years in writing what is called poetry. . . . It is perfectly useless for his over-zealous admirers to laud the work which, as poetry, is destined to be very short-lived." It is not the truth but the courage of this view which is worth remarking. We cannot resist the temptation to continue the quotation in order that Mr. Thorne may stand exactly on the merits of his own words. He goes on: "Mr. Arnold's own definition of poetry is, that it deals with and describes actions; the greater and nobler the actions, so much better the texts of the poems. If Shakespeare, or Goethe, or Tennyson, had defined poetry, any one of them would have said that it had to do with impulses, feelings, spirituality, angels' and demons' wings, and such voices of nature as are heard by poets alone." The fine audacity with which he here contradicts a greater than Arnold is perhaps less striking than the happy self-confidence with which he informs us what "any one of them" would have replied if he were respectfully interrogated. Pray, did Shakspere and Goethe never actually define the art in language of their own? and can these "angels' and demons' wings" be fairly regarded as a felicitous paraphrase of their remarks? But, possibly, Mr. Thorne did not mean to include drama as a part of poetry, for we notice he says later that "Robert Browning was never made to wear or jingle the adornments of 'cap and bells,'" and seems to think writing for the stage a poor business for a modern man.

Next to the boldness of this writer, his distinguishing trait is the excellence of his moral views. He approaches poetry through his moral fervor, and does really get into some contact with it on that side; but it is in the region of prose, particularly in biography, that his righteousness glows most fiercely. He does not make the mistake of rendering judgment—that he leaves to the proper authority; he admits that "the world is not all conscience and justice and severity, any more than it is all mugwump, dandy, dallying, and clown"; and he is willing to wait for the everlasting bonfire, as Shakspere calls it, to abolish the latter half of his antithesis. He is, however, especially sound on the doctrine of marriage; and, while he exclaims against condemnation, yet the proceedings of George Eliot and George Sand were so flagrant that he cannot get them out of his mind, and his reframing from judgment upon them strikes one as a good deal like that mode of savage torture which consists in seeing how nigh one can shoot without hitting, or how small a bit of flesh he can chip off the victim. George Sand is, in fact, a name of Babylon to him, and he rejoices in the exactness of that symbolic picture of her which the fathers showed the youthful Renan, as a woman in black trampling on the cross. Burns is treated with more of imagination, but the pit is conveniently near at hand. This irrepressible conviction of the universality and irresistibility of the moral law, which pervades the book, shows traces in its peculiar mental and linguistic form of Carlylese origin, and consequently one is not surprised to find Carlyle more highly lauded than the rest; but this partiality does not extend to his wife, of whom it is declared: "Throughout her earlier and later letters it is plain that Mrs. Carlyle was seldom her best—that is, her most agreeable and attractive—in her husband's presence"! The conclusion of the whole matter is, that the author is delightfully intrepid, and a son of orthodox morality, and is gifted with other excellences of character. But character, though a much more precious thing, is not culture; and hence, willingly as one recognizes the author's strong interest in letters and in righteousness, his faithfulness and ability in compiling facts in a reviewer's way, and his altogether worthy aims, nevertheless more cannot be said in conscience than that he is an honest critic.

Raleigh. By Edmund Gosse, M.A. [English Worthies.] D. Appleton & Co. 12mo, pp. 284. 1886.

THE life of Sir Walter Raleigh has been so thoroughly investigated and so often written that any new biographer must find himself embarrassed, at once by the abundance of materials and by the difficulty of saying anything new about him. Mr. Gosse has, however, the advantage that the new materials brought to light in 1868 by Mr. Edwards and Mr. St. John have never before been collated and embodied in a biography of a popular character. He has, moreover, chosen to confine himself to the personal career of his hero, "disengaged from the general history of his time." What might appear, therefore, a superfluous task, in the face of so many books professing to cover the same ground, is a welcome addition to our libraries.

The story of Raleigh's life is told by Mr. Gosse with great fulness and sobriety, and in a very interesting way. To illustrate his point of view, we will give a passage in relation to Raleigh as a discoverer (p. 76):

"It has been customary of late, in reaction against the defamation of Raleigh in the eighteenth century, to protest that gold was not his chief aim in the Guiana enterprise, but that his main wish, under cover of the search for gold, was to form a South American colony for England, and to open out the west to general commerce. With every wish to hold this view, I am unable to do so in the face of the existing evidence. More humane, more intelligent than any of the adventurers who had preceded him, it yet does not seem that Raleigh was less insanely bitten with the gold fever than any of them. He saw the fleets of Spain return to Europe year after year laden with precious metals from Mexico, and he exaggerated, as all men of his age did, the power of this tide of gold. He conceived that no one would stem the dangerous influence of Spain until the stream of wealth was diverted or divided. He says in the most direct language that it is not the trade of Spain, her export of wines and Seville oranges and other legitimate produce, that threatens shipwreck to us all: 'it is his Indian gold that endangereth and disturbeth all the nations of Europe; it purchaseth intelligence, creepeth into councils, and setteth bound loyalty at liberty in the greatest monarchies of Europe.' In Raleigh's exploration of Guiana, his steadfast hope, the hope which led him patiently through so many hardships, was that he might secure for Elizabeth a vast auriferous colony, the proceeds of which might rival the revenues of Mexico and Peru. But we must not make the mistake of supposing him to have been so wise before his time as to perceive that the real wealth which might paralyze a selfish power like that of Spain, would consist in the cereals and other products which such a colony might learn to export."

We will also call attention to the judgment upon the 'History of the World' (p. 176), a judgment for which Mr. Gosse is especially qualified.

Introduction to a History of the Factory System. By E. Whately Cooke Taylor. London: Richard Bentley & Sons. 1886. 8vo, pp. 441.

MR. COOKE TAYLOR is, we understand, a Government inspector of factories in England, whose attention had been drawn to the rather surprising fact that there exists no adequate account of the origin and growth of the factory system. He proposed to himself to supply this deficiency, but found the obstacles so great, at once in the mass of detail to be marshalled, and at the same time in the lack of material, that he decided to suspend the execution of his original plan, and undertake the preliminary task of preparing an historical introduction to the subject, leaving it to others, or to himself at some future time, to fill in the outline here sketched. Even this more modest preliminary work is one of no small amount of difficulty and complication. The amount of detail gathered in this volume is very great, and we are inclined to think that if the author has erred anywhere, it has been just in this respect. The number of facts here gathered, and their lack of organic connection with one another, sometimes interfere with the consecutive treatment and unity of view which have been his aim throughout. The subject treated is nothing less than the history of industrial organization, and this has really made necessary a history of industry. Industrial processes, therefore, inventions and discoveries, come necessarily within his scope; and, as trade is inextricably connected with manufacture, commercial relations have been also treated.

The preparation for the work has evidently been made faithfully and industriously, and the references testify to a large range of reading and study. The result has, as he says, inevitably been in a great degree compilation. We note, however, an absence of any but English authorities; and in this limitation of materials we find an explanation of the most important limitation in the treatment. There is very little in the English language upon the history and organization of industry during the Middle Ages, and it is here that we find the book least satisfactory. The account of the mediæval guilds (chiefly from Lacroix) and of mediæval commerce is quite inadequate. On the other hand, ancient history and that of the modern centuries are treated very fully and well.

In a book like this the subject of definition is of the first importance, and the first chapter is devoted to establishing a terminology. This is not an easy task, in view of the loose and conflicting use of many terms, and here and there the discussion labors somewhat from lack of clearness. The fault, however, arises from the nature of the subject, and in general the definitions are exceedingly good, while the statements of fundamental economical principles are clear and sound. "Manufacture is the making commodities in excess of local needs, and trade is their organized dispersion; and in pursuing the history of the one we shall generally find ourselves on the track of the other" (p. 17). "The proper conception of handicraft is . . . nearly the opposite of the modern conception of manufacture, and the two terms cannot be regarded as convertible without a distinct loss to economic nomenclature. The one (handicraft) is the system of isolated individual effort, as opposed to the other, the system of combined and generally mechanically aided production" (ib.). The word "factory," it is said, "will be used all through these pages in its popular rather than its historical or legal sense up to the period of its being defined by statute. The early signification of a trading establishment will be altogether and everywhere excluded, and the later meaning, of a place of production, will be at first and everywhere understood. It will be held to be any such place of production—that is, any definite place where associated industrial production is carried on, by whatever means" (p. 36).

The importance of the book is largely as a contribution towards the solution of the great problems of the day:

"These problems," says Mr. Taylor, "are becoming more pressing as time proceeds, as this system strikes its roots deeper, and spreads its branches wider, at the expense of elder and less energetic growths; and this while a dazed legislature is painfully feeling its way among them, with half concessions and temporary expedients, clumsily enough for the most part, while still on the whole faithful to the high responsibilities of its trust. . . . The expansion of the factory system into nearly all departments of industrial employment in the country has become an already accomplished fact. Commensurate with it has become the desire among the better minded of the people, including our more thoughtful legislators, to take precautions that the new order of things shall be introduced at the least preventable cost of human health and happiness. It was not so always, but such is the feeling now. But this benevolent intention is at present checked and hampered, is liable to be diverted from its proper course and rendered nugatory or even injurious, by the amazing ignorance of the history and philosophy of the whole subject that prevails. I am anxious to make a humble beginning towards a better state of things" (Preface, p. ix.).

This praiseworthy intention has certainly been carried out successfully; and the reader will acquire, with a vast amount of information, a clear notion of the historical relations of this important subject.

Essays. By James Vila Blake. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co.; Boston: Geo. H. Ellis. 1887.

IT is not easy to write in a field which so different authors as Montaigne and Bacon have cultivated, or, at a further remove, Seneca and Emerson. To compose moral essays is to invite unlucky comparisons as inevitably as when one attempts poetry. There is the same danger, too, in such literary efforts as in versifying, that the writer will fall into mannerisms both of his own and of the greater models; and in substance there is usually as little freshness in reflections on Anger as in amatory fancies. The exception arises in both kinds when there is a genius at work, moral in the one and poetic in the other. But Mr. Blake is not a moral genius; and his pages illustrate these perils of the moralist, which have just been alluded to, as likely to beset his way in our time. He discourses in short articles, which read like excerpts from good, quiet, cultivated sermons, upon Choice, Vainglory, Censure, Knowledge, Patience, Death, and twenty-four other subjects of the same sort. The thoughts are just, the temper serious and benevolent, the quotations thick from Epictetus, Rochefoucauld, and that irreproachable genus; and one has to say of it, as of a book of verses, that it is excellent, only it fails of distinction. One observes, too, as a sign of the author's real range, that his beloved poet seems to be Schefer.

Home Life of Great Authors. By Hattie Tyng Griswold. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. 1887.

THIS volume contains papers, compiled from the proper authorities, upon thirty-three of the most famous authors of this century, living and dead, all but four of the number being English or American. The accounts are readable, and substantially accurate, although the writer is not altogether free from the fault of painting fancy pictures of scenes, and filling in with imaginary details. The subject is the unfortunate one of the domestic life of genius, but this limit is not very narrowly observed; most often we have a condensed biography, with special attention given to the personal element, in the way of description, anecdote, reminiscences, and other such matters as a skilful collector could gather from the plentiful sources of such information. There is a noticeable good taste shown in dealing with those more intimate portions of the lives of the heroes and heroines—the affaires de cœur. With Byron, Bulwer, Goethe, Burns, George Sand, to mention no others, there was need of some tact in statement. The almost undiscriminating forgiveness which the author dispenses to these illustrious offenders, is not so agreeable a trait of her work. In fact, there is a good deal of weak worship in the volume, of a laudation of men apart from their genius and their service, which, though natural enough, ought to be kept within better bounds. Perhaps, too, a more explicit acknowledgment of obligation to original authorities might have been expected.

The Electric Motor and its Applications. By Thomas Commerford Martin and Joseph Wetzler. New York: W. J. Johnston. 1887.

As this work is largely made up of articles from the Electrical World, describing, from the inventor's standpoint in each case, different electrical inventions which are competing with each other for public favor, it is not strange that it contains neither a comparative discussion of the merits of these inventions nor a judicial presentation of them. The variety of sources drawn upon may account for the diversities of literary style exhibited in the book, and very probably for the want of uniform excellence in its illustrations. Nevertheless, it will interest both the general reader and those who are professionally or otherwise especially concerned with the subject to which it relates. It describes a large number of kinds of electro-motors, applied to various purposes with what is asserted to be great practical success.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Alexander, E. P. Railway Practice. Its Principles and Suggested Reforms Reviewed. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 75 cents.
Alexander, Prof. A. Some Problems of Philosophy. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.
Allen, A. P. The Ambassadors of Commerce. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 25 cents.
Bancroft, H. H. History of the Pacific States of North America. Vol. xxvii, British Columbia. 1792-1887. San Francisco: The History Co.
Barr, Amelia E. The Squire of Sandal-Side: A Pastoral Romance. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.
Boisslisle, A. de. Mémoires du duc de Saint-Simon, éd. Regnier fils. 18mo. T. xxi. Supplément. Boston: Schoenhof.
Collar—Jandell. Latine Reddenda: Exercises from the Beginner's Latin Book. Boston: Ginn & Co. 22 cents.
Crane, Prof. T. F. Le Romantisme Français: A Selection from Writers of the French Romantic School. 1824–1848. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.
Doucet, Camille. Concours littéraires 1875-1885. Boston: Schoenhof.
Durand, Madame la Générale. Napoleon and Marie-Louise: A Memoir. Chicago: Rand, McNally & Co. 75 cents.
Fenn, G. M. Devon Boys: A Tale of the North Shore. Harper's Franklin Square Library. 25 cents.
Frost, T. Reminiscences of a Country Journalist. Scribner & Welford. $2.
Förster, Max von. Compressed Gun Cotton for Military Use. D. Van Nostrand.
Goodell, T. D. Greek in English: First Lessons in Greek. Henry Holt & Co. 75 cents.
Habberton, J. Helen's Babies. 200th ed. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Brothers. 50 cents.
Hallowell, R. P. The Pioneer Quakers. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.
Hare, J. I. C. The Law of Contracts. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.
Harris, Prof. S. The Self-Revelation of God. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.
Higgins, C. Home Rule; or the Irish Land Question. Facts and Arguments. Rand, McNally & Co. $1.
Higginson, T. W. The Monarch of Dreams. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 50 cents.
Hopkins, Louisa P. Practical Pedagogy; or, The Science of Teaching. Illustrated. Boston: Lee & Shepard. $1.50.
Janvier, T. A. The Mexican Guide. With two maps. 1. The City of Mexico; 2. Environs of the City of Mexico. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.
Krauskopf, Rabbi J. The Jews and Moors in Spain. Kansas City: M. Berkowitz & Co.
Lee, E. Dorothy Wordsworth: The Story of a Sister's Love. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25.
Lorenz, Otto. Catalogue général de la Librairie française. T. ix. Fasc. 2. Cr—H. Boston. Schoenhof.
Luckock, Canon H. M. The Bishops in the Tower: A Record of Stirring Events affecting the Church and Nonconformists from the Restoration to the Revolution. Thomas Whittaker. $1.50.
Newton, Rev. H. Social Studies. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.
Ohnet, G. Noir et Rose. Paris: Ollendorff. New York: Westermann.
Poore, B. P. Reminiscences of Sixty Years in the National Metropolis. Illustrated. Vol. ii. Philadelphia: Hubbard Brothers.
Prince, J. T. Courses and Methods: A Handbook for Teachers of Primary, Grammar, and Ungraded Schools. Boston: Ginn & Co. 85 cents.
Raymond, G. L. Ballads of the Revolution, and Other Poems. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.
Remsen, Prof. I. Elements of Chemistry: A Text-Book for Beginners. Henry Holt & Co. $1.
Ridgway, R. A Nomenclature of Colors for Naturalists, and Compendium of Useful Knowledge for Ornithologists. Illustrated. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.
Sichler, Leon. Histoire de la littérature russe. Boston: Schoenhof.
Skene, F. M. F. A Strange Inheritance. A Novel. Harper's Handy Series. 25 cents.
Smith, G. H. Elements of Right and of the Law. To which is added a Historical and Critical Essay upon the several Theories of Jurisprudence. Second edition. Chicago: Callaghan & Co.
Stapfer, Paul. Molière et Shakespeare (Nouvelle édition, 1887.) Boston: Schoenhof.
Stapfer, Paul. Racine et Victor Hugo. Boston: Schoenhof.
Stickney. A Second Reader. Boston: Ginn & Co. 50 cents.
Swainson, Rev. C. Provincial Names and Folk-Lore of British Birds. London: Trübner & Co.
Taken by Siege: A Novel. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.25.
Thackeray, W. M. The Adventures of Philip. To which is now prefixed A Shabby-Genteel Story. Handy Edition. 2 vols. London: Smith, Elder & Co. 50 cents.

Fine Arts.

THE SALMAGUNDI CLUB EXHIBITION.

THE Salmagundi Club holds a yearly exhibition of works in black and white. The ninth exhibition is now open, in connection with the second annual exhibition of the Architectural League, at the galleries of the American Art Association. The chief interest in the present exhibition centres in the collection of drawings by E. A. Abbey for Goldsmith's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," and the drawings by Kenyon Cox for Rossetti's poem, "The Blessed Damozel." Both of these collections of original drawings have already been on exhibition in New York, the one at the Grolier Club, the other at Reichard's gallery. These works of Mr. Abbey and Mr. Cox, really important achievements in the field of illustrative work, so highly appreciated and so well received by the art public in New York, have been noticed at length in the columns of the daily press, and call for no extended notice here. The exhibition proper of the Salmagundi Club is confined to a miscellaneous collection of black and white oils, charcoal drawings, etchings, one or two bronzes, and some wood-cut proofs. This exhibition is far from attaining a high average. There is a striking dearth of drawings. Black and white work in New York seems to be drifting more and more in the direction of "effects" in heavy oil sketches, and the artists who exhibited at the Salmagundi Club's exhibition seem to rely more every year on strong contrasts of crude white and solid black masses to make pictures, than on any delicacy of line or any attempt to make drawings pure and simple. The beauty of pure outline or the more substantial quality of well-balanced masses of true light and shade is lost sight of in the scrambling after noisy effect. In the present exhibition there are impossible landscapes and badly-drawn illustrations in oil. A few pen-and-ink drawings are in no way remarkable for any real art qualities. They are in the main amateurish efforts, that would not even make a creditable appearance in the pages of a popular magazine with the gain derived from reduction in size.

The impression made by this exhibition so far as the new work is concerned is dreary in the extreme, for the contemplation of such perfunctory performances as the majority of the pictures shown this year certainly are, is not calculated to encourage the champions of the native school. If we find few good drawings in what is ostensibly an exhibition of drawings, we are forced to one of two conclusions, either that our artists cannot draw, or that if we have draughtsmen, they have not thought it worth while to send work to the Salmagundi Exhibition. The latter is without doubt the correct inference to be drawn from the present exhibition. Leaving out of the question Messrs. Abbey and Cox, there is nothing here from Smedley, Beckwith, Chase, Dewing, Denman, Mowbray, Rice, Hovenden, Reinhart, Blum, Ulrich, Blashfield, Brush, Bunker, Montague Flagg, Harrison, Simmons, F. Jones, Dannat, Low, Robinson, Vedder, Sartain, Bridgman, or Sargent. We find only among the familiar names in good figure work Millet, Wiles, Wyatt Eaton, Maynard, Lippincott, Dielman, and Thulstrup. Lack of interest in a black-and-white exhibition on the part of our best figure painters, or doubts as to the utility of such an exhibition, must, in our opinion, be the cause of such a weak display in this branch of art.

"The Orphans," No. 255, is one of the best figure compositions in this exhibition. It is by Frederick Dielman. The same artist shows an excellent "Portrait," No. 12, a soberly drawn study of a gentleman seated at his library table. W. H. Lippincott's "Head," No. 323, is a clever study in charcoal, J. R. Wiles's "A Pose in Black," No. 228, a deftly-handled wash drawing, and G. W. Maynard's "News," No. 251, an old man reading a newspaper, a good little genre, although in tone it is too black, are quite worth looking at. Wyatt Eaton, in the "Judgment of Paris," No. 239, has attempted a subject of the most ambitious kind. The nude figures are not realistic by any means. The drawing leans too much toward an imitation of the classic painters in a certain ampleness of form that a live painter of the modern school would never have thought of trying for; but, despite some very grave faults, the drawing may be commended for its good intention. "A Relay on the Old Boston Post Road," No. 360, is a spirited and sufficiently well-drawn illustration by T. de Thulstrup. "Her Dream," No. 291, is a successful bit of fantasy, decoratively treated by W. V. Birney. "A Wet Evening at the Thirtieth Street Station," No. 267, by H. W. Ranger, is a good example of what may be done in the way of making everyday subjects interesting in black and white, and J. R. Wiles's "A Rainy Day," No. 259, though less important, deserves to be mentioned for the same distinguishing merit.

In landscape, leaving out the multitude of "noisy" effects in oil already alluded to, we find some excellent work by Chas. Warren Eaton in his tender "Charcoal Study," No. 68, and "By the Roadside," No. 35; in B. W. Loomis's landscape, No. 295; "A Windy Day," No. 201, by C. A. Vanderhoof; "Solitude," No. 48, by D. Kotz; in the naïvely treated little studies by T. R. Manley, Nos. 49, 59, 72, and 320; and in F. Leo Hunter's wash sketches, "Fishing Smack," No. 314, and "Winter on the Long Island Shore," No. 109.

The exhibition of the Architectural League in gallery E comprises 189 numbers, including projects and designs and a heterogeneous collection of sketches and drawings, water-color sketches of street scenes in picturesque European towns, colored detail drawings of decorations, such as those in the palace of Fontainebleau, and pen drawings of furniture. It is not such an exhibition as should be made by the Architectural League, but it may be that the exhibition as it is will prove to be more popular than it would be if it were more dignified and professional in character. Excellent technical work is shown in "Details from the Château d'Anet," No. 158, by J. W. Wells; real artistic quality in Stanford White's "Sketches of Rouen," No. 14, and "Sketch for a Piano," No. 86, by John Du Fais. "Foreign Sketches," No. 162, by Walter Cope, are good water-color drawings. There are innumerable designs for country houses, more or less good, but most of them lacking in the important quality of beauty, and some eccentric projects for public buildings.

In gallery C is exhibited a collection of thirty-seven Limoges paintings by Charles Volkmar. Some of these, such as "The Bronx near Fordham," No. 12, are handsome in color, and all are effective as wall decorations. It is rather doubtful taste, however, to frame these pretty plaques in glaring gold.

"The 'Young Folks' Cyclopædia' should be in every juvenile library."—From a Report of the Connecticut Board of Education.

YOUNG FOLKS' CYCLOPÆDIA of { Common Things.....$2.50 / Persons and Places... 2.50

 Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.

HENRY HOLT & CO., Publishers, New York.

GINN & CO.'S

LATEST PUBLICATIONS:

THE PHILOSOPHY OF WEALTH. By Prof. J. B. Clark of Smith College. By mail, $1.10.

Economic Principles restated in accordance with the modern spirit. "I cannot express too warmly my appreciation of this treatise."—Prof. H. C. Adams, Univ. Mich. and Cornell Univ.

THE ILLUSTRATED BEGINNER'S BOOK IN FRENCH. By Sophie Doriot. By mail, 90 cts.; for introduction, 80 cts.

"The best book yet issued for children beginning the study of French."—Prof. de Fleiffer, New Eng. Conservatory.

NINE JATAKAS. By Prof. L. H. Elwell of Amherst Coll. By mail, 65 cts. Pali text transliterated, with notes.

THE PARTHENON FRIEZE ($1.60) and THE PHILOSOPHICAL SYSTEM OF ROSMINI ($2 65). By Thomas Davidson.

THUCYDIDES. Book VII. Edited by Prof. C. F. Smith of Vanderbilt Univ. Text and Note edition—introduction price, cloth, $1.25; paper, 95 cts. Text, 20 cts. In the College Series of Greek Authors.

SPIERS' FRENCH DICTIONARIES. French-English and English-French. Each, $4.50. The only authorized American edition.

NEARLY READY.

DANTE HANDBOOK (Davidson). CEBES' TABLET (Parsons), THUCYDIDES, Book I (Morris), INTRODUCTION TO HOMER (Jebb).

 Circulars and full information on application.

GINN & COMPANY, Publishers,
Boston, New York, and Chicago.

The Popular Science Monthly

FOR FEBRUARY.

CONTENTS:

THE LAWS OF HABIT. By Professor William James.
SCIENCE IN RELIGIOUS EDUCATION. (Concluded.) By Daniel G. Thompson.
THE SOUTH-AFRICAN DIAMOND MINES. (Illustrated.)
MATERIALISM AND MORALITY. By W. S. Lilly.
SCIENCE AND MORALS: A Reply. By Professor T. H. Huxley.
SOME POINTS ON THE LAND QUESTION. By Oliver B. Bunce.
FETICHISM OR ANTHROPOMORPHISM. By George Pellew.
MISGOVERNMENT OF GREAT CITIES. (Concluded.) By Frank P. Crandon.
FULGURITES OR LIGHTNING-HOLES. (Illustrated.) By George P. Merrill.
VIEWS OF LIFE IN THE CRAZY MOUNTAINS. By Mrs. E. D. W. Hatch.
MASSAGE. By Lady John Manners.
SKETCH OF CHARLES C. ABBOTT. (With Portrait.)
CORRESPONDENCE.
EDITOR'S TABLE: Prophets of Evil. A Strange Sight in South Africa.
LITERARY NOTICES.—POPULAR MISCELLANY.—NOTES.

Price, 50 cents Single Number; $5.00 per Annum.

D. APPLETON & CO.,
PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s

SATURDAY BOOKS.

MR. BROWNING'S NEW VOLUME.

PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE OF IMPORTANCE IN THEIR DAY. To wit: Bernard de Mandeville, Daniel Bartoli, Christopher Smart, George Bubb Dodington, Francis Furini, Gerard de Lairesse, and Charles Avison. Introduced by a Dialogue between Apollo and the Fates; concluded by another between John Fust and his Friends. By ROBERT BROWNING. 1 vol., 16mo, $1.25; also 8vo, $1.25.

THOMAS H. BENTON. Vol. XIV of American Statesmen Series. By THEODORE ROOSEVELT. 1 vol., 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Mr. Roosevelt's excellent biography of this distinguished statesman, whose long and eventful political career covered a most interesting period in American politics, cannot fail to be of great value and interest.

Published before in the Series AMERICAN STATESMEN.

Edited by JOHN T. MORSE, JR.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. By J. T. MORSE, JR.
ALEXANDER HAMILTON. By H. C. LODGE.
JOHN C. CALHOUN. By DR. H. VON HOLST.
ANDREW JACKSON. By WM. G. SUMNER.
JOHN RANDOLPH. By HENRY ADAMS.
JAMES MONROE. By Pres. D. C. GILMAN.
THOMAS JEFFERSON. By JOHN T. MORSE, JR.
DANIEL WEBSTER. By HENRY CABOT LODGE.
ALBERT GALLATIN. By JOHN AUSTIN STEVENS.
JAMES MADISON. By SYDNEY HOWARD GAY.
JOHN ADAMS. By JOHN T. MORSE, JR.
JOHN MARSHALL. By ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.
SAMUEL ADAMS. By JAMES K. HOSMER.

Each volume, 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

A MILLIONAIRE OF ROUGH-AND-READY and DEVIL'S FORD. Two characteristic new stories by BRET HARTE. Little Classic style. 18mo, $1.00.

February Atlantic

Contains the following articles:

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL,
A remarkable Poem, five pages long.

M. O. W. OLIPHANT
And T. B. ALDRICH,
The Second Son. V.-VIII.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER,
A Day. A Poem.

F. MARION CRAWFORD,
Paul Patoff. III., IV.

JOHN FISKE,
The Federal Convention.

SUSAN FENNIMORE COOPER,
A Glance Backward.

OLIVE THORNE MILLER,
A Bird of Affairs.

HARRIET WATERS PRESTON,
Two Serious Books.

LAWRENCE SAXE,
A Striking Two-Part Story,
The Lady from Maine. I.

Other Essays, Poems, Contributors' Club, etc.

$4 00 A YEAR ; 35 CENTS A NUMBER.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
BOSTON;
11 East 17th St., New York.

NEW PUBLICATIONS OF THE Oxford University Press.

AGENTS FOR THE UNITED STATES,

Macmillan & Co.,

NEW YORK.

THE VISION OF WILLIAM Concerning Piers the Plowman. In Three Parallel Texts. Together with RICHARD THE REDELESS. By William Langland (about 1361—1399 A. D.). Edited from numerous Manuscripts, with Preface, Notes, and a Glossary, by the Rev. Walter W. Skeat, Litt.D., LL.D. 2 vols., 8vo (Vol. 1, Text; Vol. 2, Preface, Notes, and Glossary), $8.

THE PILGRIMAGE TO PARnassus, with the Two Parts of the Return from Parnassus. Three Comedies performed in St. John's College, Cambridge, A. D. 1597—1601. Edited from MSS. by the Rev. W. D. Macray, M.A., F.S.A. 8vo, $2.25.

THE BAMPTON LECTURES.—New Volume.

THE CHRISTIAN PLATOnists of Alexandria. Eight Lectures preached before the University of Oxford in the year 1886 on the Foundation of the late Rev. John Bampton, M.A. By Charles Begg, D.D., Assistant Chaplain of Corpus Christi College. 12mo, $1.50.

CLARENDON PRESS SERIES.—New Volumes.

SECOND MIDDLE ENGLISH Primer. Extracts from Chaucer. With Grammar and Glossary. By Henry Sweet, M.A. 16mo, 50 cents.

RACINE'S ESTHER. Edited with Introduction and Notes, by George Saintsbury. 16mo, 50 cents.

THEOPHILE GAUTIER. Scenes of Travel. Selected and edited by George Saintsbury. 16mo, 50 cents.

NIEBUHR'S GRIECHISCHE Heroen-Geschichten. Tales of Greek Heroes. Edited, with English Notes and a Vocabulary, by Emma S. Buchheim. School edition. 16mo, 50 cents.

EASY GREEK READER. With Notes and Vocabulary. By Evelyn Abbott, M.A., LL.D. 16mo, 75 cents.

EURIPIDES' MEDEA. With Introduction and Notes. By C. B. Heberden, M.A. 16mo, 50 cents.

SELECTED ODES OF HORACE. With Notes for the use of a Fifth Form. By E. C. Wickham, M.A. 16mo, 50 cents. Separately, Text, 30 cents; Notes, 30 cents.

P. TERENTE ADELPHI. With Notes and Introductions. Intended for the Higher Forms of Public Schools. By the Rev. A. Sloman, M.A. 16mo, 75 cents.

MACMILLAN & CO.,
New York, 112 Fourth Avenue.

CHOICE ENGLISH BOOKS

FOR SALE BY

J. B. Lippincott Company,

PHILADELPHIA.

Selected from their new Catalogue.

CAMPBELL (Lord). The Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal of England, from the Earliest Times till the Reign of King George IV. By John, Lord Campbell, A. M., F. R. S. E. Second edition. 8vo. Half calf, marbled edges. 8 vols. $54.00 net. London (Murray), 1846.

The best edition of this work.

COLERIDGE. Works in Prose and Verse of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Edited by Derwent, Henry Nelson, Mrs. Coleridge, and his daughter. Elegantly and uniformly printed. With portrait, etc. 12mo, and 8vo. Very handsomely bound in full polished calf, extra, richly tooled, gilt tops. Pickering & Moxon's best edition. 26 vols. $150.00 net.

(Very scarce.) A most unique and handsome set of Coleridge's works

DEFOE. The Novels and Miscellaneous Works of Daniel Defoe With a Biographical Memoir of the Author, literary prefaces to the various pieces, illustrative notes, etc., including all contained in the edition attributed to the late Sir Walter Scott, with considerable additions. With a portrait. 16mo. Beautifully bound by Tout in three-quarters calf, extra, gilt top. 20 vols. $75.00 net. Oxford (D. A. Talboys), 1840. A handsome set of the best edition, now very scarce.

DE QUINCEY. The Works of Thomas De Quincey, "The English Opium Eater." Including all his contributions to periodical literature. With a fine steel portrait and fac-simile letters. 8vo. Three-quarters calf extra, uncut top, bound by Tout. 16 vols. $38.00 net. Edinburgh (A. & C. Black), 1878.

DORAN.—The works of Dr. Doran complete in 23 vols., handsomely bound in half-red crushed levant, gilt top. 8vo and 12mo. $45.00 net. London: Bentley, 1854-5-9. A scarce set and difficult to get together, comprising all the works of this quaint and charming writer. Brimful of anecdote.

THE DRAMA.—A choice collection of the Dramatic and Poetical Works of Mrs. Aphra Behn, Richard Brome, Mrs. Centlivre, George Chapman, Thomas Heywood, Thomas Randolph, and Sir John Suckling. The set complete in 25 vols. 16mo. Bound uniformly in full polished yellow calf, $90 net. London: Pearson. Scarce reprints of very early editions now unobtainable.

GLADSTONE. Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age. By the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, D. C. L., M. P. for the University of Oxford. 8vo. Three-quarters morocco, gilt top. 3 vols. $37.25 net. Oxford (University Press), 1858.

Out of print and scarce; perfect copy.

HAZLITT. Complete set of the works of William Hazlitt. In 22 vols. 12mo. Half crushed levant, gilt top. $90.00 net. A collection of choice editions of the works of Hazlitt, complete, edited by his son. A very handsome set, beautifully printed and bound.

MOLIERE. The Dramatic works of Molière, rendered into English by Henri Van Laun. With a Prefatory Memoir, Introductory Notices, Appendices, and Notes. Illustrated by a portrait and 35 etchings executed specially for this edition by M. Ad. Lalauze, Paris. With duplicate plates of all the etchings, one on Whatman, the other on Japanese paper. Large-paper copy Royal 8vo. Full crushed blue levant, extra, very richly gilt and tooled on back and sides, uncut edges, gilt top. 6 vols. $180 net. Edinburgh (Paterson, 1875).

"Not only the best translation in existence, but the best to be hoped."—Athenæum.

NAPOLEANA.—A choice collection of works relating to Napoleon, comprising Brialmont's Life of Arthur, Duke of Wellington, Bussey's History of Napoleon, Forsyth's Napoleon at St. Helena, Robinson's Memoirs of Sir Thomas Picton, Scott's Life of Napoleon (first edition), Siborne's History of the War in France and Belgium in 1815.

The set complete in 22 vols., 8vo, uniformly bound by Mansell in half calf, extra, richly tooled on back, gilt top, $62.50 net.

PAINTERS AND ARTISTS.—A choice collection of the biographies of famous painters and artists, comprising the lives and works of Blake, Ellen Clayton's "English Female Artists," Collins, Fuseli, Gainsborough, Haydon, Lawrence, Michael Angelo, including an "author's copy" (unpublished) of his poems, Reynolds, Rubens, Ary Scheffer, Thornbury's "British Artists from Hogarth to Turner," Titian, Turner, Uwins, and Wilkie.

This very fine set of 35 vols., 8vo, uniformly bound in half calf, extra gilt, gilt top, for $165 net.

PEPYS'S AND EVELYN'S DIARIES AND LIVES OF THE NORTHS:

PEPYS. Memoirs of Samuel Pepys, Esq., F.R.S., comprising his Diary from 1659 to 1669. Edited by Lord Braybrooke. Second edition. With portraits. 8vo. 5 vols. London (Colburn), 1828.

PEPYS. The Life, Journals, and Correspondence of Samuel Pepys, Esq., F.R.S., including a Narrative of his Voyage to Tangier. With steel portrait. 8vo. 2 vols. The supplementary volumes to the 'Diary.' (London) Bentley, 1841.

EVELYN. Memoirs of John Evelyn, Esq., F.R.S. Comprising his Diary from 1641 to 1706, and a selection of his familiar letters. Edited from the original MSS. by William Bray, Esq., F.A.S. With portraits. 8vo. 5 vols London (Colburn), 1827.

NORTH. The Lives of the Right Hon. Francis North, Baron Guilford: the Hon. Sir Dudley North; and the Hon. and Rev. Dr. John North. By the Hon Roger North. With portraits and notes, historical and biographical. 8vo. 3 vols. London (Colburn), 1827.

The set complete in 15 vols. 8vo. Uniformly and handsomely bound in full polished calf (yellow), full gilt, and in perfect condition. $120.00 net.

The best edition. Scarce.

SCOTT. The Entire Works of Sir Walter Scott. Comprising his Novels, Tales, Romances Poetical Works, Miscellaneous Prose Works, and Life by Lockhart. Elegantly printed and illustrated with numerous fine steel engravings, after designs by J. M. W. Turner, Sir Edwin Landseer, and other noted artists, and an extensive series of beautiful wood-cuts. 12mo. Beautifully bound by Tout in three-quarters calf, extra, gilt top. 100 vols. $225.00 net. Edinburgh (Cadell & Co.), 1829.

First and only complete edition.

THIERS. History of the Consulate and the Empire of France under Napoleon. By M. A. Thiers, late Prime Minister of France. With steel portraits. First edition. 8vo. Three-quarters calf, gilt top. 20 vols. in 10. $55.00 net. London (Colburn), 1845.

The only authorized edition.

Our Catalogue of Rare and Choice English Books sent free on application.

TWENTY-SEVENTH ANNUAL STATEMENT

OF THE

WASHINGTON

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

W. A. BREWER, Jr., President.

Net Assets, December 31, 1885..... $7,394,545 64

Receipts during the year 1886:

For Premiums	$1,508,698 70
For Interest, Rents, &c.	407,117 81	$1,915,816 51
		$9,310,362 15

DISBURSEMENTS.

Claims by Death	$518,486 54
Matured and Discounted Endowments	152,718 86
Cash Dividends, Return Premiums, and Surrendered Policies	435,633 85
Annuities	4,543 99
Total paid Policy-holders	$1,111,383 24
Taxes	15,121 53
Commuted Commissions	55,499 13
Profit and Loss	43,343 12
Dividends to Stockholders	8,590 75
Expenses: Rent, Commissions, Salaries, Postage, Advertising, Medical Examinations, &c.	262,793 02	1,496,730 79
Net Assets, December 31, 1886.		$7,813,631 36

ASSETS.

U. S. and N. Y. City Stocks	$659,703 42
Bonds and Mortgages, being first liens on real estate	6,377,398 67
Real Estate	450,216 57
Cash on hand and in Banks and Trust Co	137,631 52
Loans on Collaterals	170,197 29
Agents' Balances	38,483 89	$7,813,631 36
Add excess of market value of Stocks over cost		167,546 58
Interest Accrued		63,936 68
Interest due and unpaid		12,862 25
Deferred and Unpaid Premiums, less 20 per cent.		211,636 73
Gross Assets, Dec. 31, 1886		$8,269,613 60

LIABILITIES.

Reserve by N. Y. standard, Department valuation	$7,219,901 60
Claims in course of Adjustment	57,169 99
Matured Endowments not yet called for	1,865 20
Premiums paid in advance	6,816 60
Unpaid Dividends to Stockholders	528 50
Salaries, Rent, &c.	2,041 68
Surplus as regards Policy-holders	981,290 63	$8,269,613 60

Policies issued in 1886	3,266	Number of Policies in force	16,504
Amount of Insurance in 1886	$7,428,439	Total Amount Insured	$36,574,831

W. HAXTUN, Vice-President and Secretary.

F. S. FRENCH, Sup't of Agencies. CYRUS MUNN, Ass't Secretary.

I. C. PIERSON, Actuary. B. W. McCREADY, M.D., Medical Examiner.

FOSTER & THOMSON, Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

W. A. BREWER, JR.	MERRITT TRIMBLE.	CHAS. H. LUDINGTON.	GEORGE NEWBOLD.
WM. HAXTUN.	GEORGE A. ROBBINS.	ROBERT LOWNE.	BENJAMIN HAXTUN.
ROLAND G. MITCHELL.	JAMES B. JOHNSTON.	PAYNE PETTEBONE.	EDWIN H. MEAD.
GEORGE N LAWRENCE.	THOMAS HOPE.	FRANCIS SPEIR.	HENRY F. HITCH.
LEVI P. MORTON.	JOHN H. SHERWOOD.	DAVID THOMSON.	CHARLES P. BRITTON.
ABIEL A. LOW.	JAMES THOMSON.	FREDERIC R. COUDERT.	FRANCIS G. ADAMS.
GUSTAV SCHWAB.	WILSON G. HUNT.	NATHANIEL L. McCREADY.	BENJ. W. McCREADY, M.D.

THE NEW COMBINATION POLICY

OF THE

Washington Life Insurance Company, of New York, affords ample protection for the family of the insured for twenty years, with annual dividends at the end of the first and each subsequent year, payable in cash, or applied to augment the policy, at the option of the insured.

It enables the insurant to secure to himself a competence for old age, being the full amount named in the policy, together with all accumulated dividends

Upon the completion of the period, and simultaneously with the payment of the Capital Sum, the insured is also at once the possessor of full paid-up non-participating insurance for one-half of the Capital Sum, which is an estate in reversion, without further cost, and payable at death.

IT GUARANTEES

In strong and explicit terms advantages not found in the policy of any other company.

Suppose the amount of the policy to be $30,000.

IT GUARANTEES—

The payment of $30,000, and all accumulated dividends, should the insured die within the period of 20 years.

IT GUARANTEES—

The payment of $30,000, together with all accumulated dividends, if the insured survive the period.

IT GUARANTEES—

The payment to the insured of the full sum of all cash dividends to its credit, if desired, should the policy be surrendered before the expiration of the term.

IT GUARANTEES—

To the policy-holder who survives the 20 years' period, a paid up life policy for $15,000.

ANNUAL CASH DIVIDENDS.

Under the Combination Policy of THE WASHINGTON, the insured secures more protection than by any speculative scheme of insurance ever devised, by as much as the accumulated dividends would increase the amount of the policy.

Contrasted with the policy of any company whose dividends are deferred 5 years, 10 years, 15 years, or more, during which the insured risks the entire loss of the surplus earnings of his premiums, and magnifies the hazards of his insurance, this policy of THE WASHINGTON is not only intrinsically more valuable, but is incomparably superior in the measure of the security it affords.

THE IDEAL CONTRACT.

As an endowment, the Combination Policy, being a positive contract, is better for the insured than any policy ever before issued. As an Endowment and Life Insurance Policy combined, it is the "IDEAL" CONTRACT; and is superior to a "Tontine," or "Distribution," or "Deferred Dividend Policy," by as much as a definite is always superior to an indefinite contract.

ITS LIBERAL CONDITIONS.

Protected by the unique non-forfeitable dividend system of THE WASHINGTON, with annual cash dividends, with provisions for surrender more liberal than the non forfeiture law of the State provides, and with privileges of residence and travel unrestricted; with all these benefits united in the COMBINATION POLICY OF THE WASHINGTON, it is confidently recommended to the public as the nearest approach to a perfect life insurance contract ever devised.

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1127. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

The Civil-Service Reformer

Is the official organ of the Civil-Service Reform Association of Maryland; an active and non-partisan political organization of six hundred men. It is

A FEARLESS AND INDEPENDENT POLITICAL JOURNAL,

Devoted to the public exposure and a careful study of administrative abuses in National, State, and Municipal Governments. It advocates the advanced views of all questions of public policy; favoring sound and practical reforms in the tariff, the Civil and Consular Service, &c., &c. It is, therefore,

THE ORGAN OF THE INDEPENDENT VOTE

Of both of the great political parties throughout the Union, and its subscribers are now to be found in every State and Territory, with unimportant exceptions. It makes a special study of

CITY ADMINISTRATIONS AND THE PROBLEMS OF CITY POPULATIONS.

Devoting a large part of its space each month to the examination of election frauds and methods for their prevention; the manipulation of City finances; the problems of City taxation, &c., &c.

ITS EDITORIAL STAFF

Is not surpassed by that of any similar journal published in the country, and contains the names of many of our most vigorous and distinguished writers. Its columns are not filled with dull political platitudes, but are

BRIGHT, ENTERTAINING, AND READABLE.

It is handsomely printed, stitched, trimmed, and bound, and sent to subscribers in protecting wrappers. Published on the first day of every month. The January issue began its third year. Subscription One Dollar per annum.

Address

B. S. TONGUE, Business Manager,

Baltimore.

FOREIGN

SECOND HAND BOOK CATALOGUES

Will be mailed to bookbuyers, regularly as issued, on application to

E. & J. B. YOUNG & CO.,

Publishers and Importers,

Cooper Union, Fourth Ave., New York.

Book collectors will find in these Catalogues many choice "out-of-the-way" books at low prices. We have special facilities for importing from these lists. Correspondence solicited.

NOW READY:

The Greatest Work on Political Economy,

CAPITAL. By Karl Marx. First and only authorized English translation, by Sam. Moore, and edited by Fred. Engels. Demy 8vo, in 2 vols., cloth, $7.00; postpaid, $7.30.

ALSO.

THE RED INTERNATIONAL. By Zacher. 163 pages. 40 cents.

WORK AND WAGES. By J. E. Thorold Rogers. Abridged. Cloth, $1.25.

List of publications on the Social Question free.

BORDOLLO'S LABOR NEWS AGENCY,
104-106 E. 4th St., New York.

OMAHA; Illustrated and Described. Send 10 cents for special issue of the Excelsior, its leading weekly, showing growth during 1886, with map of this wonderful Western metropolis. CLEMENT CHASE, Omaha, Neb.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

Modern Language Notes.

Contents of the February Number (Vol. II., No. 2).

THOMAS, CALVIN.—The Fourth Convention of the Modern Language Association.

BÖCHER, FERDINAND.—Available French Texts, IV.

SCHMIDT, H.—Seneca's Influence upon "Gorboduc."

COOK, ALBERT S.—A Problem in Middle English.

Memorial Tablet to Diez.

Erster Allgemeiner Deutscher Neuphilologentag.

Satzungen des Verbandes der Deutschen Neuphilologischen Lehrerschaft.

CARPENTER, WM. H.—Old Norse Bibliography.

Reviews:

DARMESTETER, ARSÈNE.—Le Démonstratif ille et le Relatif qui en Roman (J. Stürzinger).

PAINTER, F. V. N.—A History of Education (Wm. H. Burnham).

COELHO, F. A.—Tradições relativas as Sereias e Mythos similares (B. F. O'Connor).

Von REINHARDSTOETTNER, KARL.—Der Spanische Amphitrion des Fernan Perez de Oliva (Henry R. Lang).

HARTWIG, Dr. O.—Die Uebersetzungsliteratur Unteritaliens in der Normannischstaufischen Epoche (T. McCabe).

Address A. M. ELLIOTT, Managing Editor, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, for sample copy.

Subscription, $1 Per Annum.

THE

Connecticut General

LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

HARTFORD, CONN.

Receipts for 1886, $271,945.26.

Disbursements, $200,317.95.

Assets, January 1, 1887	$1,625,332.65.
Liabilities	1,231,925.05
Surplus to policy-holders by Conn. and Mass. standard	393,407.60
Surplus to policy-holders by New York standard	479,826.60
Ratio of assets to liabilities by Conn. and Mass. standard	132.56
By New York standard	142.77

FRED. V. HUDSON, Secretary.

THOMAS W. RUSSELL, President.

OFFICE OF THE

Atlantic Mutual

INSURANCE COMPANY,

NEW YORK, January 24, 1887.

The Trustees, in conformity to the Charter of the Company, submit the following Statement of its affairs on the 31st of December, 1886.

Premiums on Marine Risks from 1st January, 1886, to 31st December, 1886	$3,809,250 53
Premiums on Policies not marked off 1st January, 1886	1,426,049 46
Total Marine Premiums	$5,235,299 99
Premiums marked off from 1st January, 1886, to 31st December, 1886	$3,817,699 86
Losses paid during the same period	$2,206,588 68
Returns of Premiums and Expenses	$841,378 15

The Company has the following Assets, viz.:

United States and State of New York Stock, City, Bank, and other Stocks	$9,382,375 00
Loans, secured by Stocks and otherwise	707,100 00
Real Estate and Claims due the Company, estimated at	501,647 81
Premium Notes and Bills Receivable	1,568,134 20
Cash in Bank	285,254 68
Amount	$12,444,511 69

Six per cent. interest on the outstanding certificates of profits will be paid to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after Tuesday, the first of February next.

The outstanding certificates of the issue of 1882 will be redeemed and paid to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after Tuesday, the first of February next, from which date all interest thereon will cease. The certificates to be produced at the time of payment and cancelled.

A dividend of FORTY PER CENT. is declared on the net earned premiums of the Company for the year ending 31st December, 1886, for which certificates will be issued on and after Tuesday, the third of May next.

By order of the Board,

J. H. CHAPMAN, Secretary.

TRUSTEES.

J. D. Jones.	William H. Macy,	Jas. G. De Forest,
W. H. H. Moore,	C. A. Hand,	Chas. D. Leverich,
A. A. Raven,	John D. Hewlett,	John L. Riker,
James Low,	William H. Webb,	N. Denton Smith.
Wm. Sturgis,	Chas. P. Burdett.	George Bliss,
Benjamin H. Field,	Henry E. Hawley,	Isaac Bell,
Josiah O. Low,	Adolph Lemoyne	Edw. Floyd Jones,
E. W. Corlies,	William D. Morgan,	Anson W. Hard,
Robt. B. Minturn,	Chas. H. Marshall.	Thomas Maitland.
William Degroot,	Fred'k H. Cossitt,	John E. Johnson.
Horace Gray,	William Bryce,	Ira Bursley,
Wm. E. Dodge,	John Elliott,	James A. Hewlett,
George H. Macy.

JOHN D JONES, President.
W. H. H. MOORE, Vice-President.
A. A. RAVEN, 2d Vice-President.

FOREIGN BOOKS.

Book-buyers wishing to receive the Catalogues of dealers in second-hand books in England, France, Germany, Italy, etc, will please apply for them, stating specialties. Orders promptly filled. Rare books procured and Auction Sales attended to, here and abroad.

Not buying for stock ourselves, our patrons are certain to receive what they order through us, however good the bargain.

B. WESTERMANN & CO., New York,

838 Broadway. [Established 1848.]

Public Library

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO
Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 87

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 90

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
Our Standing Army of Pensioners 92
How the Inter-State Commerce Bill will Work 93

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Ireland.—Juries, the Lord Mayor's Banquet, Evictions 94
Carducci 95

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Supply of Teachers 96
An American Teacher in Ireland 97
The Degree of A.B. 97
"Reliable," etc. 7
Brooks's History of Medford 97
Discrimination against Silver 98
The Administration and the Fisheries 98
A Slip of the Pen 98
A Correction 98
The Late General Stone 98

NOTES 98

REVIEWS:
William Henry Channing 101
Dean Plumptre's Translation of the Divine Comedy 102
Primitive Races 104
The Life of Benjamin F. Wade 104
Mural Painting 105
The Standard Orations 105
Exposé Sommaire des Théories Transformistes de Lamarck, Darwin et Haeckel 106
Perry's Saints 106

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 106

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.
Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

Scale of Agate lines.

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27. — 5

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top. — 10

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding. — 15

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

☞ The edition of the first issue of the current volume (Jan. 6, 1887) is entirely exhausted. Subscriptions ordered to begin with that number will commence with the number for Jan. 13 instead.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gillig & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CALIFORNIA, San Diego, Pierce Place.

THE SOUTHWEST INSTITUTE.—Health and Education for Girls and Boys in the finest climate in the world.
Girls received into the family.
For circulars address MRS. E. C. DERBY.
Refers by direct permission to Rt. Rev. Wm. I. Kip, D.D., Bishop of California; General Geo. Stoneman, Governor of California; General W. T. Sherman, General George Crook, U. S. A.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL — A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE. — A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls.
MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887.
Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI- tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY-HALL SCHOOL (59th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the Institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT admits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

ADAMS ACADEMY. — PREPARA- tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886.
For all information address
WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE- paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI- tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course.
HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal,
Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address
REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D.

NEW JERSEY, Mount Holly.

BAQUET INSTITUTE FOR YOUNG Ladies.—Spring term begins February 2.
Miss HARRIET STUART BAQUET, Principal.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys.
WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. C. M. WILKINSON'S HOME School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Refers to Miss Louisa M. Alcott, Hon. John Lowell, Geo. Wm. Curtis, Esq.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill.
WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies.
Students prepared for College.
Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia.

THE BERLITZ SCHOOL OF LAN- guages.
Philadelphia, 1523 Chestnut Street.
New York, 23 W. 23d Street and 627 Madison Avenue.
Brooklyn, 26 Court Street.
Boston, 154 Tremont Street.
Washington, 723 14th Street, N. W.
Superior native teachers. Conversational lessons a specialty in small classes, $10 per term; also private instruction. Trial lesson free. Terms begin any time.

JAMAICA, Potsdam School, Sta. Cruz Mts.

THE REV. W. D. PEARMAN, M.A. (Cambridge) prepares for Business and Universities. In the Cambridge University Local Exams., 1884, a Potsdam boy stood 2d in Greek and 10th in Latin, of all England. For Terms apply as above.

Teachers.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

JOHN W. DALZELL, PRIVATE TU- tor, 15 Appian Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

PUPILS INSTRUCTED IN PRACTI- CAL Kindergartnering and in Quincy School methods. Address, L. E. L., care Mrs. Weil's School, 711 Madison Avenue, New York City.

School Agencies.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

SCHOOL AGENCY.—Oldest and best known in the United States. Estab'd 1855.
J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., 7 East 14th St., New York.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free.
E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

Wants.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE. — AN English journalist (of advanced views), holding a responsible engagement as Parliamentary reporter on a leading London "daily" and possessing exceptional facilities for obtaining early and authentic information on all matters, is open to accept the London agency and act as correspondent of a good American paper. Incisive, humorous, and vivacious writer. Offers and requirements, please, with copy of paper to JOHNSON,
42 Camberwell, New Road, London.

INVEST THROUGH THE SOUND AND RELIABLE
Western Farm Mortgage Co.
F. M. PERKINS, President. LAWRENCE, KAN. L. H. PERKINS, Secretary.
PAID UP CAPITAL, $250,000.00.
The choicest 1st Mortgage Farm Loans, also the Company's Ten Years Debentures based upon its paid up Capital and Assets of over $650,000. No Losses. Eleven Years Experience with absolute satisfaction to over 1,500 Investors. Send for circulars, forms, and full information; Branch Offices in N. Y. City and Albany; N. Y. Office, 137 Broadway. C. C. HINE & SON, Agents.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.
Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars. Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

7 2/3 % CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures. Capital $600,000. Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets.
AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

F. W. CHRISTERN,
39 West Twenty-third Street, New York,
Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE COMPLETE Index.—Ten Numbers (Abbott—Vespucci) now ready. The few likely to be interested in this troublesome and expensive work may examine it in the great Libraries, Boston; Redwood, Newport; Mercantile, New York; Case, Cleveland; Michigan State, Lansing; Public, Milwaukee; Congressional, Washington; etc. Price to Subscribers, $1.50 a number; to all others, $2.00.
E. ROTH, 1135 Pine St., Philadelphia.

ADVANCED COURSE FOR FRENCH STUDENTS.
FRENCH EUROPEAN MAGAZINE, for school and family; 26 numbers a year, post-paid, for $1.10. Specimen number mailed to any address.
E. ROTH, 337 S. Broad St., Philadelphia.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LAN- guages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

SALE OF AN OLD VIRGINIA HOME AND PLANTATION

of About 3,600 Acres of Land, by Order of the Circuit Court

OF

ALBEMARLE COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

The plantation is divided into eleven farms, ten of which contain from 150 to 250 acres each of cleared land with suitable woodland attached. On each are four (4) buildings, namely, a cottage-home of four (4) rooms, a kitchen, a meat-house; and one containing corn-house, barn, and stable. Each is divided into six (6) fields, well fenced, and with one or two exceptions all the fields of all the farms are watered by living streams. The old homestead farm of about 800 acres contains all necessary outbuildings, such as barns, stables, corn-houses, etc., quarters for laborers, bath house and dairy, a four-roomed office, and the old mansion rebuilt and added to since the war—the last two in a lawn of 8 acres. The garden of four (4) acres falls in terraces from the house to a brook that runs through a dell at the foot of a hill which is about 40 feet high, filled with shrubbery, wide, grassy roads and walks, and is altogether a fairy spot. The old mansion has a cellar under the whole, contains 8 rooms and wide halls, with closets, dressing-rooms, etc.

The lands are in the famous County of Albemarle, in the grape-growing district, of which the Monticello Wine Cellars are the centre, and are specially adapted to the culture of the other fruits, including the celebrated Albemarle pippin, and to corn, wheat, oats, tobacco, and especially to grasses. They are in the midst of a refined society, with church and school facilities, 16 miles from Charlottesville and the University of Virginia, 3 miles from Gordonsville, with a station and post-office of Chesapeake and Ohio R.R. on the plantation, 2 miles from the homestead. At this station are two residences and a country store-house (belonging to the estate), the latter of long standing and established business. These lands present a rare opportunity for investment to a capitalist desiring a delightful country home with large possessions, or to a company of settlers to divide among themselves. The railroad runs for 2¾ miles through the place.

In addition to all this, these lands lie at the base of the Sou'west Range of mountains, a part of the plantation running up on Peter's Mountain, the highest peak of that range, the climate being as healthy as any in the world. Besides these advantages, there is, for 2¾ miles through the plantation, a vein of hematite iron ore, accompanied by one of limestone, vertically projected, 80 ft. wide, and running parallel to the iron vein at a distance of about 200 yds. A great bargain can be had in these lands. For further particulars, apply to JOHN M. PATTON, Commissioner of Circuit Court of Albemarle County, at Ashland, Hanover County, Virginia.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, NEWS-DEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

LE FRANCAIS,

REVUE MENSUELLE DE GRAMMAIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

JEAN DE PEIFFER, Rédacteur,
Principal Dep. of Languages,

New England Conservatory, Franklin Square,

BOSTON, MASS.

. . . The best French periodical ever founded in this country. . . .—The Nation.

German Simplified.

An eminently practical new method for learning the German language. Edition for self instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each; school edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by Prof. A. Knoflach, 140 Nassau St., New York. Prospectus free

TREES—FRUIT AND ORNAMENTAL; ROSES; GRAPEVINES.

SPRING PLANTING.—We offer the largest and most complete general stock in the U. S., besides many Novelties. Catalogues sent to all regular customers, free. To others: No. 1, Fruits, 10c.; No. 2, Ornamental Trees, etc., illustrated, 15c.; No. 3, Strawberries; No. 4, Wholesale; No. 5, Roses, free.

ELLWANGER & BARRY,
Mt. Hope Nurseries, Rochester, New York.

BE sure to get and critically examine the 39TH Annual Report of the PENN MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, the most prosperous institution in the State of Pennsylvania for Insuring Lives.

Get also its descriptive literature; all free on application to the Home Office, 921 Chestnut Street, Phila.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

EVERYTHING THAT IS

NEW IN SEEDS

RARE IN PLANTS

is offered and described in our

CATALOGUE No. 393, which this year we send out in an illuminated cover. The Catalogue is replete with new engravings of the choicest flowers and vegetables, many of which can only be obtained from us; and contains, besides, 2 beautiful colored plates, and very full instructions on all garden work. Altogether it is the best ever offered by us, and, we believe, is the most complete publication of its kind ever issued. Mailed on receipt of 10 cents (in stamps), which may be deducted from first order. Please be sure to order Catalogue by the number.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 Cortlandt St., NEW YORK.

THE MIDWINTER NUMBER.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

FOR FEBRUARY

CONTAINS:

THE STARS.

By Prof. S. P. Langley. An interesting chapter of the New Astronomy, with delicate illustrations of star spectra and astronomical photographs.

PART OF AN OLD STORY.

The hitherto unpublished conclusion to an old romance of Love and Alchemy. By James Lane Allen, with a full-page illustration by Blum.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: A HISTORY.

By JOHN G. NICOLAY and Col. JOHN HAY.

The illustrations this month include portraits of four Presidents, of David Davis, Robert C. Winthrop, Joshua R. Giddings, and of the Rev. Peter Cartwright, the famous Methodist preacher who ran against Lincoln when the latter was elected to Congress. The present instalment relates to

LINCOLN IN CONGRESS AND IN LAW,

And while reviewing the interesting history of the Mexican War and the Administrations of Polk and Taylor, it follows Lincoln through his growing acquaintance with public men and events, describing, with many anecdotes, his Congressional career, and revealing his characteristic methods and principles as a lawyer.

A MIDWINTER RESORT:

Nassau in the Bahamas, by Wm. C. Church, with illustrations by Winslow Homer.

THE RELATIVE STRENGTH AND WEAKNESS OF NATIONS.

The second of Edward Atkinson's valuable and significant papers, discussing the real meaning of national armaments and taxes.

S PHIRY ANN.

An illustrated story of the moonshiners, by Mat. Crim.

EDWARD THOMPSON TAYLOR.

By Rev. C. A. Bartol. An interesting characterization of Boston's powerful and original sailor-preacher, told with anecdotes, and accompanied by a full-page portrait. Also,

FATHER TAYLOR AND ORATORY.

By Walt Whitman, who in a striking paper ranks the preacher as "the one essentially perfect orator" he has heard.

FRANK R. STOCKTON'S NOVEL.

'The Hundredth Man,' is continued. "It displays increased literary skill."—Christian Union.

RECENT ART DISCOVERIES IN ROME.

An illustrated archæological paper by the director of the new Museo Urbano.

THE BAILING OF JEFFERSON DAVIS,

When accused of complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln. A chapter of "inside history" carefully compiled by George Parsons Lathrop, introducing the names of Garrison, Thaddeus Stevens, Charles O'Conor, John A. Andrew, and others, and giving a facsimile of the power of attorney held by Chief-Justice Shea from the bondsmen, Commodore Vanderbilt, Horace Greeley, and Gerrit Smith.

LEE'S INVASION OF MARYLAND.

By General Longstreet, with illustrations, including a portrait of the Confederate leader.

JAMES McCOSH.

The President of Princeton College, with portrait.

GEORGE W. CABLE'S NOVELETTE.

Of Acadian life in Louisiana, a story of love and war, illustrated by Kemble. Part Two (Conclusion.)

THE OLDEST CHURCH IN LONDON.

St. Bartholomew the Great. By Norman Moore, with fourteen pictures of its ancient architecture by Pennell.

POEMS.

By Edmund C. Stedman, Robert Burns Wilson, Joaquin Miller, and others.

DEPARTMENTS.

Topics of the Time; Open Letters; Bric-à-Brac. Price, 35 cents. $4.00 per year. Sold everywhere.

New subscribers who begin with the Jan'y number can have Nov. and Dec. numbers free (if claimed when the subscription is entered), and thus begin the Lincoln Life and other serials.

THE CENTURY CO., New York.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

A Comtist Lover, and Other Studies.

By Elizabeth Rachel Chapman. Crown, 8vo. cloth, $2.00.

CONTENTS: Part I.—A Comtist Lover: Being a Dialogue on Positivism and the Zeitgeist—The Extension of the Law of Kindness: Being an Essay of the Rights of Animals. Part II.—The Delphine of Madame de Staël—Some Immortality-Thoughts—Some Novels of William Black.

 "The main essays on immortality and on the Rights of Animals and the Dialogue, are all of them splendid. The clearness with which you have grasped the problems at issue, the justice you deal to your opponents, and the masterly way in which you state your own high convictions are, to my thinking, quite admirable."—Frances Power Cobbe.

The Hayward Letters.

Being a Selection from the Correspondence of the late A. Hayward, Q. C., 1834 to 1884.

With an account of his Early Life. By HENRY E. CARLISLE. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $7.50.

The importance and great interest of these letters cannot be better proved than by mentioning the names of some of the principal of Mr. Hayward's correspondents, viz.: Mr. Gladstone, M. Thiers, Sir G. Cornewall Lewis, Count D'Orsay, Mrs. Norton, Lady Dufferin, Lady Palmerston, M. de Remusat, Louis Blanc, Dumas, M. Mignet, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Lord Dalling, M. Montalembert, M. Merimée, Lord Lyndhurst, Mr. Lockhart, Theodore Hook, Sidney Smith, Mrs. Grote, etc.

Verdi: An Anecdotic History of His Life and Works.

By ARTHUR PONGIN. With Portrait and Facsimile. Translated from the French by James E. Matthew. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $2.00.

Handbook to Robert Browning's Works.

By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR. Second edition revised, f'cap 8vo. Cloth, $2.25.

"Taken as a whole, this book—and it is no ordinary undertaking—bears evidence throughout of that courage, patience, knowledge, and research, and, last but not least, that lightness and firmness of hand which are essential in dealing with the work of a master whose art ranges so high, so wide, and so deep."—Academy.

About the Theatre: Essays and Studies.

By WILLIAM ARCHER, author of 'English Dramatists of To-day.' Crown 8vo. Cloth, $2.50.

Scientific Illustrations and Symbols.

Moral Truths Mirrored in Scientific Facts. Designed for the use of the Senate, the Bar, the Pulpit, the Orator, and the Lover of Nature. 12mo. Cloth, $2.50.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for international intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

CONTAINING

STANDARD WORKS of EUROPEAN LITERATURE in the ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference,

Comprising in all Translations from the French, German, Italian, Spanish, Scandinavian, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, and Greek.

687 Volumes, $1.40 or $2 each, with exceptions.

RECENT ADDITIONS.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE LATIN AND TEUTONIC NATIONS. Translated by P. A. Ashworth, Translator of Dr. Gneist's 'History of the English Constitution.'

HEINE'S TRAVEL-PICTURES: including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School. Translated by Francis Storr. With Appendices and Map.

GOETHE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH ZELTER. Selected, Translated, and Edited by A. D. Coleridge, M.A.

THE STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF HISTORICAL GEOLOGY. By A. J. Jukes-Browne, B.A., F.G.S., of the Geological Survey of England and Wales. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations.

WERNER'S TEMPLARS IN CYPRUS. Translated by E. A. M. Lewis.
"Werner was a Freemason, and his religious notions were, at the date of his writing this poem, of a theosophic order."—Preface.

PAUSANIAS'S DESCRIPTION OF GREECE. Translated into English, with Notes and Index, by A. R. Shilleto, M.A. 2 vols.

HOFFMANN'S TALES. The Serapion Brethren. First Portion, containing Thirteen Tales. Translated from the German by Major A. Ewing.

HAUFF'S TALES. The Caravan—The Sheik of Alexandria—The Inn in the Spessart. Translated by S. Mendel.

GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. A New Edition, containing pieces hitherto uncollected and a Life of the Author, with Notes from Various Sources. By J. W. M. Gibbs. 5 vols.

FOSTER'S ESSAY ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF TIME. Together with Notes of Sermons and other Pieces.

CHRISTIAN ICONOGRAPHY; or, The History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. By the late A. N. Didron. Translated from the French by E. J. Millington, and completed, with Additions and Appendices, by M. Stokes. 2 vols., with numerous Illustrations.

TALFOURD'S LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. With Explanatory Notes. New Edition, Revised and Greatly Enlarged by W. Carew Hazlitt. 2 vols.

HAZLITT'S SPIRIT OF THE AGE; or, Contemporary Portraits. New Edition. By W. C. Hazlitt.

A SELECTION.

ANTONINUS.—THE THOUGHTS OF M. AURELIUS.
BAX'S MANUAL OF THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (Centenary Edition, edited by Napier). 6 vols.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols. Translated.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols.
FAIRHOLT'S COSTUME IN ENGLAND. (Dillon.) 2 vols.
HUGO'S (VICTOR) POEMS. Translated.
MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols.
PEPYS' DIARY. 4 vols.
RICHTER'S LEVANA.
RICHTER'S FLOWER, FRUIT, AND THORN PIECES.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. Translated. 2 vols.
STAUNTON'S CHESS HANDBOOK.

 The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

TWO BOOKS FOR WINTER TOURISTS.

The Mexican Guide.

New Edition for 1887. By Thomas A. Janvier. 1 vol., 16mo. With large folded maps. Leather, net, $2.50.

In a letter to the publishers, Mr. Frederic E. Church, the artist, writes: "Frequent visits to Mexico have familiarized me with that country, and I do not hesitate to assert that in selection of material and in accuracy of details, as well as in general arrangement, 'The Mexican Guide' is most admirable. The author and publishers have made it a model of its kind."

AN IDYL OF THE SUMMER ISLANDS.

Bermuda.

By Julia C. R. Dorr. With map. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.25.

"A delicious book in its bright descriptions of a sunny land, where winter's snow and frost are never known. There is very little of hard, dry description in the volume, but there is much of accurate information deftly conveyed in a bright, off-hand manner, and the whole work is so permeated by a sympathetic feeling and comprehension for that which is most fascinating in Bermudian life, that we get a vivid impression of naturalness from the reading of its pages."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

THREE ENTERTAINING BOOKS.

The Buchholz Family.

Sketches of Berlin Life by Julius Stinde. Translated from the forty-ninth German edition. 12mo, 1.25.

"As charming and delightful as the freshest of fiction, simply because it is true, and the characters are real."—Philadelphia Press.

"The book is peculiar in form. It is not a novel, nor is it a collection of detached sketches, though each sketch may be regarded as a separate study. . . . It is a thoroughly artistic essay of the portraiture of every-day life in the great German middle class, and its remarkable success with its own public proves the faithfulness of the author to nature. Equally removed in tone from flippancy and didacticism, the sketches are at once firm and light-handed, and every stroke tells."—New York Tribune.

"Manners Makyth Man."

By the author of 'How to be Happy though Married.' 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

CONTENTS: Good Manners; Woman's Work—to Please; Mind Whom you Marry; Keeping up Appearances; Travelling with Advantage; Only Temper; Vital Force; Distinguished Service in Passion; The Wisdom of the Foolish; "God Almighty's Gentleman"; Matrimonial Manners; Family Government; Money is Character; Conversation; Only Trifles; Success in Life; What is Religion? The Wise Man's Conclusion; Wanted—A Man; A Husband-and-Wife Mutual Improvement Society; Vainglorious Housekeeping; About Reading, Tippling, Misapplied Virtues; In All Time of Our Wealth; How Do You Do?

"We have not found a dull page in the book. It is throughout bright, suggestive, and very wholesome. It is a book that will do great good."—Hartford Courant.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

How to be Happy though Married.

Being a Handbook to Marriage. By a graduate in the University of Matrimony. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.25.

"It is a complete handbook to an earthly Paradise, and its author may be regarded as the Murray of Matrimony and the Baedeker of Bliss."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"One of the cleverest, best-written books on the subject we have read at any time. . . . Each page sparkles with anecdote or suggestive illustration."—Ladies' Treasury.

 For sale by all booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by

Charles Scribner's Sons,

743-745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1887.

The Week.

THE unanimity with which the Senate Fishery Bill was passed, and the indifference with which it has been received by the country, betoken anything rather than war. There is perhaps some party politics behind the curtain. The Democrats must not allow the Republicans to pose as the sole defenders of the country's honor against foreign aggression. Without reference to the merits of the bill, they must forestall any imputation of want of patriotism. This can be easily managed because the execution of it is in the hands of a Democratic Administration. The bill provides that the President may suspend commercial intercourse with Canada, more or less, whenever our fishing rights, under the Treaty of 1818, have been wantonly infringed. This is a grant of power to the President of a very extraordinary kind —no less, in fact, than the power to ruin thousands of American merchants. No such power would have been granted by the Republicans without a political end in view. This end obviously is to catch the President and his party on one or the other horn of a dilemma. If he does not exercise the power conferred upon him, it will be said that he has come short of a patriotic duty. If he does exercise it, more or less suffering will ensue on our own side of the border, and for this he will be held responsible.

The responsibility for suspending trade relations ought never to be surrendered by the legislative power. At the time when Napoleon Bonaparte was issuing his Berlin and Milan decrees, and the British Ministry their Orders in Council, the Congress of the United States passed the Embargo and Non-Intercourse Acts, decreeing in fixed terms the suspension of commerce with the offending Powers, and giving the President power merely to relax the operation of the acts when one or the other of the offenders should desist from the injustice complained of. The embargo and non-intercourse acts were total failures in practice. Yet Congress preserved its dignity and its prerogatives by keeping within its own hands the power to close the ports of the United States, giving to the President the discretion merely to open them in certain specified contingencies. In the present case the power of closing and opening is surrendered to the President in a spirit of gush which is open to strong suspicion. When Senator Frye utters such fulsome praise of the President as is found in the recent Senate debate, it is well to inquire what it signifies. In our judgment it means that Mr. Frye wants him to make a liberal use of the dangerous power conferred upon him. It may do his Administration some harm. It can do him no good unless the provocation offered by the Canadians is more extreme than anything yet offered, for if a justifiable case for non-intercourse exists now, it is the bounden duty of Congress to declare and enforce it, and not leave it to the discretion of the Executive.

Some very instructive figures are supplied by Bradstreet's as to the comparative dimensions and importance of the fish trade between Canada and the United States and the aggregate trade of all kinds between the same countries. Some of the details are curious. It is singular to find that all the row with Canada relates to $1,105,382 worth of fish, that being the amount of dutiable fish imported in the year 1886, after the Washington Treaty had been repealed. In the year 1884, while the treaty was still in force, the whole amount of fish imported from the British provinces was of the value of $3,873,799, but of this amount about $1,500,000 worth was fresh fish not dutiable under our general tariff. So it would seem that not above $2,300,000 worth of dutiable fish was imported in a good fishing year. Since the repeal of the treaty the total importation has fallen off, a result which may be due in part to the reimposition of duties on salt fish and in part to a decline in the catch, but most largely, we presume, to the former of these causes. The next fact, not commonly understood, is, that Canada bought fish of us to the amount of $213,794 in the year 1886, reducing our net importation of fish, both free and dutiable, for that year to $1,963,000, or of dutiable only to $892,000. Another fact is, that our importation of hens' eggs from Canada exceeds our importation of dutiable fish by nearly $800,000, and nearly equals our importation of all kinds of fish, both free and dutiable. Lumber imports exceed those of fish of all kinds in the ratio of three and a half to one. Barley stands in the same ratio. In the total import trade, fish constitutes 5.8 per cent., and in the aggregate import and export trade about 2 per cent. It is the other 98 per cent. that the Retaliation Bill proposes to cut off, or authorize the President to cut off at his own discretion.

The present strike of coal-heavers, 'longshoremen, and the like in this city is superintended, if not set on foot, by a certain James E. Quinn, who has never had anything to do with coal-heaving or freight-handling in his life, but, when he had a regular calling, was a bookbinder. He is now pursuing the much more exciting and profitable business of Master Workman of District Assembly 49. His work now consists in negotiating as commander of an army with steamship proprietors and coal companies the terms on which he will allow them to carry on their business. He made a speech last week at the Cooper Union, in which he revealed the kind of dream which is filling the heads to-day of the labor agitators all over the country. He said:

"There is more in the cause of the workingman than the brains of the politician can understand. We propose that our organization shall get to that point where it will dominate all the institutions of this country. The question is not of any one particular organization. The question is of the protection of all classes of labor. We have many difficulties before us, but remember when the night seems darkest we are nearest to the rising of the sun."

Supposing District Assembly 49, for instance, "dominated" this city, it is easy to see what a personage Quinn would be. We should have to go to him for permits to put coal in our cellars, and have our butchers and bakers assigned to us on the first of each month. Supposing the General Assembly of the Knights "dominated all our institutions," of course the Master Workmen would be the "biggest men" the world has yet seen. The Venetian Council of Ten would be small potatoes compared to them. They would wield power such as only single despots have hitherto ever been able to get hold of. Who would be a plumber, or bookbinder, or 'longshoreman, or freight-handler, one minute after he saw within his reach even a distant approach to such eminence? We need hardly say that Quinn has long been an agitator, and was, in the Greenback days, a clamorous Greenbacker, or, in other words, was for "Government money" to be distributed to the people without the intervention of those odious institutions the banks.

What most interests the sober, sensible, and industrious people of the country is not what the Quinns are aiming at, but how long their ambition is to be fostered and their attempts to "dominate" by disturbing industry are to be encouraged by the politicians of both parties. This encouragement, of course, is mainly given by the refusal of governors, mayors, sheriffs, and the like to protect non-union men from violence when seeking work, and to protect the premises of employers against damage at the hands of strikers or by the slowness and feebleness of such attempts as they make to protect them. But it is also given most effectively by gross flattery of "Labor" in speeches and messages; by the pretence of a profound conviction of the power of Labor, and of the right of Labor (if this were an age of pure justice) to seize and consume every form of wealth; by professions of belief in and respect for all the labor platitudes and fallacies and follies, and by charlatanic recommendations that they should be embodied in legislation; and, though last not least, by attempts to embody them in bills drafted by the Quinns and Donnellys, in order to enable these worthies to keep their hold on their followers, and make the triumph of Labor and the appearance of dog-carts and coupés to take Labor to the Park in the afternoons seem near at hand. This most mischievous and shameful branch of the "labor movement" nothing will check or suppress except punishment at the polls. Nothing will ever cause the Hills and Greens and Orestes Clevelands to speak soberly and truthfully about labor, and do their duty to the peaceable and industrious, except their discovery that they will lose more votes than they gain by not doing so. They will probably find this out by and by, when the excesses and disturbances of Labor have made sufficient impression on the public to detach a considerable body of the voters from the old parties, in order to look after the primary interests of society, or, in other words, to provide for peace and security.

Whatever may be the magnitude reached by the coal strike, and however great the inconveniences it may entail, employers may as well make up their minds that they must resist it to the last. The coal strike has lost already, as the Southwestern railroad strike soon lost, the character of a dispute between a certain class of laborers and their employers. It has become, as the Southwestern strike rapidly became, an attempt to establish the power of the organization of Knights over trade and industry. If they find that by stopping or greatly diminishing the supply of coal or of any other commodity, for a short period, at this season of the year, they can bring employers to their terms, it is just as certain as the rising of the sun that they would repeat the process every winter and increase their exactions. In other words, the vast body of savings now accumulated at this point and invested in manufactures and shipping would pass out of the control of the owners, and into that of a body as irresponsible and unscrupulous as a party of Mexican bandits. Consequently the very cheapest and safest thing employers can do is to resist now. They must not forget, too, that in yielding to the demands of the Knights on an occasion of this kind they would not be yielding to the opinions or wishes of 17,000, or 40,000, or whatever the number may be, workingmen. They would be yielding to the threats of a small knot or junta of adventurers without character, or credit, or education, who control the organization without consulting their followers, and who, of course, enjoy the power and importance which their control of it gives them, and the money it puts in their pockets. To yield anything to these people is a crime against every honest and industrious man in the community. If it were gravely proposed to us to hand over to two dozen of the most upright, able, and illustrious men on earth the power to block the channels of trade and industry in this city at midwinter for any reason which to them seemed good, we should all say that we would die or emigrate sooner than submit to a despotism so odious. Well, we are threatened at this moment with something far worse, namely, the despotism of a small committee of conspirators whom no respectable business man would wish to take into partnership, or intrust with money or goods, or employ in any place of trust or responsibility, and who have never given any proof of capacity in any honorable and lawful calling, and whose names are not known outside the halls in which they meet to plan their attacks on society.

The Times suggests, as a very proper piece of labor legislation, a "bill to secure the punishment of the rascals who instigate hopeless strikes for the purpose of swindling the strikers and payers of assessments." There is no doubt that legislation in this direction is sorely needed, and ought to be pushed both by the real friends of Labor in the interest of humanity and by the pseudo-friends of Labor for the sake of consistency. It is only the outside of these great strikes—owing to the disorders they cause in the streets, and the disturbance and loss they inflict on industry—which attracts the attention of the general public. But the inside history of them is most pitiful. In all of them large sums of money are collected by a little committee of managers, not one of whom is probably worth a cent, or follows any regular calling, or has any credit. They render no account of it to anybody, and dole it out in such amounts as they please, for as long as they please, to the strikers, who are mostly poor, ignorant, and cowed men. That a very large part of it goes into the pockets of these managers, there is no reasonable doubt. In other words, every strike is honeycombed with fraud of the basest kind. After the Third Avenue strike, the scamps who engineered it went about showing sheafs of bank-bills in the most brazen way. In pocketing a good deal of the money, too, the managers are no worse than other men. It is what nearly all needy men do who get hold of the money of poor, ignorant people, and are not obliged to tell what they do with it. As we know from the melancholy story of Archbishop Purcell, even high dignitaries of the Church cannot be trusted under these circumstances. He spent the money of the poor intrusted to him in the way nearest his heart—in building churches. The Master Workmen and Walking Delegates probably spent it in the way nearest their hearts—that is, on themselves.

Now, we are strongly in favor of all labor legislation which is likely to promote the workingman's self-reliance, and cultivate his judgment and discretion, and are strongly opposed to all legislation which fosters the habit of blaming some one else for his misfortunes, and looking to somebody else for relief for his burdens, and of considering himself as the ward of the State. Most of the legislation "demanded" or proposed by him and his friends is extremely childish, and, if carried out, would soon make him as helpless as the Paraguayan Indians when the Jesuits had charge of them, and flogged them when they got drunk or came too late to their work in the morning. We desire to see this republic remain a republic of men and women, and not become a community of squalling children, ruled by a lot of knavish taskmasters and inspectors. But if any legislation for the protection of the laborer against the consequences of his own ignorance and helplessness, and against the greed or indifference of others, such as the labor reformers are constantly asking for, be proper or desirable, then assuredly we ought to have legislation for the regulation of these strikes. We therefore 'demand" a law, on the laborers' behalf, which shall either compel persons collecting money during strikes, in the shape of "assessments" for the benefit of the strikers, to publish daily audited accounts of the same, showing the source of the receipts, and the nature and object of the disbursements, or else provide a simple and cheap legal process by which they can, on the application of any contributor to the fund, be hauled into court on short notice, and compelled to show their books and vouchers. We know of no piece of labor legislation for which there is at this moment more pressing need. The evil it would attack is growing rapidly. The appetite for assessments on the part of the managers is probably the most potent cause of the increasing frequency of the great strikes.

The attempted destruction of the Old Dominion steamship Guyandotte by some kind of infernal contrivance recalls the desperate villanies of Martin Irons's men in the Southwest, when they found, to their infinite surprise, that the great world was moving on without them. They had argued themselves into the belief that they were the government of three or four States, and that they had only to set the brakes on railroad traffic to bring everybody in the attitude of petitioners to them, humbly asking of them the terms upon which society might be allowed to exist; they being, in fact, less than 5,000 persons all told, in a community of more than 5,000,000. When the truth dawned upon them that the earth was turning on its axis very much in the old way, in spite of all their efforts to hold it, their wrath was naturally kindled, and they declared war upon society. This is no figure of speech. The Adjutant-General of Kansas testified before the Congressional Committee that at Parsons, "Buchanan, the local leader of the Knights, took the position, and another gentleman, by the name of Hollis, who was present at that time, that they were entitled to the rights of belligerents; that it was justifiable revolution. Mr. Buchanan went so far as to bring his dictionary to show me the distinction between revolution and rebellion, and argued it at some length." Irons testified that he considered the strike an act of war, qualifying the remark by saying that it was so considered "by the property-owners also." At first the Knights denied that the acts of violence were sanctioned by the Order, but it was proved that the Master Workman of the local Assembly at Fort Worth commanded the party that fired on the train from ambush, when three deputy sheriffs were shot. It was proved also that the wrecking of the train at Wyandotte, where two men were killed, was planned in the Knights of Labor meeting-room in Kansas City, and that the wrecking party was headed by the leader of the local Assembly. Before the investigation was concluded, all pretence that the killing and maiming were done without the authority of the organization was abandoned, a moral sanction for those acts being sought for under the "war powers" of the Order.

The paper presented by the "Bartholdi Association Executive Committee" to the receivers of the Central Railroad of New Jersey exceeds in impudence anything recorded in the annals of Labor in the Eastern States, although it may be matched by the initial steps of the strike on the Missouri Pacific last year. In the latter case the strike was ordered without any notice at all. In the New Jersey Central case, four hours was allowed to the receivers to determine whether they would yield to twenty-three different demands, including two that could not be conceded because they were outside the jurisdiction and beyond the power of the receivers. One of these was a declaration that the freight-handlers of the road would not handle any freight that had been previously handled by non-union men. This declaration, which was tantamount to a demand that the railroad should not carry any freight that had been handled by non-union men, is made in the teeth of the Inter-State Commerce Bill just passed by Congress, which prohibits, under severe penalties, any discrimination whatever between persons in the transportation of property. Such discrimination is prohibited by the common law, but now we have, if the President signs the bill, a statutory provision which would subject the receivers to a fine of $5,000 each, besides damages to the injured party, if they should accede to the demand of the "Bartholdi Association Executive Committee," and refuse to receive freight that had been handled by non-union men. It is perfectly plain that the demands made upon the receivers were drawn with the intention of not being complied with.

Looking at the growth of the pension roll at Washington, we need not wonder that every little war-cloud on the horizon, the size of a weasel, becomes a whale in the estimation of a great many people. A few months ago a fellow named Cutting got into some kind of a scrape which led to his arrest by the Mexican authorities, and straightway volunteers for immediate service were offered by captains, colonels, brigadier-generals in various places, and by one Governor of a State. Now that the principle has been adopted that anybody who has served in any war and has since become "dependent" must have a pension, it will not need any violent extension of the principle to provide that anybody who has offered to serve in a war shall also have a pension, provided he becomes dependent afterward. It is to be expected that in the course of revolving years all the pension claimants of the war for the Union (and their widows by their side) will be buried in the graves of heroes. Then will come the chance of the volunteers who were prevented from fighting against Mexico or Canada by no fault of their own, for how can this country hold up its head in the world without a big pension roll? How can it compete with the nations of Europe unless it has disbursements corresponding to theirs? Can we imagine so disgraceful a state of public economy and national cheese-paring as a dwindling pension list? Whatever else we have or don't have, we must never be without pensioners. Looking forward to the time when death will have deprived us of this source of renown, and seeing the consternation that will come upon us when any year shall call for a smaller appropriation than the last one, the volunteers along the lakes, from Buffalo to Chicago, for immediate service against Canada are quite right in placing themselves in the line of promotion to the pension list. It was reported that the late Thurlow Weed drew a pension to the day of his death in consequence of being mustered into the Home Guards during the war of 1812. With such precedents before us, why should not volunteering flourish? Unless something is done to make good the ravages of time among the soldier element, we may be driven to pensioning the ex-rebels.

A morning contemporary, waggishly attached to the Democratic party, which was lately "running" Mr. Conkling for the Senatorship against Mr. Smith Weed, reprimands the Louisville Courier-Journal for assuming that President Cleveland will be renominated by his party in 1888. It should be remarked that the Louisville paper is waggishly opposed to Mr. Cleveland's nomination, but considers it inevitable, and declares beforehand its mirthful intention to support him if nominated, although it considers him grossly unfit for the place. Its New York contemporary thinks that the only danger of Mr. Cleveland's renomination arises from a mystification and misconception widely prevalent in the South that Mr. Cleveland is strong in New York, and will be able to secure the delegation of this State in the next national Convention. This opinion is in fact widely prevalent among greenhorns, so much so, indeed, that it may have a preponderant reflex influence upon the Democracy of New York. "It would indeed be the greatest political joke of the decade," says our waggish contemporary, "if men who feel thus should meet and accept as inevitable the easily preventable." Yes, it would be a joke fit to be repeated in any company of Democratic supporters of Mr. Conkling for the Senatorship as against Mr. Smith Weed. The two jokes together would not fail to set the table in a roar. If reinforced by the pleasantry of the Butler campaign of 1884 at any dinner party at the Manhattan Club, we would not be answerable for the consequences.

There was trouble of a very serious character in Tazewell Court-house, Virginia, a few days ago. Col. May, one of the counsel in a criminal case, was cross-examining a witness on a subject disagreeable to the witness, one Baldwin, who thereupon drew a pistol, and declared he would "settle" Col. May "if he reflected on his character." The Colonel drew a pistol also, to prepare for the settlement, but the officers seized Baldwin, and the affair went no further. As there had been no settlement, Baldwin was not called to account by the Court for a contempt, or any little thing of that kind. So he sent word to the Colonel that if he reflected on him in his argument on the following day he would hold him "personally responsible." The Colonel, however, says the local journal, "was making a powerful argument, and had discussed the salient points," when he got to the place where Baldwin's testimony was to be handled. Here the Colonel naturally "made an impressive pause," and then announced that he was going to do his duty by Baldwin, who thereupon made his appearance with a pistol and opened fire. The Colonel returned it, and the whole audience apparently joined in, and bullets were soon flying in all parts of the room. The Colonel received a ball in the leg; Capt. Tines was shot in the arm, the Rev. E. A. Tilling in the scalp, and John H. Witten had his front teeth shot out. Others had their clothing perforated. The judges do not appear to have taken part in the fray, but "behaved coolly," we are told, under fire. "Many people," the reporter says, "were glad after this that the trial was to end on the following day." Baldwin got off unhurt, having basely taken refuge in the jury room. Col May with Roman firmness offered to continue his argument with the ball in his leg, but his physician interfered.

The defeat of Mr. Goschen, Lord Salisbury's new Chancellor of the Exchequer, at Liverpool, following as it does his defeat at Edinburgh at the last election, is almost as heavy a blow for the Ministry as for him. The complete dislocation the Cabinet has undergone, and its shilly-shally policy in Ireland, have greatly weakened and discredited it with the public, and a few severe maulings in the House of Commons, such as it will probably receive, would compel it to try its luck again at the polls, or surrender at discretion. That it would get another lease of power in this way seems now unlikely, as a good many of the Liberal Unionists, to whose support it owes its existence, would almost certainly fail to be reëlected. When they were returned, anti-Gladstonite Liberals had not fully realized what a Tory Ministry kept in power by Liberal votes meant. The arrangement has disgusted and alarmed a good many moderate men, from the constitutional point of view, because it gives the office and the responsibility to Lord Salisbury, while giving the power to Lord Hartington. Lord Salisbury has been during the past year the constitutional adviser of the Crown, but he has taken no step without consulting Lord Hartington, who is not a minister at all. This is a sham of which the public has been growing more and more impatient.

The Italians sent a small force to Massowah, on the coast of the Red Sea, two years ago to take part in the British attempt to reach Khartum and occupy the Sudan. It was done from somewhat the same motives as actuated the Sardinians in taking part in the invasion of the Crimea in 1854—that is, a desire to form a sort of alliance with a great Power in view of future complications near home. The British invasion of the Sudan has failed, but the Italians have remained at Massowah, where they have from time to time attempted small demonstrations against the Arabs, in conjunction with the secular enemy of the Arabs, the Abyssinians. The Abyssinians are great fighters, and have, as their existence as a nation shows, generally got the better of the Arabs, but their luck or skill appears to have failed them at last, and they have shared the fate of the Egyptians in being cut to pieces, though led by their best general, Ras-a-lula. The small Italian force acting with them shared, or nearly shared, their fate. This has had the usual effect on the Italians at home. They are all for vengeance and the vindication of the honor of their arms, as the English were under similar circumstances. So the Chambers have voted almost unanimously more men and more money to pursue, in a deadly climate and through trackless wastes, an enemy who can never be conquered, and victory over whom has no result but the slaughter of so many men,

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, January 26, to TUESDAY, February 1, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE President has signed the act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

The President has vetoed the Senate bill granting a pension to Benjamin Obekiah. He has also vetoed a bill for the relief of H. K. Belding, a mail contractor, who asserts that in 1860 he performed service for which he was not paid, on intimation from the Postmaster-General that Congress would reimburse him. The President says: "It appears that this contractor, who in 1860 claimed that he continued full service upon the invitation of his own unanswered letter for less than four months, insists twenty-seven years after the date of the alleged service that he performed such service for seventeen months, and up to October, 1860. Not only has he himself in this manner almost conclusively shown that the claim now made and allowed is exorbitant, but the evidence gives rise to a strong presumption that it is entirely fictitious."

The President on Tuesday sent in a message vetoing the Senate bill granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Dunlap, mother of James F. Dunlap of the Seventh Missouri Militia Cavalry, who died in 1864 of wounds received at the hands of a comrade. The President shows that Dunlap was the aggressor in the quarrel.

In the Senate on Wednesday Mr. Hoar earnestly pressed his motion for an investigation of the charges that political rights are denied to American citizens in Texas. He contrasted the allegations of Texas citizens with the outrages upon the American fishermen, and asked if American citizenship in Texas was any less sacred than the rights of American fishermen in Canadian waters. Mr. Hoar's resolution was adopted—31 to 26.

The Senate, on Wednesday in executive session, again rejected the nomination of J. C. Matthews (colored) to be Recorder of Deeds in the District of Columbia.

The Senate Committee on Post-offices and Post-roads on Wednesday agreed to report an original postal-telegraph bill as a substitute for that introduced by Senator Edmunds. The new bill provides for the establishment by the Postmaster General of a postal-telegraph system by contracting for the performance of the service with existing telegraph companies. The Government is required to furnish the offices and make provision for selling stamps to cover the charges. The schedule of rates is fixed at 20 cents for twenty words where the distance of transmission is 1,000 miles, and 5 cents for every additional 250 miles; provided, however, that no charge for twenty words or less shall be more than 50 cents. Night rates are fixed at 15 cents for 2,000 miles or under. All words except the date are to be counted, and for every five words or less in excess of twenty, an addition of one-fifth the twenty-word rate is to be charged. The press rates are fixed at not exceeding 35 cents for each 100 words sent at night and 75 cents during the day, and the same pro-rata for each word in excess of 100.

On Thursday the Senate, on motion of Mr. Cullom, adopted a resolution directing the Finance Committee to inquire why the Secretary of the Treasury does not include the $15,000,000 of fractional currency in the amounts available, and to report what legislation, if any, is necessary to compel him to do so. It also passed "The Dependent Relatives Pension Bill," the Pension Committee having reported the bill just as it came from the House. It is said it will take fifty millions from the Treasury. This bill changes the policy which the Republicans have kept upon the statute books since the war, placing upon the pension rolls soldiers engaged in any early war even if they joined in the rebellion. It will pension Jeff Davis, for instance.

The Senate Finance Committee on Tuesday morning agreed to report favorably the Freedman's Bank Bill with some amendments, the bill to refund tolls to certain States, which, it is expected, will require $20,000,000, and the bill to reimburse New York and other States for arms furnished to Union troops.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee on Thursday referred the Retaliation Bill to a subcommittee for careful consideration. The sentiment was averse to hasty action.

The River and Harbor Bill was passed on Thursday just as it came from the Committee by a vote of 154 to 94. This action makes it almost certain that a river and harbor bill will be passed at this session.

The Texas Senatorial contest ended on Tuesday in the election of John H. Reagan as United States Senator on the thirty-second ballot.

When Mr. Hearst (Dem.) presents his credentials as United States Senator from California at Washington, his claim to the seat will be contested by H. W. Vrooman, who has certificates that all the Republicans in the Legislature voted for him, and that he has therefore a majority of the legally-elected members of the Legislature.

It is said that Representative W. R. Cox of North Carolina, the civil-service reformer, will be the new Minister to Turkey.

It is settled now that Mr. C. N. Jordan, Treasurer of the United States, will relinquish his present office on May 1, in order to accept an office, probably the vice-presidency of the Western National Bank of the city of New York, now organizing, and which will be fully established by that date. It is also believed that Secretary Manning will soon resign, to be succeeded by Mr. Fairchild, and will possibly take the presidency of the same bank.

The decrease of the public debt for January was $9,750,000.

The report of the Commissioners of the Niagara Falls Reservation was presented in the New York Assembly on Monday night. Its estimates for the future are that the income for the coming year, plus the amount on hand, will about pay expenses. But after next year, the income from sales of property ceasing, the reservation will have to depend on fixed income from privileges, the inclined railroad, etc., which will not be sufficient.

A full force of new men was at work on all the piers in this city on Monday, and the longshore strikers were practically beaten. The freight-handlers of this city on Monday presented a demand for an increase of wages, and threatened to strike on Tuesday if it were not granted. They accordingly struck on Tuesday at most of the railroad piers in New York.

One incident of the strike was the attempt to blow up with dynamite the Old Dominion steamer Guyandotte, which left New York on Monday afternoon for Norfolk. The explosive was in a valise, and the infernal machine went off at about 5:45 P. M., knocking a big hole in the hurricane deck and injuring two men. The man who placed the valise on board has not been discovered. The Guyandotte put back to port.

The boot manufacturers of Worcester, Spencer, and North Brookfield, Mass., on Wednesday posted the following notice in their factories: "Recognizing the fact that justice can only be obtained by according to both employer and employee the right of individual contract for his or her labor, this factory will hereafter be open only to such operatives as will agree to deal individually with the firm or its accredited representative."

Ex-Alderman John O'Neil of this city was on Tuesday night found guilty of bribery in the Broadway Railroad scandal.

FOREIGN.

Contrary to the expectation of the most sanguine Liberals, Mr. George J. Goschen, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was on Wednesday defeated in the Exchange Division of Liverpool by Mr. Neville (Gladstonite), the vote being 3,217 to 3,210. The news was received at the different Liberal headquarters with the wildest enthusiasm. Mr. Neville's election has done almost as much as a general election could to clear the political atmosphere. It will make the Government more chary of dissolving Parliament.

Parliament reassembled on Thursday without any unusual demonstrations. The Queen's speech, after reviewing the peaceful relations of England with all the foreign Powers, says: "The condition of Ireland still requires your anxious attention. Grave crimes in that country have happily been rarer in the last few months than during the similar period of the preceding year; but the relations between the owners and occupiers of the land, which in the early autumn exhibited signs of improvement, have since been seriously disturbed in some districts by organized attempts to incite the latter class to combine against the fulfilment of their legal obligations. The efforts of the Government to cope with this evil have been seriously impeded by the difficulties incident to the method at present prescribed by statute for dealing with such offences. Your early attention will be called to proposals for the reform of legal procedure which seem necessary to secure prompt and efficient administration of the Criminal Law. Bills for the improvement of local government in England and Scotland will be laid before you. Should the circumstances render it possible, they will be followed by a measure dealing with the same subject in Ireland. A bill for improving and cheapening the process of private-bill legislation for England, Scotland, and Ireland will be submitted. You will be asked to consider measures having for their object the removal of hindrances which exist to the cheap and rapid transfer of land; to facilitate the provision of allotments for small householders, and to provide for the readier sale of glebe lands. A bill for altering the mode of levying tithes in England and Wales will be submitted. With regard to Scotland, you will be asked to consider measures for the reform of the universities, for completing the recent legislation as to the powers of the Secretary for Scotland, and for amending the procedure of the criminal courts."

In the House of Commons on Thursday night W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury, gave notice of the Government's intention to introduce measures for the reform of the rules of Parliamentary procedure, and said he would ask facilities for giving precedence to the consideration of these measures, that they might be at once discussed from day to day. Mr. Smith said the discussion of the procedure measures would be subject only to such interruptions as might be necessary for the conduct of urgent business. Lord Randolph Churchill explained the reasons which led him to resign from the Cabinet. He said he retired because the Government's naval and military estimates exceeded £31,000,000, without counting the large supplementary estimates. He insisted on having these estimates reduced, but his colleagues refused to cut them down, "although," added Lord Randolph, "I had been urging economy ever since August." Lord Randolph then referred to the Government's foreign policy, and declared amid loud Opposition cheers: "I also objected to the Government's policy of needless interference in the affairs of other nations. The Marquis of Salisbury wrote, defending the estimates in the face of possible war, as he said. There was no course left open for me but to write my resignation." The letter in which Lord Salisbury accepted Lord Randolph's resignation was read. In it he said: "The outlook on the Continent is so very black that it is not too much to say that the chances are in favor of a war at an early date. When once it has broken out we shall not be secure from being involved. Therefore, we cannot accept the responsibility of refusing supplies which the War and Navy Ministers have declared necessary."

Mr. Gladstone made a brief speech, in which he applauded what he called Lord Randolph's sacrifices in behalf of a sound economic policy. He found no fault with the Government's foreign policy, but strongly objected to the severance of the Treasury portfolio from the Premiership, and the combining of the latter with the heavy duties of Foreign Secretary. He hoped the country would oppose the oppression of Bulgaria by a foreign Power. He greatly regretted that the Queen's speech had not expressed regret at the recent lamentable evictions in Kerry.

In the House of Lords, the Marquis of Salisbury, alluding to Lord Randolph's resignation, said he thought the execution of Lord Randolph Churchill's policy at the present time would inflict an injury on the public service, because it was a time when no one could tell what crisis might happen. The Marquis said he hoped the Conservatives would soon again have the advantage of Lord Randolph Churchill's services. He said that nothing known to him gave an impression that there was imminent danger of war.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach made a long and able speech in the House of Commons on Friday evening. "The Government," he said, "will soon introduce legislation for dealing with the condition of the miserable Inhabitants congested in certain districts of Ireland." He denied most emphatically that he had ever exercised a dispensing power in granting Government aid to sheriffs for evictions, but admitted that he had put pressure on landlords to induce them to come to terms. Finally, he foreshadowed coercion in the following words: "I will not enter into the details as to legislative measures with regard to Irish criminal law. We have done what we could with the tools ready to our hands; but difficulties and delays inseparable from the working of the ordinary criminal law as it now exists render it in our judgment insufficient to cope with such proceedings as described in the name 'plan of campaign.' We are pledged to maintain the Union; but it is no use to maintain the Union—it is worse than useless to maintain the Union—it would be better to have separation, unless with the Union we maintain the reign of law in Ireland."

Lord Randolph Churchill made a telling speech in the House of Commons on Monday night. The Liberal-Unionist alliance he declared he had never regarded as other than a useful crutch. As for Mr. Chamberlain's latest suggestion for a rounder round table at which Salisbury and Gladstone should meet, he laughed at it. He spoke contemptuously of Mr. Chamberlain's extraordinary gyrations, and asserted strongly that his own resignation was not upon the question of fortifying coaling stations, but of general retrenchment. He challenged his late colleagues to appoint a special committee to inquire into the army and navy estimates. "It is not the first time," he added in conclusion, "that it has been my ill fortune to wrestle with the Tory party; but on this great question of retrenchment and economy I patiently await the judgment of Cæsar."

Mr. Parnell moved the following amendment to the address in reply to the Queen's speech: "The relations between the owners and the occupiers of land in Ireland have not been seriously disturbed in the cases of those who granted to their tenants such abatements as were demanded by the prices of agricultural and pastoral produce. The remedy for the crisis in Irish agrarian affairs will be found, not in an increased stringency of criminal procedure or in the pursuit of such novel, doubtful, and unconstitutional measures as those recently taken by her Majesty's Government, but in such reform of the law and system of Government as will satisfy the needs and secure the confidence of the Irish people."

The Government's proposals for the reform of the procedure rules of Parliament leave the numerical limitations for enforcing closure the same as before, but transfer the initiative for demanding closure to any member who has obtained the Speaker's consent to make the motion. Motions to adjourn the House and discuss business of urgent public importance, which have been dependent hitherto upon the consent of forty members, shall not in the future be made without the consent of the Speaker, to whom a statement upon the subject proposed to be discussed must be submitted in writing.

Mr. Chamberlain writes to the London Times at considerable length to show the practicability of the adaptation of the Canadian Constitution to Ireland, to meet the fundamental conditions of Lord Hartington's plan for the government of Ireland. Mr. Gladstone, writing to a Glasgow paper, says there are many circumstantial differences between the cases of Canada and Ireland, but within and under them there is a strong analogy. In the main they have the same friends and foes. Toryism has not supported freedom in Canada, and resists it in Ireland.

Mr. Gladstone, in an article in the February number of the Nineteenth Century, contends that though Ireland formerly gained concessions from England through fear, an attempt by Ireland to repeat her former tactics would be like warring against heaven now. England's strength compared with Ireland's is as ten to one. He would rather rely, he says, upon England's innate sense of justice. Mr. Gladstone defends the American donations to Ireland, on the ground that they have done much to stave off famine.

It is announced that the British Imperial Government has consented to send out men-of-war next season to assist in the protection of the Dominion fisheries.

Two of the seized American schooners have recently been released on the payment of nominal fines. United States Minister Phelps had an hour's conference with the Marquis of Salisbury on Friday at the Premier's request to discuss the Canadian fisheries question. The conference was most cordial on both sides.

There was terrible rioting in the Petershill, Carrickhill, and Shankhill Districts of Belfast on Saturday night. The trouble originated through soldiers belonging to the West Surrey Regiment insulting a number of Catholic civilians. The latter retaliated by stoning the soldiers, many of whom were injured. This was followed by wholesale arrests, more than 100 persons being placed in the lock-up. On Sunday evening the rioting was renewed, and the police and the mob exchanged shots. Many persons received gunshot wounds, and a large number of others were more or less bruised by being struck by stones.

Commander Cameron has offered to lead a second expedition to relieve Emin Bey. The sum of £3,000 has been offered towards the expenses. Henry M. Stanley telegraphed from Cairo on Monday as follows: "Nubar Pasha desires me to contradict the reports that the Egyptian Government is raising difficulties for the Emin Bey relief expedition. The men and everything I have asked for will be ready for departure on Monday." Mr. Stanley adds that everything is proceeding satisfactorily.

A Grand Imperial Council was held at Vienna on Saturday, at which it was decided to convoke the delegations for March to vote extra credits of $15,000,000 for the army and a special credit for the equipment of the Landsturm.

The Vienna Fremdenblatt's announcement of the decisions of the Imperial Council caused a heavy fall on the Vienna Bourse on Monday, and there was almost a panic. It is reported that a credit of 46,000,000 florins will be demanded exclusively for the regular army, and additional credits for the Landsturm.

The Berlin Post (semi-official), in a leading article entitled "On the Edge of the Knife," on Monday said: "The position of Gen. Boulanger is now not only strengthened, but is becoming unassailable. He is the master of the situation to a degree that neither Thiers nor Gambetta ever was. He can only govern the situation by keeping up the warlike impetus he has given to it. The impression left on the minds of all observers is that, the armaments of France having been pushed forward with feverish energy, Boulanger no longer has the power to lead the people back to the path of peace. If he attempted to do so, he would have to quit his post burdened with reproach for having led France to the brink of a great peril." The National Liberal party in their manifesto say: "Never since the Franco-German war has the danger of a great conflict been so near. No statesman can form any certain conclusion as to the future, even for a few weeks. The peace of Europe rests at this moment solely upon the strength, readiness for action, and moral trustworthiness of the German Army." The Post's article caused a panic on the Paris Bourse on Tuesday, three per cent. rentes declining 2 francs and 67½ centimes. The bourses of Berlin, Vienna, and other capitals were panicky. Everywhere the belief that war is imminent is prevalent. It is said that the Emperor William has finally decided that the question must be settled in his lifetime.

The Pesther Lloyd publishes a communication from Berlin which it asserts is from an authentic source, and which states that war between Germany and France is regarded as more probable at Berlin than is to be inferred from the information which is permitted to be accessible to the public. "It is erroneous," says the letter, "to suppose that the semi-official press of Germany publish the details of French armaments merely for the purpose of influencing the people in the coming elections. We happen to know that Prince Bismarck recently, when he had that view of the case presented to him, quoted, in reply, from 'Faust,' the words, 'Thou resemblest the spirit whom thou comprehendest; not me.' The Prince added that the statements made in behalf of the German Government respecting French armaments were not put forth as any part of election manœuvring, but as a warning, and he said the cold douche had been turned on with less force this time in order not to provoke the people too much, but it would be turned on with greater strength if that was found to be necessary."

At a court reception at Berlin on Friday Emperor William informed the assembled officers that 72,000 men of the reserves would be called out immediately and be drilled in the use of the new repeating rifle. He added: "This action will produce loud rumors of war, but there will be no war. The reserves will be called only to accustom them to new weapons." It is reported that the Crown Prince at the same reception said the situation was still serious.

An order has been issued forbidding the exportation of horses across the German frontier in any direction. In special cases deserving of exception, exemption will be made from the present and from future measures controlling the exportation of these animals.

In the French Chamber of Deputies on Friday M. Laguerre's motion to abolish the censorship of plays was opposed by the Government, and was rejected by a vote of 338 to 169.

The Bulgarian delegates, in an interview with Premier Tricoupis of Greece, said that they would never yield on the question of changing the present Government of Bulgaria

OUR STANDING ARMY OF PENSIONERS.

It has always been our boast as Americans that we are not obliged to support a great standing army, and that we thus escape the crushing burden of those vast military establishments which Great Britain and the Continental nations are forced to maintain even in time of peace. But the people of the United States are already supporting a standing army of pensioners which approaches in numbers the dimensions of the standing armies of the greatest Powers, and the annual pension list in this country calls for an expenditure almost as large as the cost of sustaining those immense military establishments. If the new Pension Bill which has just passed Congress becomes a law, and an allowance of $12 a month is granted to any veteran of any war who claims that he cannot earn a living, the number of pensioners will far exceed that of any standing army in Europe, and the yearly appropriation for their support will be vastly greater in amount than the annual expense of any such army.

When the pending pension bill was before the House, one or two inquisitive members sought to gain some idea as to its probable cost. The promoters of the measure, as usual in such cases, rather resented such questions, and tried to dismiss the matter of expense as worth little thought. Being pressed to make at least a guess at the probable sum, the Chairman of the Pension Committee presented the only data for an estimate which anybody had thought it worth while to collect before pushing the proposition to an issue. It has been learned by inquiries addressed to the local authorities that in 1,240 of the 2,583 counties in the United States there are 5,172 soldiers and sailors now supported in public institutions of charity. On this basis it was estimated that there are in all such institutions in the country 10,344 veterans As to the number in the soldiers' homes, both State and national, there was "no exact information"; but the Committee made a guess that there were not over 3,000. They then made another guess at the number who are not supported by public charity, but who receive private relief from persons not legally bound for their support, and, allowing five to each county, added 12,905 for this class, making in all 26,249 probable new pensioners under the bill, to whom were further added 6,856 as the number of those claimants whose cases are now pending in the Pension Office under former laws, but who naturally would avail themselves of the more generous terms of this measure. This makes 33,105 veterans of the Union army in the civil war who were expected by the Committee to avail themselves of the $144 yearly allowance. But the bill includes also soldiers in the Mexican and Indian wars, and, adding 10 or 15 per cent. to the above total for this class, Mr. Matson, Chairman of the Committee, held that "it would still require less than $6,000,000 per annum to pay the expenses of all the pensions provided for in the bill."

Mr. Matson insisted that this was a liberal estimate of the cost of the new measure, but it only requires the most cursory acquaintance with previous pension legislation to show that it is ridiculously inadequate. Mr. McKinley of Ohio says that, instead of requiring "less than $6,000,000," this bill (with the allied Mexican Pension Bill, which went through the House on the same day) "will take from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually out of the Treasury, and I do not know but a great deal more." The highest of Mr. McKinley's estimates does not so far exceed the guess of the Committee as the cost of the Arrears of Pensions Bill (which has already taken more than $218,000,000) exceeds the mere bagatelle of $20,000,000 which its promoters fixed as the maximum possible cost of that scheme. A candid consideration of the facts indicates that $50,000,000 a year will fall far short of the demands which will be made upon the Treasury under this bill.

Four years ago the Commissioner of Pensions, in his annual report, made some calculations which show that 2,049,969 different individuals enlisted in the volunteer forces for longer or shorter periods during the civil war, to whom should be added the 16,422 in the regular army and navy at the beginning of the civil war, making a grand total of 2,066,391 who fought on the Union side. Of these, 359,496 died in the service, leaving more than 1,700,000 alive at the close of the struggle. On the 30th of June last there were upon the roll the names of 268,807 men who served in the army or navy during the war, and incurred wounds or disabilities entitling them to pensions under our present most liberal laws. Making a generous allowance for the deaths among ex-soldiers since the war, it seems reasonable to conclude that there must be still surviving nearly 1,000,000 veterans who are not entitled to pensions under existing law—for the longevity of soldiers, when it is a question of pensions, is proverbial, as is illustrated by the fact that of our little force in the war of 1812, which ended nearly three-quarters of a century ago, there were no less than 1,539 drawing pensions last June. Besides, there are to be added to the survivors of the civil war the men still living who fought in the Mexican war, the Seminole and Black Hawk wars, and other little struggles which, although they cut but a slight figure in history, always develop an unexpectedly large number of survivors when there is an offer of pensions. There can apparently be no doubt that there are a million men in this country who served in one or another war, and who become possible candidates for pensions under the proposed bill.

In considering how many of this million would get pensions, it must be remembered that practically all the men who were either wounded in battle or incurred disability which a conscientious person could attribute to army service, are already pensioners. We are to deal now with a class which includes all the shirks who tried to keep out of harm's way, all the men who entered the army not from motives of patriotism, but because they were either attracted into it by the great bounties offered or were forced into it by draft—in short, all of what that gallant Union soldier, Gen. Bragg of Wisconsin, called in the House the other day "the rubbish of the army." Many of these are men with little self-respect, who, no matter how vigorous they may be, are eagerly looking for a chance of getting supported at the expense of somebody else. Moreover it must be kept in mind that any chance to get a living at the public expense offers a temptation before which many men who would ordinarily be considered men of self-respect are sure to fall, since it is so easy for any one to persuade himself that he is not able to work when he finds that it is not necessary to work. Of the million men who might apply for pensions under the pending bill, it is a moderate estimate to say that fully half would get them; the probability is that much more than 500,000 would be found on the roll within a short period. Half a million men would call for $72,000,000 a year.

Taking the moderate estimate of 500,000, let us see how our standing army of pensioners will compare with the standing armies of European nations, using the latest figures, in most cases for the current fiscal year:

Great Britain (regular army)	209,480
Austria-Hungary "	286,423
Germany "	449,342
France "	523,283
U. S. pension roll (all classes) now	365,783
U. S. pension roll as proposed, at least	865,783

Compare now the entire cost of the military establishments, including ordinary and extraordinary expenses, in these great Powers, with the present and the probable cost of our standing army of pensioners:

Great Britain	$102,477,010
Austria-Hungary	51,307,602
Germany	91,522,495
France	126,366,086
United States annual pension bill now,	75,000,000
United States annual pension bill as proposed, at least	147,000,000

In other words, our pension roll already is almost double the standing army of Great Britain, far exceeds that of Austria-Hungary, is more than two-thirds as large as the French army, and more than three-fourths that of Germany, while a moderate estimate of the additions probable under the pending bill would swell its dimensions to the appalling total of 865,000 persons, against only 523,283 in the largest of these European armies. The regular annual pension appropriation bill recently passed by Congress far exceeds the entire cost of maintaining the whole military establishment of Austria-Hungary, and is about three-fourths as large as the cost of that establishment in either Great Britain or Germany, while the $147,000,000 to which it would be swollen at the very least under the pending bill would make the burden more than half as large again as the cost of the standing army even in Germany.

The standing armies of the great Powers are quite as heavy burdens upon the people of Europe as they have ever been represented. But, unless a halt is called, the rage of demagogues will have imposed upon the people of America a heavier burden of taxation for pensions than even the French or the Germans have to endure to maintain their vast military establishments. Fortunately there is a chance to make public sentiment felt in this matter before the President will be called upon to act; and while the press may do much to strengthen the President to veto the measure, private appeals from individuals, particularly from such as served in the war, may be even more potent.

HOW THE INTER-STATE COMMERCE BILL WILL WORK.

THE President has not yet acted upon the Inter-State Commerce Bill, but, with the great majorities in both houses of Congress in its favor, even an Executive veto will hardly prevent its becoming a law. Hence it may be assumed that this new departure is now definitively taken, after the many futile starts at the Capitol in the same direction. It is taken, but no one can foretell where it will land the public and the transportation interests directly affected by it. The very uncertainty as to its effect was, indeed, the most striking incident of its enactment. The debates immediately preceding its passage, even, justify the assertion that Congress has never before made so conscious a leap in the dark. They were marked by features the like of which, we venture to say, rarely, if ever, have been seen in any legislative body in this or any other country. Here was a measure the most important provisions of which, viz., the long and short-haul and anti-pool clauses, had a vital bearing upon the commerce, industry, and agriculture of the whole land. They were retained in spite of the most earnest protests of the principal commercial bodies East and West. They were so framed that every Senator and member who spoke upon the bill, including its authors and most active promoters, admitted their want of clearness and their liability to every sort of interpretation. Not one pretended to understand their meaning, or to be able to measure exactly their probable practical working. But, while all admitted their uncertainty, no appeal for amendment availed. It was clear, in fact, from the beginning, that the majority in each house were entirely under the influence of the belief that Congress must do something to satisfy the popular clamor for anti-railroad legislation. Hence the law-makers were less disturbed by the risk of subjecting the most important material interests of the entire nation to a crude and incomprehensible law, than of exposing themselves to the chance of popular disfavor.

There is a strong probability that the law will be a failure, with the single exception of the provision requiring publicity of tariffs. Not that the latter is the only good feature of the law, or that we consider Federal supervision over common carriers altogether impracticable. On the contrary, we hold that it contains other provisions, such as the clause prohibiting discrimination in rates, which, if enforcible, would correct acknowledged evils. We hold that a moderate exercise of authority by the national Government over the transportation interests, within practicable limits, and working through the natural influence of the Government and the force of public opinion, rather than through over-exacting legislative prescriptions, would be of great public benefit. But we contend that the law as it stands is nothing less than an attempt to substitute for the established business organism, so to speak, of the country, a piece of State socialism at variance with the real interests of the people and with the national character. It is evident, too, that the very effort to provide a solution for perhaps the most intricate problem of modern times, all at once and by force of one law, inevitably led to the creation of inadequate machinery, of a multiplicity of functions and complication of details, and that in its practical application the law will encounter such obstacles as will reduce it to a dead letter. This is our deliberate conclusion, based upon careful study. Space does not permit us to state all the reasons for it, but we will give the principal ones.

In dealing first with the focal point, as it were, the long and short-haul clause, the task is easy, as the proof is furnished by Senator Cullom himself. During the final discussion in the Senate, the few of his colleagues who had the independence and courage to expose the true character of the bill subjected him to a close examination as to his construction of the clause. He was led to say that, as he and the other members of the Conference Committee understood it, the qualification of the prohibition to charge more for a short than for a long haul by the terms in the clause, "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," meant that such prohibition would apply only and exclusively in cases of transportation where certain circumstances and conditions combined. "To my mind," the Senator said, "these words 'circumstances and conditions' are full of meaning. They comprehend all the circumstances and conditions that may justify differences in rates, such as competition with other railroads and with water routes, the volume and character of business at different points, the difference in terminal expenses and the cost of service in each case." This means clearly, and the Senator did not deny it when it was so construed by his colleagues in his hearing, that the inhibition is not intended to be enforcible in any case in which any of the defined circumstances and conditions obtain, or, inversely stated, that the inhibition applies only in cases where none of these circumstances and conditions operate. Well did a Senator defy all his colleagues to cite a single possible case in all railroad experience not coming within this alternative, and well might another exclaim, "With that construction, all the beneficial part of the bill is given away."

We need hardly add that, with this construction as a fulcrum, it will not tax the ingenuity of railroad managers very seriously to lift the short and long-haul clause out of the way. In this view, it is perhaps not necessary to dwell upon the practical results of a possible enforcement of the clause. It may be taken for granted, however, that such a contingency would prove a real calamity to the public, while it might be a real boon to the common carriers. For the law does not prescribe, as a good portion of the public seem to imagine, a fixed rate per mile according to distance. Under its language, it will be possible, as Senator Cullom distinctly admitted, to charge for a short haul any rate not higher than and not equal to the rate for the longest haul. In other words, local rates may be charged for any distance just under the rate for the longest distance. It is certain, therefore, that, in case of an enforcement, all the carriers whose earnings from through business are unimportant as compared with local earnings, would go out of the former, but find more than compensation for the loss of it by increasing local rates. Take, for instance, all the Pacific railroads and all the lines from Missouri River points to Denver. With all of them the profit from through business forms but a small percentage of their total net revenue, and they would all largely gain by withdrawing from it and raising their local tariff. But such a policy would work immeasurable mischief for all the so-called competitive points, which are the chief commercial and industrial centres. For "to get out of" or "withdraw from" the through business would really mean for the railroads to do it at rates, fixed for the sake of high local rates, that would entirely paralyze the interior commerce of the country. This would, of course, forthwith produce an irresistible reaction against the law that would not be long in making itself felt at the Capitol.

To come now to the feature next in importance, the interdiction of pooling. It is a characteristic fact that, while as to the long and short haul a door was deliberately left open for its modification in practice, pooling is prohibited peremptorily and absolutely. Yet the petitions and remonstrances from the most important Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce before Congress had emphatically protested against such prohibition, as pools had unquestionably proved a great gain to the general business community by securing stable rates. Moreover, the experience of every other country is to the same effect. In Germany, Austria, and Russia, where there is partial Government ownership of the railroads, the Governments directly foster not only interior but international pools as the best means of insuring satisfactory income to the roads and of meeting the wants of the public as to rates. We deem it as certain as anything, in the solution of the railroad problem in the United States, that the national Government and the public will, after a short period of trial, unite in adopting the correct view of pooling

Meantime, how will the prohibition work? We believe that among the scores of men of the sharpest wit and longest experience intrusted with the management of the principal American railways, there is not one who has not already devised a method of his own by which the object of the pools may be reached in ways not in formal contravention of the law. One of the means to secure to railroads the advantages of pools without infringement of the law might be a system of actually dividing and carrying traffic at the same rates, instead of the present system of not dividing traffic, but dividing the earnings for it with hauling allowances. Then pools might be arranged within the limits of States, so as to exempt them from the operation of the law under the proviso of section 1, and settlements be made between such State pools. Independent of such resorts, we think it a very open question whether the limitations of the powers of State corporations by the anti-pool section will be sustained in courts of law or equity. The consolidation of direct or indirect ownership—the former exemplified by the absorption of many local lines into the New York Central system, and the latter by the form of control of Western lines by the Pennsylvania Company—would be another method of getting beyond the scope of the law, in keeping with the continuous tendency since the close of the civil war towards the evolution of great systems of lines through the absorption of the weak by the strong.

The strongest evidence of incompetence to deal with the subject lies in the provisions for the execution of the law. They create as the main instrument for this purpose a commission of five members and one secretary. It may be assumed, under the rules of ordinary business life, that those who own the stock and bonds of transportation companies know more about the transportation business than those who do not. But the opposite view prevails in the law, as owners of such securities are disqualified for service on the Commission. The six men composing this body are expected to perform prodigious feats of labor, the prescribed extent of which only proves that the framers of the law had no conception of what they were really requiring. The Commissioners are constituted, indeed, not only stationary and travelling investigators of and judges upon any and all transgressions of the law, but also examiners and regulators of the accounts and traffic relations, and collaters and digesters of the regular annual reports of the common carriers placed under their supervision. The magnitude of the burden thus imposed upon the Commission can be easily seen. Under the terms of the law, any person in the United States has an unqualified right to complain to the Commission of any supposed or real grievance against any common carrier. Now, considering this and the other provision of the law, that "all rates shall be just and reasonable," and considering also the constitutional inclination of most producers and shippers to look upon common carriers as their natural enemies, the inevitable result can be readily conceived. The Commission will be simply overwhelmed by a flood of grievances. The mass of material of this sort continually accumulating in the general offices of any one important railroad would furnish a measure of the vast uncontrollable aggregate that will pour in upon the Commission. We do not hesitate to say that any one of the great trunk lines will furnish sufficient matter for months of unceasing inquiry by the six men. Yet the law compels them to hear complaints not only against every railroad, but against every other common carrier by land and ocean, lake and river!—and not only to receive complaints against all these from any one who chooses to make them, but to carry on regular prosecutions of the offending common carriers in the Federal courts.

Their physical inability will be in the way, too, of the fulfilment of the other duties put upon the Commissioners. It implies almost childish ignorance to expect them to be able, in addition to their other task, to examine and report upon the financial condition, the revenues, the systems of account, all the methods of operation of each and every common carrier throughout the land—in other words, to achieve a work that is now being done and can only be done literally by tens of thousands of men under the direction of hundreds of experts distributed through hundreds of railroad offices If what the law aims at is to be really accomplished, nothing short of the organization of a regular department in Washington, with bureaus in every State and Territory, will do it.

We have stated the main reasons for our conviction that the law as it stands cannot be executed in practice. But we should consider it a national misfortune if this awkward attempt should result in the entire failure of railroad regulation by the Federal Government. Nor do we fear such an outcome. We believe, on the contrary, that this first experiment will gradually lead to a better understanding of the true requirements of the case, and to sound legislation in accordance with them.

IRELAND.—JURIES, THE LORD MAYOR'S BANQUET, EVICTIONS.

DUBLIN, January 19, 1887.

THE unsound state of feeling in Ireland is in no way more strikingly shown than in the condition and prospects of the jury system—the relations between jurors and the letter of the law. In all cases connected with politics or the tenure of land, however clear the evidence and the judge's charge, there is not the slightest chance of obtaining a conviction unless the jury has been "packed"—unless, roughly speaking, all Catholics have been, by challenges or "stand-asides," eliminated from the chosen twelve. A few weeks ago I had some personal experience of the kind. I was on a jury to try a peasant for having assaulted a policeman at a seizure for rent. There was a majority of Catholics on the panel, but only three or four were allowed to enter the box. The evidence was of a conflicting character. Against the apparently straightforward testimony of two policemen, a positive alibi was sworn to by some eight peasants, one of whom declared that he himself had thrown the stone. On our retiring to consider the verdict, it was evident that agreement was impossible. Three declared they would not believe the testimony of the police under the circumstances, seven that the evidence as to alibis by Irish peasants was worthless, and two were undecided as to their verdict. It was the second time the case had been tried within a few days, and the annoyance of the judge at the result was undisguised.

Conceptions of law in Ireland are poisoned at their source by the sense that the wishes of the minority prevail instead of the convictions of the majority. And the very effort of the Government to enforce and uphold the law under the present régime still further complicates matters. To secure convictions in certain important cases, Catholics are told to "stand aside"—an outrage to Catholic feeling throughout the country. To secure the intellect of the community and encourage lawyers to stand by the powers that be, friendly lawyers are appointed to influential posts, and, having served there, are promoted to the highest offices. The judge is by the people too often rightly regarded as one whose business it is, not to hold the scales of justice even, but to obtain convictions. In the above case the judge had been for long years in the Government service, and he carried with him to the bench all the proclivities of the Crown prosecutor—cross-examining the witnesses towards the guilt of the prisoner, and charging heavily against him. Frequently the judges have put off sentencing the prisoners, in momentous agrarian cases, until the end of assizes, so as not to alarm jurors by the severity of sentences following their verdicts. We now have the possible severity of the sentence considered, and naturally considered, by jurors.

I was much struck by the remark of one of the jurors in the case referred to: "Do you think I would find him guilty? Don't we all know the judge wants to make an example of him?" Like most ethical questions in troublous times and a disordered condition of society, the obligations of a juror's oath are not simple, however dangerous the admission may appear. British liberty has been much "broadened down" by the refusal of jurors to find verdicts upon the clearest evidence and the most direct dicta of the judge, this refusal having led to the modification and amelioration of the laws. Human feeling is approvingly permitted to play a large part in verdicts. A few years ago the inmate of an English prison made a savage attack upon a warder. The evidence was unquestionable. The law, as laid down by the judge, necessitated a conviction; yet the jury unhesitatingly acquitted the prisoner, and all England approved. The warder had killed a mouse which the prisoner had domesticated in his cell. Either the jury system must go down in Ireland, or the laws and sentences must be modified so as to meet the average sense of right and wrong of jurors. One of the worst heritages of misgovernment and degradation is the undermining of respect for truth. A people too weak to defend themselves are apt to shelter behind falsehood. Many will be the sufferers—great, doubtless, will be the laxity of the law in many directions, before the people of this country come to regard the sanctity of an oath as a free community regards it—before they learn to regard deceit as a source of weakness instead of a shield for the suffering and oppressed.

A few evenings ago the Mansion House presented an interesting spectacle. In the great Round Room built for the festivities with which, in 1821, George IV. was welcomed to Dublin, the Lord Mayor gave a banquet in honor of Mr. Labouchere, M. P., and Mr. Conybeare, M. P., as representatives of the English friends of home rule. The change was great from such banquets of the pre-Parnellite period. "This is a different Dublin from the Dublin I knew ten years ago," remarked a guest who had been absent from Ireland for some time. Formerly the Lord Lieutenant used to be the guest whom the New Year's banquet was designed to honor. "The Queen" was the chief toast, the Lord Lieutenant's speech was the great event of the evening; the judges, Government officials, the officers of the garrison, and of the war ships in harbor were the principal guests. How great is the change!—an uncompromising Home-Ruler in the civic chair; Irish members under the shadow of a state prosecution, and English Radicals, the most honored guests, the rank and file being the leaders of the people in the corporation, in the wards, in trade societies. "The old order changed, giving place to the new." The brilliant "V. R." in gas jets which used to crown the dais has been removed, and a harp with shamrocks substituted; and for the toast of "The Queen," that of "Our Native Land" was given. Contrary to the preconceived ideas of many regarding the democratizing of institutions, the Mansion House is, under the new régime, a much better kept, brighter, and more tastefully decorated place than formerly. "The people," who are unaccustomed to brightness and embellishment at home, appear to appreciate and demand them in their collective institutions more than do the class who, in their personal surroundings, have such tastes constantly gratified. It is pleasant to be able to add that although scantiness of wardrobe was in some instances shown in the absence of evening dress, and although the supply of wines was unstinted, the general demeanor of the company compared favorably with that of the more select assemblages of former times.

The warm approval of the conduct of the Irish movement generally, and of the "plan of campaign" in particular, evinced by the guests of that evening, as lately by many British friends upon British platforms, is striking and encouraging: yet the masses of the thoughtful and the educated and well-to-do who tacitly approve of the same in Ireland do not practically throw themselves into the movement. It is easier to see the rights and wrongs of a contest from a distance than on the battle-field and in the confusion of the campaign. Moreover, the rights and wrongs of actual warfare are, according to present ideas, more easily defined than is a struggle such as that now waged in Ireland. Declare war, dress men in uniform, sound the bugle, give the word of command, and murder becomes right, the seizure of the enemy's property is praiseworthy, every underhand trick and lying subterfuge is accepted as necessary. The moral laws are suspended. Proclaim peace, call off the troops, everything falls into its natural place—lying becomes lying—robbery, robbery—murder, murder. But how is this Irish warfare conducted? By supporting all who declare themselves unable to meet their engagements with their landlords; by branding as selfish and as traitors those who on an estate may be better able to pay than others, and who are willing to pay; by claiming for the movement a constitutional basis, and yet supporting the people in opposition to the laws and the constituted authorities; classing the good landlord and the bad landlord together; acknowledging and supporting local associations which support their members in strikes against rents for property created by the landlord, as well as against rents for that created by the tenant. In effect, sympathy is proffered to the tenant, no matter how much he may be responsible for his own misfortunes; while open or effective sympathy is withheld from those on the other side, no matter how innocent they may be—whether a Mr. Field struck down by the assassin for his honest verdict as a juror, or the Curtin sisters still shamefully persecuted for defending their hearth and the gray hairs of their father from the midnight marauders. In the destruction of the landlord's interest in land, land as a security for debts of any kind is made valueless. In the grim holding on of tenants to their little places, cottiers and laborers see a warrant for giving as much trouble as possible to their landlords. Landlords prefer a ruined or a boarded-up piece of property to one which, in occupation, may bring them into odium, and so the ownership of land and houses tends more and more to fall into the hands of those who are callous as to the opinion of either tenant or public.

"And yet all this must be; through no other possible means is there a way out of it," was in effect, in answer to a private communication, the expression of opinion of one of the most high-minded and clear-sighted of Englishmen. That the conclusion of the contest may not be too long delayed is most earnestly to be desired, for the confusion of public and private ideas of rectitude, such as now exist here, is perhaps more demoralizing and irremediable than the disturbance of ordinary warfare would be. The agitation can reach a resting-point only in some form of home government, and in the immediate or prospective abrogation of the dual ownership of land. But it is not an agitation resting upon clearly defined moral lines like that for the abolition of slavery. It is largely necessitated by the abuse of rights upon the acknowledgment of which civilized society rests, not of arbitrary claims opposed to civilization. Every phase of both the present agitation and the coming settlement is therefore full of perplexity to persons not endowed with the happy and sustaining faculty of seeing only one side of the question.

The scenes at the evictions now going on at Glenbeigh and elsewhere are heartrending, and are profoundly stirring public feeling in England. But if extremities are never to be resorted to in Ireland with people who appear unable to pay rent, we shall have a permanent premium on the simulachres of poverty, and an extension of the limits within which too many of our population are satisfied to increase, under circumstances which preclude any but a low degree of civilization. D. B.

CARDUCCI.

ALBERGO PELLEGRINO,
BOLOGNA, January 10, 1887.

Qui in agosto e settembre MDCCCXIX albergò
e per la libertà congiurò
Giorgio Gordon lord Byron che alla Grecia la vita all'Italia diè il cuore e l'ingegno del quale
niuno surse tra i moderni più potente d'accompagnare alla poesia l'azione niuno più inclito e pietoso a cantare le glorie e le sventure del nostro popolo

a ricordo
con gratitudine d'italiano
Francesco Ravaldoni pose
1 gennaio MDCCCLXXXVII.*

THE qui means the Pellegrino Hotel in Bologna, where, if police records did not suffice to prove how Byron was dogged by the authorities, suspected of conspiring with secret societies against the Austrians and for the independence of Italy, we have Rogers's kindly memory of their meeting:

"'Twas where hangs aloft
That ancient sign, the Pilgrim welcoming
All who arrive there—all, perhaps, save those Clad like himself, with staff and scallop-shell,
Those on a pilgrimage. And now approached Wheels, through the lofty porticoes surrounding Arch beyond arch, a shelter or a shade
As the sky changes. To the gate they came;
And, ere the man had half his story done,
Mine host received the Master—one long used
To sojourn among strangers, everywhere.
. . . . . Much had passed
Since last we parted; and those five short years,
Much had they told! His clustering locks were turned Gray; nor did aught recall the youth that swam
From Sestos to Abydos. Yet his voice
Still it was sweet; still from his eye the thought
Flashed lightning-like, nor lingered on the way,
Waiting for words. Far, far into the night
We sat conversing—no unwelcome hour,
The hour we met; and when Aurora rose,
Rising, we climbed the rugged Apennine."

Here at Bologna as in Venice and Ravenna, Byron's heart beat in unison with the dreams of liberty, even as he had sympathized with the Americans and later with the French, till Napoleon turned tyrant. This, more than his poetry, which has never been decently translated, is the hold he has on Italians, whose poets, if you note, from Dante downwards, have always been patriots and politicians. These may seem contradictory terms, but they are not so in reality. I remember being much struck with a remark made by Prof. Nichol, author of the 'Astronomy of the Heavens,' in his beautiful observatory at Glasgow: "Our poet Burns," he said, "was a patriot; his 'Scots wha ha' kept country love and liberty alive in the hearts of many generations; so we were never conquered, but of our own free will cast in our lot with England. But Ireland's poet was a love-sick rhymer, and Ireland owes to Tom Moore a heavy portion of her material and moral slavery." Now Italy's nineteenth-century poets have no such crimes to answer for. From Foscolo, who preferred exile to Austrian rule, to Manzoni, who, if too resigned for struggle, spurred on others by his choruses in the "Adelphi;" to Niccolini, who, in his "Arnaldo di Brescia," bearded the priest of Rome; to Berchet, who armed the populace of '48 with the weapons forged in 1821; to Giusti, whose satires cut sharper than bayonets and swords; to Mameli, the soldier-poet, who met his death on the Janiculum while his fellow-soldiers, boy warriors like himself, were shouting his war hymn: "Fratelli d'Italia, l'Italia è desta!"—all, all have loved Italy better than fame, deeplier than life. Nor is Italy's one living poet an exception. Giosuè Carducci, who just now traced in pencil the epigraph which is being engraved on marble for the vestibule of the "Pilgrim's Hotel," is first a patriot then a poet, and I learned to love his poems from the lips of Giorgio Imbriani, who fell in the first hour of the first fighting day at Dijon, January 19, 1871, when Garibaldi, who had offered all that was left of himself to France, betrayed at Sedan and now invaded, kept the enemy at bay and took the only flag lost by Prussia to France. A patriot, we say, not a partisan; for if he has immortalized Mentana, he has celebrated the feats of the old King, Victor Emanuel, and if he has refused the medal of the Order of Savoy, "because he would have to kneel and with his hand on the Gospels swear fealty to the King and his successors," he has written an Ode to Queen Margaret which will live when the very existence of queenship shall have passed away.

What a tempest in a tea-cup there was when that Ode appeared, and how valiantly in sternest, raciest prose our poet defended himself, first for consenting to be presented to her, and then for singing of her beauty and her grace. The Liberals had been but a short time in power, and the royal couple came to Bologna just after the attempt on the King's life by the mad Passananti at Naples—came accompanied by Benedetto Cairoli, the last of five brothers dead for Italy, and by Zanardelli, the dauntless Brescian, whom the Queen welcomed in the poet's words—

"Lieto del fato Brescia raccolse,
Brescia la forte, Brescia la ferrea,
Brescia leonessa d'Italia."

adding: "I should like to see Carducci, Italy's greatest living poet."

So up toiled Zanardelli to the fifth story, and leads him to the reception hall.

"And I," quoth Giosuè, "who had seen and sought and studied in the history of the epopee and the drama so many queens, was most curious to see a real living queen interested in poetry and the arts. And in the morning I went to pay my respects to the royal heads, and my little girl said: 'Salute the Queen for me.' Liberty is the child's name, and I thought it was a good augury. . . . I have not the antipathy for the house of Savoy which the Lombard Democrats have, with Cattaneo's pen consigned in pages of fire. The Estensi were all mediocrities, and there are no more of them, and the Medici finished as befitted a family of bankers clothed with the purple, not the cuirass; nor did the cuirass hide the original stain of the Farnesi, who were sons of priests. So, if the Italian people, persuaded that their country could not be unified save by monarchy, called on the scions of Savoy, what fault is it of theirs, O Alberto Mario?*

"The historical and political ambition of the dynasty would probably have been limited to Upper Italy. We, we ourselves, Giuseppe Mazzini at our head, drew them to central Italy, Garibaldi won the South for them and won them to the South. And now, thanks to the plastic tendency of the human animal to realize personally its own idealities so as to adore or vituperate them at will, the head of the family of Savoy represents Italy and the state. So, Viva l'Italia. Valets, uplift the curtain, let us pass to salute the King . . . and the Queen, also, l'eterno femminino."

Thus the puritans, who demurred at their poets

* "Here, in August and September, 1819, lodged and for liberty conspired George Gordon Lord Byron, who to Greece gave his life, to Italy his heart and a genius than which never arose in modern times one more potent in uniting action to poetry, more able and tender in singing the glories and the woes of our people.—Placed here in memoriam with an Italian's gratitude, by Francesco Ravaldoni, January 1, 1887."

* This was written in 1880, when Alberto Mario, then editor of the Lega Democratica, preached as he had practised (by refusing rank or seat in a monarchical Government) the duties of republicans. He, however, worshipped Carducci as a poet, and on his death-bed whispered: "Do write the history of the Renaissance."

singing the Eterno femminino regale, were treated to some fifteen pages of historical prose to which none ever made reply.

It is difficult to say which of Carducci's poems delight you most. His early ones, brimful of light and brightness, all pagan in their love of life and Grecian in their joy of beauty, enchain and enchant: then his wine and war songs exhilarate and stir. But it is the memories of the battles fought and lost for liberty that are the sweetest and, alas, the most untranslatable. Carducci uses so few words and such little ones that it is next to impossible to put them even into the oldest Saxon English. Longfellow could have translated Carducci, and perhaps Robert Browning, and surely he might be tempted to try the twelve sonnets, "Ça ira"—a swifter, terser, more life-like picture of the French Revolution than even our Carlyle's. All Carducci's poems call forth fierce and fiery criticism. I think sometimes that the critics, Bonghi not excluded, exaggerate on purpose to win from him a prose defence. If so, they succeed to their heart's content, as precisely in the case of this "Ça ira." Sometimes his passionate sympathy for the dead heroes makes him steep his pen in aloes to embitter the unearned honors of some "knight of industry"; but this is rare, always an afterthought, which may be left unread without deducting from the completeness of the poem.

Carducci is, without exception, the hardest and the most conscientious worker ever known in Italy. He was born in the Maremma, and left by his father's death quite young, with a mother and sister entirely dependent on him. Then he took to himself a charming, dowerless wife, and kept both families by his pen, preparing editions of classic authors for the press, and next by prose writing. He is now professor of literature at Bologna, and a Wednesday lecture of his is a joy for ever. On other days he makes one of his scholars take his chair and act the professor, while he questions and criticises with the rest. He is now at work on a third edition of his selections from celebrated authors, as we should say. How carefully he selects! how he searches all that previous writers have said about his authors! A wonderful text-book indeed is his for boys in the upper schools, and finer still will be that for the students of the lyceums. I fancy his works now amount to about a dozen volumes of prose and poetry. He may be said to live by his prose and for his poetry; but, of late years, even for his poems he obtains a fair price, which no one, I suspect, has ever done in Italy since Manzoni laid down his pen.

Carducci is a writer and a poet worthy to be known in America, though he would not thank your correspondent for introducing him by an "epigraph"—a thing he disdains, but has been hitherto too good-natured to refuse, protesting, however, that this is to be the very last.

J. W. M.

Correspondence.

THE SUPPLY OF TEACHERS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: There are many phases of the problem concerning the "supply of teachers," and they cannot all be treated in a brief paragraph. The matter is complicated not only by an inordinate desire on the part of young girls (sometimes, it must be confessed, unwisely stimulated by parents and instructors) to become teachers on account of the supposed "respectability" which attaches to the calling, but also by their disinclination to accept positions in rural schools, where social opportunities are limited and remuneration is small, and by the additional important fact that nearly all women (and many men) only look upon the work of teaching as a temporary expedient by which they can make a livelihood while awaiting their actual settlement in life.

Perhaps there is no practicable method of dealing with all these complications, which inevitably result in an immense supply of inefficient, indifferent, well-nigh worthless teachers, and comparatively few of the first class. Your correspondent "B." seems to me correct in saying that "arbitrarily cutting down the numbers of those who are trying to prepare themselves will, under the present system, afford no proper relief." But is the case entirely without remedy? Cannot the principles of the civil-service reform be applied with some prospects of relief at least? The power of removal must be left unchecked in the interest of efficiency—because, while it may be sometimes abused, it is not here that the chief abuses exist, and without it school boards would be well nigh powerless to enforce faithful work. But there is certainly great room for improvement in the conditions of admission to the teacher's calling, and it can best be secured by making that admission depend upon the approval of professional teachers. Commissions of such should be established under the authority of the State, for the examination of applicants, classes should be designated for different kinds of schools, and no person should be allowed to draw a cent of the public money who does not hold a certificate from the examiners corresponding to the work he is hired to do. The examiners should, of course, be entirely independent of local school boards. This measure would be a welcome relief to the appointing power, for at once an immense share of the elements of "pressure" and "influence" in behalf of unfit candidates would be eliminated.

Something of this, in fact, the State is already doing, through normal schools, but even in Massachusetts a large number of teachers are not graduates of and have not attended the normal schools, while all over the country so-called normal schools are often not at all what they are supposed to be, but in very many cases are simply doing the work of academies and high schools, with perhaps a small amount of incidental instruction in methods of teaching, and nowhere are they professional schools in the same sense as medical and law schools.

W. P. Beckwith.

Adams, Mass., January 25, 1887.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Is there not some depth to this question of "Supply of Teachers," discussed in last week's Nation? Is teaching regarded and paid as a profession, and is not State legislation seriously defective in this regard? Are not both the public and the teacher to blame—the teacher for her low idea of her profession, and the public for its indifference to the details of school work?

It is remarkable that, after over twenty years of peace, more progress has not been made educationally, with reference to efficient teachers, permanency of office, examination of applicants, etc. Civil-service reform, now grafted into our body politic, seems to be a stranger to pedagogue-dom. While there is a science of teaching, little of it gets into the schools, and Comenius, Rousseau, Pestalozzi, and Froebel are, to the rank and file, merely names. It is a common joke among us that the mention of Rousseau's 'Emile' or Goethe's 'Wilhelm Meister' to the average teacher usually calls forth a stare of inquiry. Pestalozzi and Froebel proved that there is an art of teaching. A multitude of men have proved that there is a Science of Education, and a few disciples of education have shown that there is an Art of Teaching. How noble a thing to write on the theory and principles of education! How ignoble a thing to try to put those principles into practice!

But is there a profession of teaching? The Chicago Tribune says there is no profession of teaching. The number of persons engaged in teaching, according to the Census of 1880, exceeds the sum of all the lawyers, physicians, surgeons, clergymen, and journalists; the former amounting to 227,710, and the latter to 226,811. Swett of San Francisco says that, out of the 300,000 teachers in the United States, not one out of ten is a graduate of a normal school; that, of the other nine-tenths, few have become skilled teachers; that in a few cities only normal graduates are employed. The training schools connected with public schools, and which are now becoming common, deal, I believe, only with primary work. At best there is only a part or remnant of a profession of teaching in this country. The State laws sanction this view of it. Many States require an annual examination. Throughout the Union, teachers are elected for one year. Is there any State in the Union requiring training on the part of the teacher before teaching? Where is it? Still the popular idea exists (incomprehensible to a German) that any one can teach who can get a certificate. Then, a normal-school diploma and a life-diploma do not pass from State to State, although the legal diploma practically does. We are considered as unprofessional educational vagrants. We are compelled to shift, to fly for our lives, yet taxed and examined at every turn (like travellers through Italy), as if we were transporting dynamite in our pockets. This is worse than a high protective tariff! Then the short terms of school officials, low salaries, and the tendency to employ the cheapest, are another slur on the would-be profession.

Every number of the Nation brings us a communication on civil-service reform. The cardinal importance of fitness, retention in office, and advancement according to merit apply exactly to our present educational needs, and with crushing force. The educational church throws open her doors to all. The State establishes practically no educational limitation for applicants. Iowa has ordered her saloons closed (transferred them to the drug-stores), but lets Tom, Dick, and Harry instruct her young. We need "protection" here. Claude R. Buchanan.

Wilton, Ia., January 24, 1887.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your item in regard to the New York City Normal School graduates deserves attention, as it may add to the arguments continually used against the training of teachers. I cannot speak of the difficulties the New York graduates meet in procuring situations, but I am tolerably conversant with other normal schools. The graduates of Oswego and Bridgewater, for instance, are in great demand. The Cook County Normal School graduated seventy-eight last June; seventy of them immediately took good places in the graded schools of the county, and Mr. A. G. Lane, the County Superintendent of Schools, informs me that he could have found places for one hundred more. These places—the hundred—had to be filled by inferior teachers because skilled teachers could not be found. The remaining eight of the seventy-eight were offered places out of the county, and six of them accepted, two preferring not to teach at present.

I am quite sure that if I had four hundred graduates yearly, they could all find good places. One day last week I received four requests for teachers—salaries from $500 to $900. The Cooke County Normal School is no exception to the rule. There is a great demand for good teachers. There are, however, thousands of incompetent, untrained teachers waiting until political influ ence shall put them into places. Please revise your opinion about normal schools.

FRANCIS W. PARKER.

NORMAL PARK, ILL., January 22, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am at a loss to understand Col. Higginson's statement that there is a lack of teachers in this State. A service of between four and five years on a school committee has proved to me that there are enough unemployed teachers to supply all the schools in the Commonwealth. Certainly that is the condition of things in this section. There lies before me, as I write, a "list of approved candidates" for teacherships in Salem which contains the names of fifty-one, all graduates of the State Normal School. Some of them have been waiting ever since 1880 for schools. School committeemen are constantly besieged by young women seeking positions, many of them finely educated.

WINFIELD S. NEVINS.

SALEM, MASS., January 22, 1887.

AN AMERICAN TEACHER IN IRELAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A few months ago at the centenary of one of the principal Quaker schools in Ireland, Mount-Mellick, interesting mention was made by several of the old scholars of a certain American citizen, Samuel Prescott Dole, who, some forty years ago, for a few weeks taught at the school. Nothing was heard of him after his departure, and a very general desire was expressed for some further information regarding him. He was a man of original genius and wide information, and had travelled on foot over Europe; and the belief was expressed that if he had lived he must have attained to distinction in his native land. Could any of your readers give any information concerning his previous or after life?

Yours truly,

ALFRED WEBB.

DUBLIN, January 19, 1887.

THE DEGREE OF A.B.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of your editorial remark upon Prof. Palmer's answer to his critics in regard to what he calls a "petty difficulty," I may perhaps be allowed to say, in my own and others' behalf, that it is a very poor answer to those who claim that the Bachelor's degree ought not to be disturbed in the possession of its ancient privileges. If it is a matter of small consequence, the innovators will act wisely by leaving the conservatives in possession of the old and betaking themselves to the new; the latter do not think it a matter of small importance. I am a thorough believer in the elective system, yet I do not believe that any one is entitled to the degree of A.B. whose collegiate training is not largely based on the ancient languages. All the arguments I have yet seen from those who advocate the giving of this degree to indicate simply the completion of a four-years' course of study, remind me of those used by the wolf when he had determined to eat the lamb: having made up their minds to do a thing—for reasons of expediency, perhaps—they justify their action by the best arguments within the reach of a bad cause.

Most persons who use the terms "definite" and "precise," when speaking of the classical course, intend them to be understood in a general, not in a mathematical, sense. And it may surely be claimed for the "old-fashioned" degree of A.B. that it, at worst, represents a minimum of Greek and Latin, mathematics, and history. It was definite almost in the same sense that M.D. or B.D. or LL.B. are. These degrees likewise "take an individual variation of meaning for every one who wins them"; but no one will need to ask the winner of a LL.B. whether he claims to be a lawyer or a theologian.

But, granting that the A.B. of twenty years ago was indefinite, does anybody claim that the new system makes the case any better? Nobody is likely to do that. Or will some of our colleges say in substance to the father, Twenty-five years ago we made you a Bachelor of Arts for work that was somewhat indefinite, but we expect to make the case clearer to the public by giving the same degree to your son for work of an entirely different character? If the old degree is so indefinite and meaningless, it is strange that any of the reformed want it all. We should suppose that they would wish the superiority of the new education to be indicated by some appropriate degree.

Every collegiate degree given twenty-five years ago claimed to represent a certain amount of knowledge, and indicated roughly the chief sources of that knowledge. The Bachelor of Science and Bachelor of Philosophy had studied little or no Greek, more rarely no Latin. In no case did the degree claim to represent even a minimum of culture. In this sense all degrees were and always will be more or less indefinite. But let us not mix up two things that are so easily kept separate, and which ought to be so kept. All experience proves that now and then a student only wastes time by trying to learn a foreign language, and that he may nevertheless attain a fair degree of scholarship in other departments. Some students who make little progress in the dead languages do fairly well with the living. The mind of one learner may be most effectively trained by means of one science, that of another, by another. And it is not asking our college authorities to do an unreasonable thing when we demand that they shall indicate as nearly as may be the sources of the training received by the graduates they send forth. It is the common error of new converts to claim more for their system than its merits justify.

CHAS. W. SUPER.

[The reformers who decline to relinquish the degree of A.B., with all that it implies, to the conservatives, may contend that it has long meant nothing more than graduation from a higher institution of learning. It threw some light on the probable courses of study of the recipient, but none at all on the quality of his instruction or the height of culture and discipline attained. For all practical purposes it was necessary to affix the name of the college or "university" conferring the degree. This is still and will always be necessary, and the conservatives have a complete remedy as against Harvard by leaving to that college the naked A.B., and uniformly writing A.B. Yale, A.B. Princeton, etc., etc. No one asked that Harvard should abandon the degree of M.D. when it resolved to examine for admission to its Medical School only those who had had a liberal education. This really put a new and higher value on the degree, though, as before, it simply stood for graduation from the School. —ED. NATION.]

"RELIABLE," ETC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As quoted by your correspondent "J. W. A.," in No. 1123, Bishop Coxe denounces reliable as an "abominable barbarism." It is lucky, this time, for those who endure the word, that its assailant is restrained by a sense of episcopal dignity. He does not, indeed, go the length of saying, as the Saturday Review said only the other day, that the man who uses reliable "is a donkey and a vulgarian." Still, in calling it an "abominable barbarism," he does not, perhaps, divide himself by very many leagues from those who season shallow philology with euphemistic billingsgate. At all events, he faces it neither with judicial calmness nor with competent information. For my own part, even though I have found it to be respectably analogical, and though I have proved that it has extensively the sanction of good usage—the sole determinant, in general, of what is acceptable in language—my affection for it is not at all consuming. To get at the truth about it is all that concerns me.

Nine years ago I published a long list of noteworthy writers who had not scorned reliable and its derivatives. To that list I now add Mr. Thos. Arnold, the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, Mr. Walter Bagehot, the Rev. J. S. Brewer, the Rev. Dr. J. W. Donaldson, Messrs. Robinson Ellis, James Grant, W. R. Greg, James Hinton, Dr. W. B. Hodgson, the Rev. Dr. F. G. Lee, Archbishop Longley, Col. G. B. Malleson, Mr. J. C. Morrison, the Rev. Frederick Oakeley, Mr. Richard A. Proctor, the Duke of Somerset, Mr. Henry Sweet, Sir G. O. Trevelyan, Mr. Anthony Trollope, Dr. W. G. Ward, and Sir Monier Williams. As to the age of reliable, it was pointed out by a lady, in 1877, that it occurs in a letter, dated as long ago as 1624, written by the Rev. Richard Montagu, afterwards Bishop of Chichester, and then Bishop of Ely. From 1624 it apparently slept until it was resuscitated, or redevised, by Coleridge in 1800.

I now come to another point. That Bishop Coxe is so ill supplied with relevant facts as he evinces himself to be regarding expressions like Lord Macaulay's "to fully appreciate," indicates either that his reading has been most limited, or else that he has read most inattentively. "J. W. A.," I should surmise, has seen, though he does not name, the paper in the American Journal of Philology, Vol. iii, where I discuss such phrases at length. Among the users of them there mentioned is the Rev. Dr. John Donne—a dean only—who is now transformed into "Bishop Doane." In Donne's 'Polydoron' (1631), I have lately come upon "to truely judge," etc., six times. In addition to the instances, similar to those given above, which I collected in 1882, beginning with Wyclif, I now know of others, viz.: from Margaret Duchess of Savoy (1513), the Rev. Richard Bernard (1598), Edward Grimstone (1604), G. Woodcocke (1606), the Rev. Richard Carpenter (1642), the Rev. Dr. Henry More (1681), the Rev. Myles Davies (1716), Jethro Tull (1739), W. Horsley (1746), the New Spectator (1784), Robert Southey (1813), H. T. Colebrooke (1818), Thomas Carlyle (1831 and 1850) William Beckford (1835), "George Eliot" (1876), and James Spedding (1879). Bishop Coxe need, then, no longer suspect that the locution referred to travelled to Great Britain from American "tap-rooms," as he suggests that it did. In his hasty opinion it is, besides being "vulgar," "illogical." Elsewhere I have shown that it is just the reverse. Logic, pretty clearly, is not the Bishop's forte.

"In this connection" is "a New England phrase" and a "very illogical provincialism," asserts "J. W. A." It is neither; and I could make good my contention. But here I must stop, as this letter is already too long.—Your obedient servant, F. H.

MARLESFORD, ENGLAND, January 20, 1887.

BROOKS'S HISTORY OF MEDFORD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In 1855 the late Rev. Charles Brooks compiled a history of Medford, Mass. A portion of the edition, it is said, was destroyed by fire, and the book has for some years been quite a rarity. Now a new edition has been issued by Mr. James M. Usher, who has altered and amended it according to his own views.

Probably I am not an impartial judge of the result, for the following reason: To Brooks's history there was appended a genealogical register of families, entirely prepared by me. This is now reprinted with sundry omissions and trifling additions. But Mr. Usher has reproduced all the errors and omissions of my work, although he was offered the use of the extended and most valuable corrections made for me by the late Thomas B. Wyman, jr.

Finding the new history so lamentably and unnecessarily deficient on this point, I can only view with suspicion other changes which I have not had time to examine. I can only regret that Mr. Brooks's work was not so reprinted that one could tell for what portion he was responsible.—Yours very truly, WILLIAM H. WHITMORE.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST SILVER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The people on the Pacific Coast who are continually complaining that Eastern bankers and business men discriminate against silver, and cause the Government at Washington to discriminate against it, do not seem to realize that "they condemn themselves, for they that judge do the same things." In Oregon and California every promissory note of the banks and money-lenders is made payable, principal and interest, in gold coin. All promissory notes, indeed, and usually sheriffs' sales, are made with this condition. The same custom prevails, as I am informed, in Nevada, as it does to a considerable extent in the Territories west of the Rocky Mountains.

This is a discrimination against silver which I never heard of in the Eastern States, where everybody accepts legal tenders of the United States in payment of debts. During the suspension of specie payments it was regarded in Oregon as a breach of commercial honor to pay a debt in greenbacks. To "greenback" a creditor was a commercial crime, almost; and the victims of such an atrocity had their revenge by posting the offenders in the black list of the advertising columns of the newspapers. The merchants made great profits by buying their goods with greenbacks in the East and selling them here for gold. In no part of the country have the masses of the people suffered so much from cheap money as in these sections, where the popular demand for it is so great. S. B. P.

PORTLAND, OREGON, January 22.

THE ADMINISTRATION AND THE FISHERIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will the Nation kindly state to what extent the United States, as represented by the present Administration, is to blame for the present fisheries imbroglio, and thus enlighten the rather confused state of mind of

A REGULAR SUBSCRIBER.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., January 26, 1887.

[The present fisheries imbroglio results from the termination of the fisheries clauses of the Treaty of Washington, in pursuance of notice given by the United States before the present Administration came into office.—ED. NATION.]

A SLIP OF THE PEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am informed that the latest number of the Nation refers to the magazine recently published in the interests of the Agassiz Association, and for all lovers of nature and science, as the "Red Cross." In consequence, we are receiving inquiries for the Red Cross Magazine. Will you not kindly state that the name of the new magazine is the Swiss Cross? The name is taken from the badge of the Agassiz Association, which in turn was adopted in honor of Louis Agassiz. The "Red Cross" Society is illustrious in another field, and renders aid to the suffering in war and peace. HARLAN H. BALLARD.

50 SOUTH STREET, PITTSFIELD, MASS., January 28, 1887.

A CORRECTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Permit me to correct the two inaccuracies which occur in your mention of 'The Photographic Times Annual' on page 77 of the Nation for January 27. Your reviewer there states: "The editor of the Photographic Times of this city has compiled from it an 'American Annual of Photography and Photographic Times Almanac' for 1887."

Allow me to say that the articles of which this Annual is composed are original contributions, written expressly for its pages, and that the book was edited by Mr. C. W. Canfield of this city, and not by me.—Respectfully yours, W. I. LINCOLN ADAMS.

No. 423 BROOME STREET, NEW YORK, January 29, 1887.

[We were led into our wrong inference by the opening sentences of one of the special contributions, and by the general aspect of the smaller pieces which make the "filling" of the Annual.—ED. NATION.]

THE LATE GENERAL STONE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of January 27 you say of the late Gen. Charles P. Stone: "After the fight at Ball's Bluff he was court-martialled, and was imprisoned for nearly a year in Fort Lafayette. He asserted that he was treated very unfairly."

The unfairness and injustice of his treatment consisted not in imprisonment after trial, as these words seem to imply, but in the fact that he was arrested, left without definite charges, refused the court-martial which the laws allowed and which he again and again demanded; and that, when released without any opportunity to clear himself in the eyes of the world, neither he nor any of his friends could find the slightest evidence why the authorities had suffered a loyal soldier to be subjected to prolonged imprisonment, without trial or opportunity of defence against those popular attacks in the press to which his sudden arrest necessarily gave birth.

That this is an accurate account of the way in which Gen. Stone was "unfairly treated," any history of the war written since its close will bear evidence.—Very sincerely yours,

EDWARD M. PARKER.

CONCORD, N. H.

Notes.

R. WORTHINGTON Co. have issued the third and concluding part of the 'Greville Memoirs,' 1852-1860, in two volumes. The same work is announced to be published in a single volume by D. Appleton & Co., along with 'Brazil, its Condition and Prospects,' by Gen. C. C. Andrews, formerly Consul-General in that country, and 'Miss Churchill: a Study,' by Christian Reid.

Macmillan & Co.'s spring announcements include 'Romantic Love and Personal Beauty: their Development, Causal Relations, Historic and National Peculiarities,' by Henry T. Finck; 'The Song of the Nibelung,' translated into English verse by Alfred E. Foster-Barham; 'The Life of Peter De Wint,' by J. Comyns Carr, illustrated with twenty photogravures; an illustrated edition of Mahaffy's 'Rambles and Studies in Greece'; 'Memoir of Sir Peter Scratchley, High Commissioner of New Guinea,' by C. Kinloch Cooke; 'Life of James Fraser, Bishop of Manchester,' by Thomas Hughes; and 'Letters between Carlyle and Goethe,' edited by Charles Eliot Norton.

J. B. Lippincott Co. have in press 'Ornamental Interiors, Ancient and Modern,' by J Moyr Smith; 'Half Hours with American History,' selections by Charles Morris, in two volumes; 'The Nursing and Care of the Nervous and the Insane,' by Chas. K. Mills, M.D.; and 'Manual of North American Birds, for the Naturalist and Sportsman,' by Robert Ridgway.

Charles Scribner's Sons will take over the entire list of Hebrew and Semitic text-books heretofore published by the American Publication Society of Hebrew, Chicago, including the Hebrew grammars of Prof. Wm. R. Harper. They announce two novels as in press, 'A Child of the Century,' by John T. Wheelwright; and 'The Jesuit's Ring,' a romance of Mt. Desert, by A. A. Hayes.

From Modern Language Notes for February we learn that Prof. T. W. Hunt of Princeton has prepared a treatise on 'English Prose and Prose Writers,' now in the press of A. C. Armstrong & Son. It is intended as an aid to the higher instruction in our prose development.

Funk & Wagnalls will shortly take in hand a popular history of the State of New York just completed by Benson J. Lossing.

'A Half Century in Salem,' reminiscences by Mrs. Nathaniel Silsbee, is announced by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

We are glad to have the assurance of the Publishers' Weekly that the Annual Catalogue projected for the benefit of the trade will be supported, and that its manufacture is already begun.

G. P. Putnam's Sons are about to publish 'The Conflict of East and West in Egypt,' by Dr. John Eliot Bowen of the Independent. The articles that compose it appeared in the Political Science Quarterly.

It is a pleasure to receive from the office of the Geological Survey of New Jersey three more sheets of the great Atlas of that State, leaving but four of the total seventeen to be issued. These we may expect in the course of the next year. Sheets 8, 11, and 12 are all of sections bordering on the Delaware River. The first shows the line from Trenton to Bordentown, and the district to the north and east, embracing New Brunswick and the greater part of the course of the Raritan River. The third continues on from Bordentown to Burlington, including the territory to the south and east (the Mount Holly section). The second includes Burlington, Camden, and Philadelphia, with the back country traversed by the great railway routes to Atlantic City and Cape May. The execution of these maps is in all respects on a level with the high standard of their predecessors.

Prof. G. Stanley Hall of the Johns Hopkins University puts forth a prospectus of a quarterly American Journal of Psychology, to be edited by himself. It will contain original contributions of a scientific character; papers from other journals, translated if necessary; digests and reviews of significant books, good and bad. Its main object "will be to record the progress of scientific psychology, and special prominence will be given to methods of research." Remittances and business communications should be addressed to N. Murray, at the University, Baltimore.

The analytical index to the second volume of 54.

* It was the number for January 20, 1887.

the New Princeton Review (A. C. Armstrong & Son) is an improvement upon the first, chiefly in the way of multiplying entries of the same topics. Thus, Mormonism is entered in its own proper alphabetical order, under "Origin of a Great Delusion" (its article title), under Public Questions, and under Religion and Morality. This would seem to be enough for the ordinary inquirer, and yet History should not in consistency have been deprived of this topic. The table of contents now plays a very insignificant part—hardly more than that of showing at a glance the authors of the signed articles—and is unduly neglected. Under Criticisms, Notes, and Reviews, for example, it would be easy to display far better than is done in the index the titles of books reviewed.

The second paper in the Law Quarterly Review for January is an article by J. H. G. Bergne, entitled 'The International Copyright Union.' Mr. Bergne, who is Superintendent of the Treaty Department of the Foreign Office, was sent as the second delegate to the Berne conference of 1885, and was, together with Sir Francis O. Adams, authorized to sign, on behalf of Great Britain and her colonies, the literary-property treaty entered into at Berne in September last. He first notices, from an Englishman's standpoint, the various attempts to secure some sort of copyright arrangement between England and this country, but nothing which is new to American readers is presented. A mistake is made in charging that Mr. Dorsheimer's bill (presented to the House of Representatives, January 8, 1884) retained the "objectionable feature of compulsory manufacture in the United States." The bill contained no such provision, being simply a reciprocity measure, stipulating only that the foreign author should, for the sake of securing his copyright, do what the domestic law demands of an American citizen, namely, record his claim of copyright, and deposit two copies of his work. The remainder of Mr. Bergne's article, which reviews English legislation concerning international copyright, is valuable. His experience as a delegate to the Berne conferences enables him to explain the (by no means plainly stated) provisions of the international copyright act recently passed by the English Parliament; and he does so at considerable length.

There are no articles in the January Antiquary (New York: D. G. Francis) of very conspicuous merit, but several of considerable interest, especially, we should say, Mr. Bickley's "Remains of Old Woking," the continuation of former papers. There is perhaps nothing in the number more generally interesting than the short paragraph, "The Way Stonehenge was Built," containing an extract from the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, showing how huge monoliths are conveyed by the Nagá Hill people. They "are dragged up in a kind of sledge, formed out of a forked tree, in which the stone is lowered, and then carefully lashed with canes and creepers, and to this the men, sometimes to the number of several hundreds, attach themselves in a long line, and, by means of putting rollers underneath, they pull it along until it has been brought up to the spot where it has been decided to erect it. Here a small hole is then dug to receive the lower end of the stone, and, the sledge being tilted up on end, the lashings are cut adrift, and the stone slides into position."

The Magazine of American History makes an excellent beginning of its new volume, the seventeenth. The articles in the numbers for January and February that possess a solid worth are numerous. Mr. S. G. W. Benjamin has two papers, entitled "A Group of Pre-Revolutionary Editors: Beginnings of Journalism in America," and "Notable Editors between 1776 and 1800." Without vouching for their accuracy at all points, we can recommend them as entertaining, and as being profusely illustrated with facsimiles of early newspapers and portraits of editors, many very rare. We notice, by the way, in the Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette of January 29, a communication alleging that a portrait of Maj. Ebenezer Denny is made to do duty, in Mr. Benjamin's second paper, for Joseph Dennie, editor of the United States Gazette. And when Mr. Benjamin tells of "Master Carter," in Boston, saying to his pupils, "Boys, the war's begun, and you may run!" is he not thinking of Master John Lovell, of the Public Latin School, whose formula of dismissal was—"War's begun and school's done"? From Ottawa, Mr. J. L. Payne sends a contribution of much value, based on the Dominion archives, which shows that before the close of the Revolution the leading Vermonters, including Ethan Allen and his brother, were playing a risky game of bluff with Congress, by intrigues looking to a union with Canada if Vermont's claim to be an independent State should be finally rejected, in the interest of New York. The evidence is new and evidently trustworthy, and curious enough.

Some sensible observations on the teaching of Latin, by Principal Peck of the Providence High School, will be found in the Syracuse Academy for January. An extra number of this useful periodical, bearing the same date, contains a translation of the last chapter of Prof. Friedrich Paulsen's 'History of the Higher Education at the German Schools and Universities,' by Mr. Samuel Thurber.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine for January contains an interesting paper by Sir Charles Warren on the present condition of Palestine. Though not very hopeful in tone, it asserts that the influx of Europeans is altering the country for the better. There are "places where cultivation has been fostered by societies, and where the whole climate has altered." The plains are in great danger from the vast billows of sand which are gradually rolling inwards from the sea-shore. In the north they are thirty to forty feet high, while in the south "they have reached the height of several hundred feet, and have quite covered up the old Land of Goshen." The peasantry he regards, principally from a survival of the ancient names and the remnant of idolatrous worship, as direct descendants of the original inhabitants who were spared by the Hebrews after their conquest. The number of Jews is slowly but steadily increasing, though the greater part of those who return "only go there to die, when at an advanced age." They are divided into two great sects, the Ashkenasim, who come from Germany, Russia, and Poland, and the Sepherdim, who come from Morocco. These are exiles from Spain, speak the Spanish language, and are agriculturists. They also assert that "they were colonists in Spain at the time of the Crucifixion, and are in no way responsible for the rejection of the Messiah," and some of them at least believe that "the second advent of the Christians will be the coming of the Messiah to the Jews." A paper on the "Clyde Sea-area" is accompanied by a bathy-orographical chart, so colored as to show very clearly the depth of the sea and the height of the adjacent land.

The new volume of the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society begins with a paper by Mr. Hugh H. Romilly on the "Islands of the New Britain Group." The physical characteristics of the islands are described, as well as the extraordinary currents in the neighboring waters which render navigation extremely difficult. There are several volcanoes, one of which is still partially active, and "at its base the sea-water is so hot for several hundred yards from it that it is impossible to hold the hand in it," while at a little distance there "is a boiling river of strong sulphurous water." The islands are very fertile, and the natives show great skill in cultivation, but are obliged to choose as sites for their gardens almost inaccessible places, such as fissures in rocks on the sides of steep precipices, from fear of their neighbors. It is very difficult to get from the people information in regard to themselves, as they not only dislike to be questioned, but "there are some customs they are absolutely forbidden to talk of, and some words they dare not name." Some account is given of their peculiar marriage laws, and of the strange ceremony of the duk-duk, which Mr. Romilly was fortunate enough to witness. Cannibalism, though he had no personal knowledge of it, he believed to be commonly practised. On this point his opinion was confirmed, in the discussion which followed the reading of the paper, by the Rev. Geo. Brown, for many years a missionary in the islands, as well as upon the singular relations of a man to his mother-in-law. Referring to the statement that she was to be avoided in every possible way, he said "that the most solemn oath a man could take was, 'Sir, if I am not telling the truth, I hope I may shake hands with (or touch the hand of) my mother-in-law.'"

The Studio (New York) begins the year with an interesting table of contents, and furnishes two illustrations in the line of its cautious but promising experiments with "process" reproduction. The editor is able to announce that M. Rajon, the eminent French etcher, now in this country, is engaged upon a plate after a drawing made by himself expressly for the Studio. This number, by the way, contains some very useful practical remarks by M. Rajon on the subject of his art. The March Studio is to contain an etching made for it by Mr. Sidney L. Smith, after a pastel portrait of John Quincy Adams, made at the Hague in 1783, when Adams was in his teens. Of this series we notice that the Studio furnishes prints in three forms—ordinary, large-paper, and numbered proofs on India paper.

Thackeray's 'Virginians,' in two volumes, and 'Philip,' in two more, extend the red-backed handy or pocket edition of this writer's works, now publishing in London by Smith, Elder & Co., and in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott Co. Owing to the identity of some of the characters in both stories, 'A Shabby Genteel Story'—an unfinished beginning of a novel—is here prefixed to 'Philip.'

The same American house sends us the first six volumes of the Waverley novels issued by them in conjunction with the Messrs. Black of Edinburgh—a library edition—octavo volumes in dark-blue stamped cloth, with typography in greatest possible contrast to the small letter that distinguishes (and depreciates) the Thackeray just mentioned. Here all is bold, open, handsome, a delight to the eye. There are but two illustrations to each volume—a frontispiece and a title-page vignette—engraved on steel, and executed for the edition of 1876; the only thing not new in the appearance of this issue. The six volumes before us comprise 'Waverley,' 'Guy Mannering,' 'The Antiquary,' 'Rob Roy,' 'Old Mortality,' and 'The Black Dwarf, and Legend of Montrose.' The price per volume is very moderate.

The February Century announces the hope—perhaps we should say the prospect—that the friends of the American School at Athens will secure as permanent director Dr. Charles Waldstein of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, England, a native of New York, as is well known. To this end strenuous efforts are being made to raise a permanent fund of $100,000 to $200,000, and contributions are earnestly solicited. They may be forwarded to Mr. Frederic J. de Peyster, No. 7 East Forty-second Street, or to Messrs.

William Alexander Smith & Co., No. 58 Wall Street, New York.

Dr. Sterrett, whom some would like to see made the Director of the School, is pleasantly thanked, as if already such, for scholarly courtesy, by Mommsen in Part I. of the fifth edition of the 'Fontes Iuris Romani Antiqui,' by Bruns. In a foot-note on p. 150 he says: "Tymandenorum oppidum (hodie Yaztü Veran) in Pisidia situm est tribus horis orientem versus ab Apollonia. Ibi qui titulum repperit praefectus instituto Atheniensi Americanorum Sterrett dedit nobis, et ut hoc loco prodiret liberaliter permisit." The italics are ours.

The "Nouvelle Bibliothèque Classique" of the Librairie des Bibliophiles (Paris: Rue Saint-Honoré, 338) now numbers about 50 12mo volumes. It is beautifully printed on excellent paper and is sold at three francs a volume. One of the latest announcements is "Œuvres choisies de Voltaire," which ought to fill at least twelve volumes. The last publication, 'Les Essais de Montaigne,' edited by MM. Motheau and Jouaust, deserves special attention. The text followed, as in the large 8vo edition by the same editors, is that of 1588, the last printed in the author's lifetime; but the great advantage of the present work is that it presents on the same page not only this important text, but also all the additions and new readings of the edition of 1595, the one commonly received and reprinted. Thus for the first time the student of Montaigne can conveniently make a study of the thought and language of this author as modified by him in the manuscript notes which were used by Mlle. de Gournay, his daughter by adoption, when she prepared her text of 1595. The present edition of the essays will be in seven volumes, of which two have already been published. There will be a glossary and an index in the last.

M. Charles Barthélemy's 'Les Quarante Fauteuils de l'Académie Française' (Paris: Gautier; Boston: Schoenhof) may be useful to those who wish to know the sequence of the Academicians from 1634 down to the present time. According to a fiction of speech, every new member is said to occupy the fauteuil of his predecessor, so that an uninterrupted succession is established from Victor Hugo, for instance, back to Corneille and Maynard. The succession, however, is not fully agreed upon, for there was a break in the continuity of the French Academy at the time of the Revolution, which gives rise to some confusion. M. Barthélemy ignores this, or rather seems not to know it clearly. Without going far, if he had carefully read the article on the Academy written by Sainte-Beuve for the 'Paris Guide' in 1867, he might have given more trustworthy information. His biographical sketches are very meagre, though for many of the "Immortals" who have no other merit than their academic title, they are long enough.

—The February Atlantic is distinguished by Mr. Lowell's long poem in those terse couplets, of the Hudibras style, which lend themselves so readily to satirical wit, and are quite as capable of pathos. There is plenty of the first in this review of the new 'doxies of the age, and there is also a touch of the last in the poet's retrospective attachment to the bass-viols and congregational singing of the old régime. Whittier also contributes some lines, and William Winter represents the poets of middle age with a good many well-turned stanzas; and the predominant tone of belles-lettres that is the characteristic of this magazine is sustained, besides, by a very interesting sketch of the first literary work of Cooper, with some glimpses of his naval and gardening tastes, by Susan Fenimore Cooper. The solid article is by John Fiske, who has come, in his series of American history papers, to the Federal Convention, and analyzes the situation at the start, and the compromises by means of which the delegates established a working basis in the earlier stages of their proceedings. In supporting the plans and the rule of the Federalists in 1789, Mr. Fiske takes occasion to suggest a parallel between the needs of the country then and in 1861, and he remarks that, as it was well for the Jeffersonian policy to succeed that first period of centralization, so "now that, in our own day, the disruptive forces have been even more thoroughly and effectually overcome, it is time for the principles of that party to be re-asserted with fresh emphasis." "An Experience in the Island of Capri" is an incident of the strange trouble that sometimes arises in foreign travel, and contains an instance of rare and touching humanity. We notice that Mr. Crawford's Russian story does not touch Russian soil as yet, but goes on in Constantinople and Germany; and as it is about to be transferred to Persia, so far, at least, it is not yet open to the recent criticism on it of dealing with places and people with which the author has had no means of direct acquaintance.

—Harper's comes to us with more than its usual profusion of illustrations, the more prominent being Abbey's and Parsons's designs for Cowley's sentimental poem, "The Wish," Frank Millet's sketches of winter-campaign scenes with the Cossacks, the beautiful views of the Acadian land, and some cuts of moose-hunting. The most attractive contribution is from Mr. Warner's veteran hand, in description of the lagoons for which the Acadians exchanged their short summers and long winters, and where they seem to have continued their patriarchal life in a climate much more fitted to their nature, without any substantial change in their simple character. His account is full of enticement for the unwary tourist, with its atmosphere of a Louisiana April and its landscape of a prairie Venice, while the great salt mine on the singular high island, and the home of Jefferson the actor, give variety to the interest. Sir Edward J. Reed concludes his account of the navies of the Continent in a tone of advice which seems directed to the English, to the effect that their navy should be superior in every calculable point to those of other nations. He shows little faith in the heavily-armed and inadequately protected ships in which Italy, for example, has especially strengthened her navy (though he allows that they were a good "reply" to her antagonists), inasmuch as, unless the fight is short, such vessels will probably sustain such injury as to lose their power of speed, and will then very likely turn bottom up. At the same time he warns the United States against expending her efforts on fast cruisers, which may prey upon commerce, but are of no use to fight with against modern ships of war. Mr. Millet's paper contains several interesting episodes and one scene of brutal flogging. Mr. Howells begins a new novel, which opens at Harvard on class-day.

—In Scribner's, Mr. Washburne's Paris reminiscences and the extracts from Gouverneur Morris's diary continue to hold the first place of interest. The story of the siege is told in the former paper principally by means of extracts from Mr. Washburne's diary. The scenes are very vivid, and in particular the changing look of the streets, the gathering and rapid melting away of the revolutionary mobs, and the general orderliness of the city, are admirably sketched, while the entrance of the Prussians is as well described, with a few strokes, as could be wished. The personal anecdotes are comparatively few, and it is rather on the general traits of the siege inside the walls than on special incidents that the writer's eye was fixed. The Gouverneur Morris papers yield in this instalment a more defined picture of the aristocratic society of the first Revolution, and also of the diarist himself, whose sagacity, brilliancy, and perfect possession of himself and his faculties grow more marked; he was a thoroughly facile man. The leading article in point of illustration is a most interesting one by Mr. John C. Ropes, who has made a study of Cæsar's busts and statues, and has reproduced the authentic likenesses and some others from photographs, many of which he had made himself; the order is chronological, and the series, which is slightly and modestly annotated by the collector, is a very impressive one, by virtue of the character the likenesses show and the strong and rapid development of the face in twenty or twenty-five years. "J. S. of Dale" begins a novelette, Mr. Brander Matthews contributes a timely sketch of Coquelin, and Prof. J. R. Soley deals with the whole question of our naval efficiency both in a critical and a constructive spirit. It is to be noted that he protests strongly against promotion by seniority, as one radical evil in the service. In 1861, he says, it gave us seventy-five captains, who, "with perhaps four exceptions, were totally unfit for service."

—The most interesting article in the Quarterly Journal of Economics for January is F. W. Taussig's history of the Southwestern strike of 1886, which, though a vivid account of this attempt on the part of organized labor, led by some of its worst advisers, to overawe a powerful corporation, might have taken a livelier coloring if Mr. Hoxie's merits in respect of vigor and resistance had been emphasized; if sharper criticism, too, had been directed against the Knights for their lawless actions in destroying life no less than property. The various points in the struggle, however, between the stationary employees of the Missouri Pacific Road, to whom the strike appears to have been confined, apart from the employees engaged in running the trains, are well brought out, and strengthened by racy quotations from the opinions of the strikers. The article is supplemented by Carroll D. Wright's "Historical Sketch of the Knights of Labor," which treats of the constitution of the order, without expression of criticism, favorable or unfavorable. The Knights are a body that concern us practically by their deeds, more than by their written constitution; but it is useful to have their inside history in language that their leaders approve, as is the case with this contribution. Their general constitution seems still to need formulating in some essential points, as it leaves the declaration of strikes to the local and district assemblies; but in the Missouri strike it is interesting to see the general officers, towards the last, throwing all the weight of the order in favor of the striking district assembly in Missouri. A. B. Hart's "The Disposition of our Public Lands" is a timely article, and will make a good text for collateral reading. The Journal also gives a criticism of Marshall's theory of value and distribution, by J. L. Laughlin; some objections to profit-sharing, by Richard Aldrich; and the French text of the progressive property tax of the Canton de Vaud, adopted in 1886.

—The Bibliothèque Universelle, commonly designated by its sub-title, Revue Suisse, is one of the oldest periodicals. It is published at Lausanne, and has now entered upon its ninety-second year, if we consider it, as we should, the continuation of the Bibliothèque Britannique, founded in 1795. It is interesting to go back to the beginning of the journal, in which science occupied a large place. In the first volume we find articles upon the then recent works, Arthur Young's 'Six Months' Tour,' Anne Radcliffe's 'Journey' and 'Mysteries of Udolpho.' After a few years the new review broadened its scope, and in 1816 it became the Bibliothèque Universelle. A new series was begun in 1836, but it was only in 1858 that the Bibliothèque de Genève, as it was then commonly called, was transferred to Lausanne, and took the form and dimensions it now has. Since then it has not ceased to hold a high place in periodical literature. Protestant in its general tone, it is not at all sectarian. It does much more than represent the intellectual life of French Switzerland. Such writers as Marc-Monnier and Eugène Rambert, and in previous days Vinet and Töpffer, are not mere local celebrities. They, and many other contributors of the Revue Suisse, can be placed in the first ranks of French writers. Under the able direction of M. Ed. Tallichet, since 1866 the Bibliothèque Universelle has become more than ever an excellent organ of general information for readers of French. Like other good periodicals in the same language, it presents a great variety of articles on current questions of general interest—history, political economy, travels, literature, etc. It publishes also continuous novels of high merit. One point that specially marks these is, that they can be placed in the hands of any one, as their moral tone is of the highest and purest character. Another feature of the Revue is the space devoted to the chroniques—that is, letters from Paris, England, Germany, Russia, etc., giving literary and other news of interest. In this respect it is, perhaps, the best periodical published in any language, and well justifies its title to the epithet of universelle. It is published monthly, as is also the Archives des Sciences, which may be considered its scientific supplement (Lausanne: Georges Bridel; New York: Christern; Boston: Schoenhof).

—The January number of the new volume of the Bibliothèque Universelle opens with an article on the "Vanderbilts and their Fortune." There is also a new serial story in the form of an autobiography signed Wladimir Korolenko. The director devotes twenty-four very interesting pages to his personal recollections of Eugène Rambert, who for nearly twenty years, until shortly before his recent death, was one of the most valuable literary contributors to the Revue. There are also the usual chroniques, all full of varied information; but the English correspondent is unjust to the editor of the 'Early Letters of Thomas Carlyle.' From all he says, the reader would infer that Prof. Norton had for the first time opened the packet of letters marked "to be burned," whereas some of the letters had already been printed by Mr. Froude. The short notice of the work which appeared in the Paris Temps of January 6 is in every way fairer and more intelligent. The same correspondent speaks of the American School at Athens with little knowledge. He says, among other things, speaking of the "munificence of the subscribers": "L'écueil n'est donc rien moins que le manque de fonds." Would that this were true! But it is seldom that the English correspondent deals with matters not English, and the Chronique anglaise is generally very good and reliable.

—To the Goethe student the past year was with two-fold reason an anniversary year. In 1786 Goethe entered upon his Italian journey, which marks such an epoch in his career; in the same year the publication of the first edition of his collected works was begun. This anniversary the Goethe Gesellschaft has celebrated by the publication of a handsome volume entitled 'Tagebücher und Briefe Goethes aus Italien an Frau v. Stein und Herder,' edited, with introduction and notes, by Prof. Erich Schmidt, and by the announcement of the coming definitive edition of Goethe's complete works. The volume of 'Diaries and Letters,' compiled from material discovered in the Goethe archives, furnishes us a part of the sources used by the poet in the composition of his 'Italienische Reise,' the three volumes of which appeared respectively in 1816, 1817, and 1829—a part only, for we know that the material for the second and third volumes was destroyed when the work was completed; but a comparison of these sources with the first volume, for which they formed the groundwork, throws many an instructive side-light on Goethe's mode of composition and upon this period of his life, both in the matter of his own development and of his relations to his friends. The myth of the existence of Frau v. Stein's letters to Goethe must collapse—so far at least as the present period is concerned—before Goethe's own statement of February 17, 1787: "Deine Briefe werden alle gleich gebrannt, wie wohl ungern. Doch dein Wille geschehe." The theory, too, which has been advanced by some critics, that Goethe's sudden departure for Italy was the result of a conscious determination on his part to break off his intimacy with Frau v. Stein, is no longer tenable, when we have such utterances as those of December 23, 1786, before us. Goethe is not seeking an estrangement; he fears even the possibility of one.

—In composing from his correspondence an account of these years of his life, Goethe has both added and omitted. Scenes merely outlined in his letters and left for oral communication are elaborated in his published work. The personal element, so largely eliminated in the latter, lends fresh interest to the former. On the road to Trent, he tells us in the 'Italienische Reise,' a poor woman appealed to him to take her child up into the carriage with him, because the hot pavement was scorching its feet. He did so, "but," he adds, "I could get nothing out of the child in any language." The version in his diary will probably accord with many a modern traveller's experience: "I spoke to it in Italian, but it replied that it did not understand German."

WILLIAM HENRY CHANNING.

Memoir of William Henry Channing. By Octavius Brooks Frothingham. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1886.

THERE are several ways of writing good biography. Of late the taste has been for self-effacement on the part of the biographer—the less of him the better; he should content himself with making such extracts from the letters and journals of his subject as will make his book as nearly autobiographic as may be. But this method has not always been the rage. When William Henry Channing's memoir of his uncle, Dr. Channing, appeared in 1848, the London Spectator critic objected to its method, which was distinctly that of self-effacement. He said: "The life, or even the mind, of a man is not properly exhibited by quotations from his writings, but by deductions from them. A biographer who acts in this way calls upon the reader to do his business." But Mr. Garrison, reviewing the book in the Liberator, said, "Nothing can be more admirable than the manner in which the author has discharged his sacred trust," though he went on to call the book "a life-like delineation of the inner and outward life of Channing as sketched by his own hand." The critics of to-day would generally side with Mr. Garrison. But, in truth, while there are excellent biographies written, as Dr. Channing's was, with zealous self-suppression, and others, such as Carlyle's 'Life of Sterling,' where the commentary is of vastly more importance than the text, there are still others in which comment free and full is united with copious selections from the subject's journals and correspondence and more deliberate intellectual expression. Mr. Frothingham's 'Memoir of William Henry Channing' is one of these. As such, it is much more satisfactory than any volume of mere selections could have been, made never so judiciously. But we could ill spare the selections that are here. They are copious, absolutely, and relatively to the editorial commentary that is made on them and the accompanying narrative which connects them together and which they confirm and illustrate. Little has been chosen that does not bring out the character or explain the fortunes of the man. The part which Mr. Frothingham has added is an immense addition to the interest and value of the book. His style was never happier than it is here. It is generally so full of energy and grace and charm that it seems as if he must have slept and dreamed an evil dream when he compared Channing to "a kite fastened by a cord to human heart-strings and drawing men upwards towards the empyrean." This is suggested as an improvement on Theodore Parker's saying that Channing hit the same nail every time, but never drove it in because the head was down. Mr. Frothingham's may be the truer thought, but certainly his simile is vile. It is so solitary that it startles us like thunder booming from an azure sky.

The matter of his narrative and comment is equally deserving with their manner of the warmest praise. He always keeps his footing. He is never swept away by the impetuous torrent of Channing's idealistic and enthusiastic temper. He is always critical, but he is always kind. The union of the frankest criticism with the liveliest sympathy is something rare, and it is very beautiful. Mr. Frothingham's difference from Channing intellectually and morally is very great. The latter was possessed; the former is self-possessed. The latter was always enthusiastic; the former, never. But it may be doubted whether if Channing could have had a "double" for his biographer, the impression of his excellence would have been so strong as it is now. It is true that now and then Mr. Frothingham cannot resist a smile at moments when Mr. Channing's levitation is the most remarkable. It is true that here and there he allows himself a shade of irony where the contrast of Channing's boundless hopes with his slender means and pitiful results is most apparent. But the smile is always kind and the irony is always touched with sorrow and regret. Mr. Frothingham's arrangement of his material is wholly admirable. After a series of chapters that detail the circumstances of Channing's childhood, youth, and education, the vicissitudes of his maturity, his wanderings to and fro, he has four concluding chapters on "The American," "The Preacher," "The Man of Letters," and "The Person," which summarize and criticise in a comprehensive and effective manner the leading characteristics of the man.

The value of William Henry Channing for the present generation is not isolated and intrinsic. It is representative. The title of Mr. Frothingham's opening chapter gives the proper point of view: "The Age and its Child." Channing was the child of his age, and, being so, he had his mother's features and her voice. It may be doubted whether any other person of the half century from 1830 to 1880 included in himself so many of the characteristic elements of that period of generous hopes, grave disappointments, vague aspirations, and concrete necessities of politics and war. Transcendentalism, socialism, anti-slavery—to each he abandoned himself simultaneously with an ardor and a passion not exceeded by the leaders on these several lines; nay, far exceeding Emerson's and Ripley's, and not less than Garrison's, though seeking channels wastefully apart from his or any great or central stream. It was, perhaps, because Channing was so much that he was never more. But it is likelier that it was because, on whatever road he travelled, he always "hitched his wagon to a star," with the result that generally follows from such glorious harnessing—frequent upsetting and sometimes a general smash. A profound and passionate idealist, he was not "rich in saving common sense"; he did not appreciate the economy of secondary causes, the necessity of adapting means to ends. Nevertheless, the wonder grows, as we proceed with the story of his checkered and eventful life, that with so much of genuine power, with such rare and priceless gifts of mind and speech, his accomplishment was not more considerable. Of culture and intelligence, of energy and enthusiasm, there was enough in him to set up a dozen men of large success. His gift of speech was something wonderful. Let him and Phillips speak together and he made the more profound impression—the more profound, but the less definite. He carried you away, but you did not carry much away from him. With all his parts, the elements so mixed in him that he never was to any great extent a leader of men's thought or action. There is something pitiful in the instability and vagrancy of his career. In active life for more than fifty years after his graduation from the Cambridge Divinity School, he was a settled minister for less than half the time, and this in eight or nine different places, including Cincinnati, Rochester, Boston, New York, Washington, Liverpool, and London. For the remainder of the time he was always busy and always planning new adventures. His success was often great, but the desire of Mr. Evarts's office-seeker "to be somewhere else" continually recurred. He had not "staying quality."

His most successful settlement was in Washington during the civil war. There for once there was complete adjustment between the man and his environment. As minister of the Unitarian Church, converting its building into a hospital, as a worker in the Sanitary Commission, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives, his heart was wholly in his work. Seldom has the Chaplaincy of the House been accepted in a spirit so little perfunctory, and maintained in a manner so exalted and inspired. Some of his settlements were of a unique and striking character, little in harmony with the average Unitarian tradition. In Boston, New York, and Brooklyn they involved a free platform, with the usual consequence of garrulous cranks and silent sages. In Boston the church was a "Religious Union of Associationists," with an extremely novel ceremonial: "hands all around," a communion table set with bread, fruits, and a pitcher of water; all this, and the Gospel preached—a mixture of Fourier and Swedenborg, with a strong infusion of Channing's individual thought and feeling. There was always this. He could never be a retail dealer of any system of politics or religion or social reformation. This proof of personal strength was oftentimes a hindrance to his apparent usefulness. He could not go "with the multitude that kept holy day." He was obliged to go alone. In theology he was neither with the old-school Unitarians nor with the new. Greatly admiring Parker, he objected to his theology that his God was merely immanent and not influent. Greatly interested in Fourier and largely influential in converting Brook Farm from its original to a more Fourieristic form, he must add many things to Fourier and leave many out. Always an eager anti-slavery reformer, his scheme of emancipation was the impossible one of coöperation of the North and South in the work of manumission. Mr. Frothingham relates an interesting story of his impassioned advocacy of this darling scheme upon the platform of the Anti-Slavery Society.

Religious socialism was the dream that unified the variety and vagrancy of his experience. Wherever he might be, whatever his ecclesiastical standing, whatever the political situation, this dream was always cherished in his glowing heart. There is something exceedingly pathetic in his hoping against hope for its fulfilment; in his elastic rebound from the most cruel disappointments; in his readiness to hail some sign of its embodiment in this, that, or the other fresh development of the political or social situation. But there were few who were prepared to enter into his ideas. What he cared for most was what others, associated with him, generally cared for least—the sense of Universal Brotherhood; the Fatherhood of God and the fraternal Headship of Jesus being essentially concomitant. With the later developments of Socialism he must have found himself in little sympathy, actuated as they generally were, and are, by a more narrow and exclusive selfishness than the competition of the order they arraign. Channing's sense of human brotherhood was not a merely intellectual matter. His sympathies were exceedingly expansive. He was always seeking for points of agreement rather than points of difference. He took men and systems at their best. His friend James Freeman Clarke found in the other religions of the world so many fragments which all found in Christianity space for mutual adjustment and to spare. So did not he. He found in each and every one of them all of the germs of Christianity in process of development. He was bound to find this order and relation by the sympathy which was inseparable from his personality. But he was not one of those who can sympathize with Brahmans and Buddhists and not with next-door neighbors differing much or little from themselves. All sects and differences of opinion found room to meet and fraternize in his inclusive sympathy.

Here was another limitation of his practical efficiency. His sympathy was interpreted as "a mush of concession." There were fears that he would become a Romanist, or an Episcopalian—reasonable fears: he so idealized the older churches; he so desired to be identified with some great communion. But his critical rationalism, his ability to idealize Unitarianism, and his loyalty to his great uncle's name and fame, were counterbalancing influences, so that he was always a Unitarian, though not without vicissitudes and crises of belief, and a long period in early life when the German critics had "taken away his Lord and he knew not where they had laid him."

Mr. Frothingham's closing chapters are made up of those deductions which the Spectator critic missed in the biography of Dr. Channing by his nephew, William Henry. That on "The American" draws out the evidence of Channing's devotion to American interests and ideas. Fifteen times he crossed the Atlantic, always more glad to come this way than to go the other. Only in America was he at home. Before the war he was in a fever of unrest in England, so anxious was he to be in America and take his part in the great struggle. When the war began, he was soon "weary with forbearing and he could not stay." His exaggerated conception of Garfield was but the sign of a political idealism that was always seeking expression. Emerson's praise of him—"the evil time's sole patriot"—was an example of that "superlative" in which the poet occasionally indulged himself while objecting to it upon principle. The truth it overstated was that Channing was a patriot in every fibre of his brain and heart. Mr. Frothingham's chapter on "The Preacher" is both warm and just. Channing's preaching was so generally extemporaneous that the record of it is exceedingly imperfect. But if we had every word in print, it would convey no adequate idea of the effect produced, for it would not give the exaltation of his manner, his rapt and radiant air, the peculiar and impressive qualities of his rich and varied tones. Then, too, the hearer felt the man behind the words, was sure a man was there, and that he meant exactly what he said. After a chapter on his literary work—of which his memoir of his uncle Dr. Channing, his part of Margaret Fuller's memoir, and a memoir of his cousin Perkins, an admirable man, minister-at-large in Cincinnati, were the main features—Mr. Frothingham concludes with a chapter on "The Person." And when we have read this chapter, agreeing as it does with all that goes before, we feel that, whatever failure there was here, there was much of success also. A life so pure and true, so earnest and unselfish, must have had a great and lasting influence upon many of the hundreds with whom it mingled in its course from youth to age. His noble purity is hinted in the wish of Emerson that he should "christen" his children, who were "purer," he had said, "than any minister he knew." His piety was a phenomenon to the most orthodox of his acquaintances. His mind was steeped in mystic literature, and he gave the earliest hours of every day to lonely musing with à Kempis, Tauler, and their spiritual kin. But his morality was as rigid as his piety was fervent. If this memoir could be widely read, it might shame hundreds of men and women into a more unselfish, earnest, and devoted life.

DEAN PLUMPTRE'S TRANSLATION OF THE DIVINE COMEDY.

The Commedia and Canzoniere of Dante Alighieri. A new Translation, with Notes, Essays, and a Biographical Introduction. By E. H. Plumptre, D.D., Dean of Wells. In two volumes. Vol. I. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887. 8vo, pp. cxxxi, 388.

THE attempt to make a translation of the 'Divine Comedy' in verse with the triple rhyme of the original, like that to square the circle, seems to possess a fascination for minds of a certain order. This is the fourth that has appeared in England in the course of the past five years. "I entered on the task," says Dean Plumptre, "in the hope that I should find the difficulty of reproducing the triple rhyme of the 'Commedia,' without unduly sacrificing faithfulness, not altogether insuperable." "Faithfulness" in this connection is a vague word. It may signify fidelity to the mere form of the poem, and to its literal meaning, or in a higher sense may imply the reproduction of its vital spirit and essential style. The Parthenon might be reproduced in granite with fidelity to its form, but the new structure would bear no resemblance in general effect to the marble building. So with these English versions of the 'Divine Comedy' in triple rhyme: the different nature of the language, the exigencies of the new material, present insuperable difficulties in the attempt at "fidelity"—make it, in a word, impossible to reproduce the quality and effect of Dante's poem. The concise, straightforward diction vanishes; the thought is no longer uttered by the inevitable word in the place ordained for it; the tone of the verse changing with each tone of feeling is lost; and the stroke of rhyme, for which so much is sacrificed, is no longer the pulse of life, but a mere mechanical beat. The voice of the poet comes back on the echo confused, hardly to be recognized.

We open Dean Plumptre's volume at random, and light on the following version of a passage which in the original is distinguished by nobility of style, simplicity and directness of diction, grave dignity of effect:

> "Meantime a voice I heard which sounded so:
> 'Give honor to the poet loftiest;
> His shade returns that left short while ago.'
> After the voice was silent and at rest,
> Four mighty shades I saw towards me move,
> With looks that showed as neither pained nor blest.

Then spake to me the Master whom I love:
'Look thou on him who walks with sword in hand,
Whose place before the three his rank doth prove.
See Homer, sovran poet of our band;
Horace comes next, for biting satire known;
Ovid the third, and Lucan last doth stand.
Because with me they all are so far one,
Sharing the name that one voice uttered clear,
They do me honor; well that deed is done.'"

It is with a sense of the vain effort and wasted ingenuity of the translator that one recalls the original:

"Intanto voce fu per me udita:
Onorate l'altissimo poeta!
L'ombra sua torna, ch'era dipartita.
Poichè la voce fu restata e queta,
Vidi quattro grand' ombre a noi venire:
Semblanza avevano nè trista nè lieta.
Lo buon Maestro cominciò a dire:
Mira colui con quella spada in mano,
Che vien dinanzi a tre, sì come sire.
Quegli è Omero poeta sovrano;
L'altro è Orazio satiro che viene;
Ovidio è il terzo, e l'ultimo è Lucano.
Perocchè ciascun meco si conviene
Nel nome, che sonò la voce sola,
Fannemi onore, e di ciò fanno bene."

Let us translate these verses literally: "Meanwhile a voice was heard by me, 'Honor the loftiest poet! his shade returns that had departed.' When the voice had ceased and was quiet, I saw four great shades coming to us; they had a semblance neither sad nor glad. The good master began to say: 'Look at him with that sword in hand, who comes before the three even as lord;' he is Homer, the sovran poet. The next who comes is Horace the satirist, Ovid is the third, and the last is Lucan. Since each with me is suited with the name that the solitary voice sounded, they do me honor, and in that do well."

Here the order of the words is scarcely changed, for the Italian verse is as direct as the English prose. The subtle interfusion of sound with sense, the effect of rhythm and rhyme in heightening the imaginative impression, are indeed gone from the translation, but in point of essential "fidelity" it comes nearer to the original than any translation can do in which the rhyme is made the rudder of the verse. In spite of the exactions of his rhyme, there is rarely a needless or forced word in Dante's lines, and seldom such an inversion of the natural order of the words as to interfere with the plainness of the diction and the easy flow of meaning. Directness, simplicity, and naturalness are the marked characteristics of Dante's literary style. These qualities give to it distinction and permanence of effect. As a work of literature the 'Divine Comedy' can no more become antiquated than the 'Iliad,' and for the same reason, that its style conforms, not to a transient taste or fashion, but to the nature of things. Even in the highest flights of the imagination, in the vision of divine mysteries, in the relation of supersensual experiences which no words can describe, the style remains direct, plain, natural.

It is a vain hope fully to transfer these qualities into a versified translation; and yet without them there can be no real "fidelity" to the original. In his 'Essay on Translating Homer,' Mr. Arnold selects as a specimen of "the grand style" these verses:

"Lascio lo fele, e vo pei dolci pomi
Promessi a me per lo verace Duca;
Ma fino al centro pria convien ch'io tomi."

"I leave the gall and I go for the apples of sweetness promised unto me by my faithful Guide; but far as the centre it behooves me first to fall." Dr. Plumptre gives these verses as follows, certainly falling in the last of them as far as the centre:

"I leave the gall and seek the pleasant fruit
Which my true Leader promiseth to me,
But first I must plunge down to earth's deep root."

Let us take another instance of the grand style:

"I'aveva già il mio viso nel suo fitto,
Ed ei s'ergea col petto e con la fronte
Come avesse lo inferno in gran dispitto."

"I had already fixed my gaze on his, and he lifted himself up with his breast and with his front as though he had hell in great contempt." Do the following verses render this?

"Already had I on him closely gazed,
And he with breast and neck before me rose
As though in scorn Hell was by him appraised."

But one example is as good as twenty. Dr. Plumptre has failed in an undertaking in which no one could succeed. The adventure will be doubtless tried by others; but it will not be tried by any who know the true nature of Dante's poem, or who justly reverence the loftiest poet.

Dean Plumptre's translation is accompanied by an elaborate life of Dante and by numerous notes to each canto of the poem. Both these portions of his work show diligence, wide reading, and an intelligent use of the leading authorities. The historical comment is generally correct and sufficient; and the notes on difficult and disputed passages and the explanation of the symbolism and allegory of the poem are, for the most part, sensible and moderate. But in both Life and Comment there is a tendency to suggest fanciful hypotheses in regard to matters concerning which nothing is known, that sometimes leads to very questionable conclusions. Thus, for instance, opening the volume again at random, we find on p. 104: "The date of his (Michael Scott's) death makes it possible that Dante may have met him." Roger Bacon's opinion "may have influenced Dante's judgment." "Possibly it had vexed the soul of the poet." On p. 105: "May we think of Marco Polo as taking the poet to see" the arsenal of Venice? On p. 106: this grotesqueness was "probably reproduced"; the condemnation "was perhaps emphasized." And so on very frequently. But to take an instance of somewhat more importance than these incidental possiblys and perhapses, and one to which Dr. Plumptre more than once recurs, we turn to the passage in the tenth canto of Hell, where Cavalcante Cavalcanti inquires of Dante concerning his son Guido, Dante's chief friend: "'If through this blind prison thou goest through loftiness of genius, my son, where is he? and why is he not with thee?' And I to him, 'By myself I do not come; he who waits yonder leads me through here; whom perchance your Guido held in disdain.'"

The words which Dante puts into the mouth of Cavalcante bear witness to the intimacy of the poet's friendship with Cavalcante's son, and to Dante's high estimate of Guido's genius. The words indicate that their union was such that where Dante is, Cavalcante had a right to expect to see his son, and that if Dante's genius was sufficient to lead him through the blind prison, that of Guido was not unequal to the same difficult task. We have no means for determining the precise significance of Dante's allusion to Guido's lack of regard for Virgil—whether the words are to be interpreted literally as implying that Guido's preference was for other poets, or whether Guido had failed to draw those loftier lessons from the ideal Virgil which served for the guidance of Dante through Hell. Taken in connection with the rest of the passage, they afford no indication that there had been a breach in the friendship of Dante and Guido.

Dr. Plumptre's note on the passage is as follows:

"The mention of Guido identifies the spectre with Cavalcante Cavalcanti, the father of Guido, one of the poet's earliest and dearest associates, the 'first of his friends,' a poet like himself, noble, brave, thoughtful, and refined. The two had been as David and Jonathan. Guido's father wonders at seeing Dante without him. And now the one speaks of the other after his death (Guido died in the autumn of 1300, after the assumed date of the vision, but before any of it was written) in a tone of coldness, and places his father in Hell as an unbeliever. What had caused the breach? If it is impossible to construct a complete apologia, we may at least trace the workings of the poet's mind. The father was a materialist, an 'epicurean,' and the son may have seemed to have caught something of the taint. His marriage with Farinata's daughter would tend in the same direction. When Virgil came to be to Dante the guide to a higher life, to a truer theory of the Divine government, Guido, it may be, would none of him, and the breach between the two friends was therefore something more than a quarrel on a point of taste, Guido preferring the Provençal poets to the author of the 'Æneid.' The change has its parallel in the altered feelings, let us say, with which a convert to or from Romanism or Protestantism looks on the friends whom he has left. What adds to the pain with which we read the whole story is that Dante, in the two months in which he held office as one of the Priori in 1300, had felt himself compelled to banish Guido and others, both Neri and Bianchi, as disturbers of the peace of Florence, to Sarzana; that his friend caught a fever there, and died in the autumn of the same year."

The inelegance of the English in which this note is written befits the venturesome character of its inferences and assertion. The banishment of Guido was not an act for which Dante was alone responsible; there is no evidence that he had any share in it, save that he was one of the priors when Guido and a large number of the party to which Guido belonged were—as Villani, the most trustworthy authority in regard to the facts reports—banished to Serrezzano. The leaders of the opposite party, conspirators against the peace of the city, had been fined and banished, and then, per levare ogni sospetto, "to remove every suspicion" of unfairness, Guido and his associates were also sent out of the city. The act was one in which Dante may have borne his part without the slightest indifference or wrong to Guido, and without the least break in the friendship between them.

In his Life of Dante, Dean Plumptre changes his inference that the friendship between Guido and Dante had been broken, into the statement of it as a fact. He says: "The two were as David and Jonathan, Orestes and Pylades, in their intimacy, till they were divided by their different estimate of Virgil, in itself but as a 'little rift,' but the symbol of a difference in thought, feeling, creed, morals, that went down to the foundations of life, and widened into a chasm." This is surely a hazardous assertion, seeing that the only warrant for it is the phrase "whom perhaps your Guido held in disdain."

The tendency, illustrated by this example, to draw illegitimate inferences from facts, and to turn suppositions into statements of fact, detracts from the value of Dean Plumptre's work, and makes it an unsafe guide for the otherwise uninformed student. Many of his hypotheses are ingenious; some of them may be sound; some of them are extravagant. The critical student, seeking for solid information, is wearied by guesswork. An amusing instance of the Dean's fondness for the pleasing speculations of his fancy occurs in connection with his mention of the fact that the Emperor Henry VII., in 1309, at Constance,

"formally recognized the comparative independence of the three Swiss cantons, Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden, as holding immediately from the Emperor, and so released them, as far as his action went, from the tyranny of the House of Hapsburg, against which they had risen under Melchtal, Stauffacher, and Fürst. Such an act was, it need hardly be said, an example of the

'Parcere subjectis et debellare superbos' of Dante's great instructor (Æn. vi, 854), which he quotes in Mon. ii, 7, as part of his ideal of a righteous ruler. The story of William Tell, which connects itself with that revolt, may be historical or legendary. It will be welcome, I think, to many students of Dante to learn that they may legitimately connect his name with the struggle for freedom with which it* has become the symbol. If Dante, as I conjecture, was at Constance, he may have met there the three great patriot heroes of Switzerland."

It would be difficult to carry pure inference much further than this. Because an Emperor on whom Dante set his hopes for Italy asserted

* "It" must here refer, not to Dante's name, but to the story of Tell; the Dean's English is a little careless.

the rights of the empire over three Swiss cantons which had revolted against the House of Hapsburg, Dante's name may be legitimately connected with the struggle for freedom in Switzerland!

There are questions of more importance than this opened by some of Dr. Plumptre's suppositions—such, for example, as his view that Dante experienced what he calls a "conversion crisis" at Rome, at Easter, in 1300 (Life, pp. lxiv, lxxvii); his insistence on Dante's influence in shaping the Papal policy (Id. lxxiv, lxxx); his argument as to the importance of Dante's relations to the Emperor Henry VII., which concludes with the assertion that "through him [Dante] that life [Henry VII.'s] had been brought to an untimely end" (Id. cix). But to discuss these doubtful matters properly, and to show how preponderant the weight of evidence is, in each instance, against Dean Plumptre's conclusions, would require more space than is here at our disposal.

The reading of Dante is just now more or less the fashion, and Dr. Plumptre's work falls in very well with the occasion. But the serious student of the poet will revert to sounder methods of interpretation, and less ambitious performances.

PRIMITIVE RACES.

Die Naturvölker. Missverständnisse, Missdeutungen und Missbandlungen. Von Dr. Wilhelm Schneider. Paderborn und Munster: Ferdinand Schöningh. 1885.

Dr. Schneider evidently has a fancy for popular subjects and alliterative or taking titles, and with it a talent for making his books successful. His work on 'Modern Spiritualism: its Facts, Fictions, and Fancies' (as we may venture to English the title, 'Der Neuere Geisterglaube: Thatsachen, Täuschungen und Theorien'), has reached its second and much enlarged edition. The same good fortune has attended his volume on 'Recognition in the Future Life' ('Das Wiedersehen im anderen Leben'); and it requires no special gift of prevision to foretell that his latest work on 'The Primitive Peoples,' and the "misconceptions, misrepresentations, and misdealings" of which they have been the victims, will be equally favored. We are not expressly informed in the case of this work, as we are in that concerning future recognition, that the author writes with the approval of his ecclesiastical superiors (mit kirchlicher Approbation), but we may take it for granted that, as a faithful son of the Church, he would not do otherwise. The result is, that we have an interesting work which good Catholics, and indeed the orthodox public in general, may read with pleasure and instruction, but which students of science will be apt to pronounce somewhat one-sided and superficial.

The work is in two parts, each being intended to deal with what the writer considers an erroneous theory respecting the primitive or uncivilized races. In the first division of his work, the author undertakes to show, in opposition to the views of Rousseau and his followers, that "the primitive man is not the ideal man," and that the noble savage is a fiction of poetry and benevolent theory. This error can hardly be supposed to exist at the present day; but if it is extant anywhere, the author has certainly disposed of it effectually. He traverses the entire field of research, examines the evidence of historians and observers in every age and country, and brings back from all quarters the same dolorous report. In Australia and New Guinea, in Polynesia, in Mexico, and America generally, throughout Africa and Central Asia, the uncultivated races are everywhere shown to be shockingly cruel, stupid, and sensual. Cannibalism, human sacrifices, infanticide, torture of captives, inhumanity to the aged and the sick, to women and to slaves, barbarous practices enforced by terrors of witchcraft, fetishism and other senseless delusions, polygamy and the grossest sensuality, are the prevalent vices of savage life. The pleasant fables of primitive innocence are dispelled as completely as the stories of giants and pigmies, of Amazons, and of "men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders," which amused our credulous forefathers.

The second and larger portion of the work deals with the opposite error of the present day, and undertakes to show that "uncivilized man is not an ape-man, not the pristine man (Urmensch) of the Development theory." The ingenious explorer now takes what we may call the "back-track." The magician reverses his wand. Hey, presto, change! The shield revolves and shows us its golden side. Once more the author goes over the extensive field, from Australia and the Pacific Islands to Africa, America, and the deepest recesses of Asia, and shows us, by the same indubitable evidence of the most trustworthy observers, that savages are found everywhere who possess all the virtues and intelligence that are deemed by some to be the highest outcome of civilization. They are hospitable, generous, and honest. They display strong domestic affections. They are industrious, intelligent, and wonderfully quick to learn. The author minutely reviews all the accounts which have been collected by Sir John Lubbock and other writers, of barbarous races reported to be totally devoid of religious belief, and shows that the reports are in every instance without good foundation. With equal industry he sifts all the stories which are told of savage tribes living in what is euphemistically described as "communal marriage," or, in other words, in promiscuous intercourse, and finds them everywhere utterly baseless. He shows at the same time that civilized men, in their dealings with savages, have been guilty of cruelties quite as shocking and excesses as vile as any that can be laid to the charge of their victims.

If the apparent inconsistency between the two portions of Dr. Schneider's work seems at first view somewhat whimsical and paradoxical, its purpose and plan, as they become gradually evident, prove to be sufficiently ingenious and effective. His object, of course, is to show that man, in all states of society and stages of culture, is everywhere the same being. The adage of the platitudinous sage, celebrated by Irving, is found to be everywhere true: "Man is a compound of wisdom and folly," of good and evil, as much in New Guinea and Central Africa as in Germany or New England, and neither more nor less. The difference between the savage and civilized races is shown to be mainly a difference in knowledge, and not necessarily a difference either of character or of capacity. On this point, the proof furnished by Dr. Schneider's elaborate treatise may be fairly styled complete; and if the mode of presenting it is odd, and savors somewhat of the bookmaker's artifice, it will doubtless have the effect of making his work more attractive to the majority of readers.

For students of science, the other aim which the author professes to have in view, and through which he doubtless hopes to win ecclesiastical approval of his work, will seem a grave defect, and will raise a question, if not of the author's sincerity, at least of his perspicacity. It is difficult to understand how a writer of Dr. Schneider's intelligence can seriously suppose that by showing the distance between savages and apes to be as great as that which removes civilized man from the same brutal species, he renders the theory of evolution less probable. The true proofs of development are not found in any such casual and external resemblances as Lubbock and other writers of his class have endeavored to trace. Dr. Schneider has had occasion repeatedly to cite the opinion of Darwin himself in opposition to the crude notions of his overhasty followers. But he omits to remark that the real strength of the doctrine is to be sought in very different and far profounder evidences—in the facts of comparative anatomy and in the revelations of embryology. If every human being, from the first appearance of man on the earth, had possessed the intellect of a Plato, the virtues of a St. Bernard, and the form of an Antinous, the belief of those who maintain the doctrine of evolution would be no less decided than it is at present.

In justice to the author's co-religionists, it should be said that the hostility of the Roman Catholic Church to the doctrine of evolution is apparently assumed by him without good grounds. Prof. Mivart, himself a firm Catholic, cites numerous expressions from ecclesiastical authorities of the highest rank—including St. Augustine, St. Thomas Aquinas, and Suarez—which not merely countenance, but in a remarkable manner affirm and advocate, this doctrine. Tyndall himself has not declared and maintained the doctrine of potentiality in creation more distinctly or more decidedly than St. Augustine in his work on Genesis. The mistake of Galileo's persecution was proper to the times, and not to the Church. In all ages, and in every country, ignorance and not religion has been the enemy of science. At this day, hostility to the latest theories is stronger in Protestant Tennessee than in Catholic Austria or Italy. It is to be regretted that a writer so able and enlightened as Dr. Schneider should have allowed the spectre of a defunct bigotry to alarm him to such an extent as seriously to impair the value of his painstaking and, in many respects, admirable work.

The Life of Benjamin F. Wade. By A. G. Riddle. Cleveland, O.: Wm. W. Williams. 1886.

This Life of Wade takes its place beside the equally modest lives of Corwin and of Giddings—all men of whom greatness has been freely predicated, and who yet are exhibited, chronicled, and eulogized by their several admiring biographers in the scanty dimensions of a small duodecimo. In the case of Wade, materials other than Congressional documents were very largely wanting, for he destroyed his own papers ruthlessly, and Mr. Riddle has not essayed the task of abstracting the body of his speeches, or, indeed, giving a strictly orderly account of his political career. He has not even made the book an organic whole. It is composed of a series of papers contributed to the Magazine of Western History, republished without editing, and with not a few typographical and other errors. Nor is it a pure biography, consisting largely as it does of a history of the times, or what passes for that in Mr. Riddle's mind. In fact, we have found our interest pretty evenly divided between the subject of this work and the writer of it, who unconsciously portrays himself quite as distinctly as his hero, and perhaps as attractively. The rambling character of Mr. Riddle's narrative—not without its charm—is not, we feel sure, the result of his years, any more than are the strange lapses in his chronology. What he calls the "sketchy thread of the incipient struggle against dominant slavery," alias his account of the rise of the anti-slavery movement, is amusing, not to say laughable. We will give a single example. The first anti-slavery speech of Mr. Wade's here reported was made in the winter of 1838-39, in the Ohio Senate. It was not remarkable for radicalism on the question of slavery, however true it may be that "it was a long stride in advance of public opinion then on the [Western] Reserve." But to say that it became "one of the sources of education, argument, and influence ere the great anti-slavery cause was in the milk" (p. 144), and that "it is to be remembered there was then no source or supply of anti-slavery arguments" (p. 136), is simply amazing. Has Mr. Riddle never heard of the "anti-slavery arguments" issued by the American Anti-Slavery Society in 1835, taken violently from the post-office in Charleston in July of that year, and made a bonfire of—with the approval of Jackson and his Postmaster-General? He mentions the Liberator on p. 130; it was launched in 1831, and nobody ever accused it of holding back anti-slavery arguments until after Mr. Wade had made his speech—in a State, by the way, whose organized anti-slavery societies outnumbered those of any other, and in which an anti-slavery revolt among the students of Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, occurred in 1834, with far-reaching results. Lovejoy was thought to have uttered a few arguments on the same side, and he had been hounded to death in 1837. But we must apologize for dwelling on so obvious an error, in which the panegyrist as well as the historian is at fault.

The most notable incident in Mr. Wade's professional career as related by Mr. Riddle is his adhering to his own first decision after it had been overruled by the Supreme Court of Ohio, and had come up before him on mandate. "'But, your Honor, the Supreme Court reversed your former judgment!' exclaimed the now rebeaten counsel. 'Yes, so I have heard. I will give them a chance to get right,' was the quiet reply." And "the Court, instead of attaching him for contempt, reversed itself and affirmed his last judgment." The sole original document of value brought to light by Mr. Riddle is the Memorandum signed by Simon Cameron, B. F. Wade, and Z. Chandler, May 26, 1874, recording a league on the part of these three men, "during the two or three years preceding the outbreak of the slaveholders' rebellion," to challenge their Southern colleagues for any gross abuse of Republicans as such, and "to carry the quarrel into a coffin." Finally, for what concerns Mr. Wade, his pedigree is decidedly interesting. He was a descendant of the Bradstreets, Dudleys, Uphams, and Wigglesworths of Massachusetts, but missed the poetical inheritance of Anne Bradstreet and Michael Wigglesworth as he did the Calvinistic theology of the latter ancestor. In other respects he showed many of the Puritan traits.

Mr. Riddle's style is very individual—rough, not always easy to parse, habitually careless of the predicate; but terse, epigrammatic, picturesque, sometimes tender and almost poetic. Pithy reflections abound, especially in regard to his own and Wade's profession. None, he says (p. 73), is so uncertain as the law. "Of all who study it, 20 per cent. is a fair estimate of those who succeed." He is more than just to his legal brethren when he says (p. 84): "I utterly repudiate Lord Brougham's rule—as do American lawyers generally. A lawyer's first duty, over and above his client, is to the law." Impressive is the statement (p. 104) that—

"During nearly the whole of the late war, the Supreme Court of the United States sat serenely adjudging the old cases involving old and well-established rules, in contemplation of law, oblivious of the new and awful issues discussed and decided in the red forum of battle. They were there settled ere the momentous constitutional and legal issues springing from war reached it, for which there were no rules, no precedents."

The following is also fresh and suggestive (p. 38). It refers to the early part of the century:

"Teaching as an art, an applied science, was unknown in the common schools. . . . One thing was inevitable under this arid, stepmother process. The stupid, dull-minded boys grew up dull, stupid men, with undeveloped rudimentary faculties, and remained such through life. . . . The difference between the naturally endowed would at once be increased and widened, and the better gifted would become, as they were, an intellectual aristocracy. Nothing in our world is so essentially democratic as a real common education. Now, men say there are no really great men, while the fact is, the common—the average—is so much elevated that the difference is much less between it and the highest, so that the great men have seemed to disappear."

We should like to quote the whole of a passage concerning the melancholy fascination which Washington life has for those who have passed any considerable time in the midst of it. "Men distinguished in Congress return," says Mr. Riddle, citing instances, "seek subordinate places—haunt the capital, like souls whose bodies are buried but will not depart" (p. 290). And there are some clever portraits or impressionist sketches of public characters—like this, of Sumner (p. 173): "He was always English in his air, and his presence produced a solitude"; or this of Commodore Wilkes (p. 253): "After the war I came to know him well—of large frame, tall, grim, forbidding of aspect, with an aptitude for trouble in business and property matters." But our space admonishes us.

Mural Painting. By Frederic Crowninshield. Illustrated. Boston: Ticknor & Co. Small 4to, pp. 155.

THE papers which make up this book appeared first in the American Architect. After an introductory chapter, there are essays on the Encaustic and Tempera of the Ancients, on The Wall (its proper make and preparation for painting); on Modern Encaustic; on Fresco (several chapters, interrupted, as it were, by an episodical account of Byzantine painting of other sorts than fresco); on Oil-Painting, Water-Glass, and "The Education and Qualifications of the Mural Painter." At the end of the volume are notes, in which some thoughts and some citations not admitted to the pages of the journal find their proper place. Twelve full-page illustrations, and twice as many printed with the text, are scattered through the volume, and the former are sometimes placed without especial appropriateness; but a rather full account of them comes at the last of all, and is very readable and very much in place. There is, in the text, a good deal of repetition and a visible lack of careful arrangement. There is no index at all, and at the beginning only a list of chapters, so that it would be difficult to find in haste what one might need the most. These faults, except the absence of the index, are the result of the publication in separate essays in a monthly journal. This is stated in the preface, and it is quaintly assumed that no remodelling of the book, or thorough revision of the matter, was practicable, or, at least, to be expected. And yet that is what the public had a right to expect. A practitioner in decorative art, one who has had, as is notorious, exceptional advantages of study, residence, and observation in Europe, and who for seven or eight years now has been at work at home, has done a good thing in giving us this book of sound doctrine, well-based information, and well-matured advice; it is much to be regretted that he has not considered the form as well as the fond, and put his valuable book into available shape.

For the book, in spite of all, is extremely valuable. Those who are made miserable by poor workmanship, walls that settle and yield, and plastering that cracks and peels, and those who would fain have some painting done instead of pasting paper over their wall-surfaces, or bothering with costly and inconvenient hangings of silk or stuff, will find the soundest advice about practical matters. Those who are prepared to risk something, and paint in despite of constructional weaknesses and danger of downfall or decay, will find most unmistakably sound views about the artistic questions that come up. Those who are interested in the archæological part of the business, and long for a clear account of the painting done in old times, have clearly expressed statements as to that, in which there is care taken to distinguish between what is known and what is only surmised or inferred.

Thirty years ago it was rather the thing to publish articles and books containing the elementary principles of decoration and its many correlative arts and sciences. Of late that custom has been nearly forgotten. It seems to be assumed that all the general principles have been laid down, all the theories proved or disproved, all the facts ascertained. Now, even were that the case indeed, still each generation needs to have its own lessons taught to it. And not only that, but every truth, no matter how well established, needs to be reiterated. Not only are we to indulge ourselves in the beautiful twice or three times repeated—δὶς καὶ τρὶς τὰ καλὰ λέγειν, as Plato has it—but we are to contemplate and to preach the well-ascertained fact two and three times over, and explain it and develop it and elucidate it, for our own and for others' benefit. This is what Mr. Crowninshield has done; he has taken up again and restated the sound old maxims which this new generation is really in danger of forgetting, so taken-for-granted are they—much as Dr. Holmes's fancied clergyman was suffering for want of theological instruction, having preached twice a day for thirty years or so and never heard a sermon in all that time. But, more than this, Mr. Crowninshield has been able to hold up the old truths in new lights; for the past quarter-century has done wonders in the way of research and comparison, and not an old maxim of them all but takes new meaning and new illustration from the accurate investigation of modern times—from a larger knowledge and a more extended comparison of facts. Success, then, to this edition, and a consequent new edition with new matter, and put into more perfect and permanent shape, is our sincere wish, for the good of the public even more than of the author.

The Standard Oratorios. Their Stories, their Music, and their Composers. By George P. Upton. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co.

MUSIC-LOVERS are under a new obligation to Mr. Upton for this companion to his 'Standard Operas'—two books which deserve to be placed on the same shelf with Grove's and Riemann's musical dictionaries. In listening to oratorios, a knowledge of the underlying text is not so essential as in opera, because oratorios are more commonly sung in a language familiar to the audience, and because the musical interest largely predominates over the poetic or textual interest. Nevertheless, even an oratorio gives much more satisfaction to those who know and heed its text than to those who look upon it as music alone; and this is true especially of modern oratorio, in which the influence of opera and music-drama is felt in many ways. Mr. Upton's book opens with a brief account of the development of oratorio, from the time when even dancing played a part in it, and the participants introduced all sorts of profane burlesque, such as tying the wings of geese on their shoulders to personate angels, braying donkey-like responses to the intonations of the priests, etc. Then the gradual progress is traced in the works of Italian composers, leading up to the highest stages in the works of Bach and Handel, which are fully and ably analyzed, the author's method being everywhere to point out beauties rather than dwell on shortcomings. Much space is devoted to modern composers and their works, including Berlioz's, Verdi's, and Brahms's Requiems, Dvořák's Stabat Mater, Liszt's "Elizabeth" and "Christus," Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel" and "Paradise Lost," J. K. Paine's "St. Peter," etc. A short biography in each case precedes the analysis of the text, and remarks on the principal musical numbers are interspersed in language as free as possible from technicalities, for the author states that his work "has been prepared for the general public rather than for musicians." In looking over the list of composers and the dates of their sacred compositions, one is struck by the fact that not a few musicians seem to agree with Handel that "sacred music is best suited to a man descending in the vale of years." The last twenty pages contain an historic sketch of sacred music in America, from the jingling tunes of quaint old Billings and the Puritan psalm-singers to the musical conventions and latter-day choral festivals and paid church choirs.

Exposé Sommaire des Théories Transformistes de Lamarck, Darwin et Haeckel. Par Arthur Vianna de Lima. Paris. 1886. Pp. 523.

THIS volume gives a very readable account of evolution from the standpoint of the extreme materialistic school. The first chapter treats at great length of the mechanical and monistic theory of vital phenomena. Living things are treated as matter combined in certain ways and exhibiting certain phenomena. These phenomena, however complex, are held to be due to the matter of which organisms are composed, and hence, as life cannot be supposed to come out of dead matter, all matter is assumed to have life. Other chapters deal with the survival of the fittest, the struggle for existence, the origin of species and their mutability, and the explanation of teleology which the modern views afford. A good summary is given of the chief facts adduced by Darwin, as well as others furnished by recent research, while the explanation of the facts is clearly and forcibly set forth. The book is somewhat diffuse, but the writer is well acquainted with the subject, and, though somewhat dogmatic, is a good representative of the more advanced Continental Darwinian school.

Perry's Saints; or the Fighting Parson's Regiment in the War of the Rebellion. By James M. Nichols. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

WE have here the regimental history of the Forty-Eighth New York Volunteers. The regiment was stationed along the Carolina coast for the first three years of the war, and saw but little active service; but in 1864 it was transferred to the Army of the Potomac in time to take part in the battle of Cold Harbor and the engagements around Petersburg. It was subsequently moved back to North Carolina, and participated in the assault and capture of Fort Fisher. Its history is not greatly different from that of other regiments, except in the character of its first Colonel, the Rev. James H. Perry. He was a graduate of West Point, who offered his services to the Texan Government just after his graduation. At the battle of San Jacinto he succeeded in killing a Mexican officer whom he thought to be Santa Anna. On finding out his mistake he was overwhelmed with remorse, left the Texan service immediately, and entered the ministry. The news of the bombardment of Fort Sumter caused him to take up his sword again, and to remain in the service until he died of fever contracted in the Southern swamps. His was not the only case of this kind, but it affords another illustration of the moral forces which lay behind the great uprising of the North in 1861.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Arawiyah, Al. Tales of the Caliph. London: T. Fisher Unwin.
Bentley, Prof. R. Physical Botany: An Abridgment, by Eliza A. Youmans. D. Appleton & Co. $1.40.
Bigelow, J. The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin. Vol. I. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.
Bishop, P. P. American Patriotism: An Essay. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 75 cents.
Browning, R. Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in their Day. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.
Cantacuzène-Altieri, Princess Olga. Irène. Frederick Warne & Co. 35 cents.
Carroll, L. Alice's Adventure Under Ground. Being a fac-simile of the Original MS. Book afterwards developed into Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. Illustrated. Macmillan & Co. $1.50.
Coleridge, C. R. A Near Relation: A Novel. Harper's Franklin Square Library. 20 cents.
Cooke, Rose Terry. Happy Rodd: or, She Hath Done What She Could. Boston: Ticknor & Co. $1.50.
Edwards, J. Differential Calculus, with Applications and Numerous Examples. An Elementary Treatise. Macmillan & Co. $2.75.
Fearing, Lillian Blanche. The Sleeping World, and Other Poems. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.
Feuillet, O. The romance of a Poor Young Man. Wm. S. Gottsberger.
Frémont, J. C. Memoirs of My Life. Together with a Sketch of the Life of Senator Benton, by Jessie Benton Frémont. Illustrated. Vol. I. Belford, Clarke & Co.
Frémont, Jessie Benton. Souvenirs of My Time. Illustrated. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.
Greville, C. C. F. Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria. Part III. 1852-1860. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green & Co. New York: Worthington Co. $0.50.
Harte, B. A Millionaire of Rough-and-Ready, and Devil's Ford. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.
Hoke, J. The Great Invasion of 1863; or, Gen Lee in Pennsylvania. Dayton, O.: W. J. Shuey. $3.
Jewett, Sarah Orne. The Story of the Normans. Told Chiefly in Relation to their Conquest of England. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.
Kennedy, Prof. A. B. W. The Mechanics of Machinery. Illustrated. Macmillan & Co. $3.50.
Locomotives and Locomotive Building: Together with a History of the Origin and Growth of the Rogers Locomotive and Machine Works, Paterson, N. J., from 1831 to 1886. W. S. Gottsberger.
Lyte, H. C. A History of the University of Oxford, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1530. Macmillan & Co. $5.
Moimari, G. de. Les Lois naturelles de l'Économie Politique. Paris: Librairie Guillaumin et Cie.

JUST PUBLISHED.

REMSEN'S ELEMENTARY CHEMISTRY.

A TEXT-BOOK FOR BEGINNERS.

By Ira Remsen, Prof. in Johns Hopkins Univ. 12mo (American Science Series, Elementary Course), pp. 272, $1.00.

In the opinion of the author, a rational course in chemistry, whether for younger or older pupils, is something more than a lot of statements of facts of more or less importance; a lot of experiments of more or less beauty; or a lot of rules devised for the purpose of enabling the pupil to tell what things are made of. If the course does not to some extent help the pupil to think as well as to see, to reason as well as to observe, it does not deserve to be called rational.

The object of the course laid down in this book is not to make chemists, but to help to develop sound minds, and at the same time to awaken interest in a set of natural phenomena of great importance to mankind.

A copy of the above will be sent, post-paid, to a teacher, for examination with a view to introduction, upon receipt of 50 cents and reference to the Nation.

HENRY HOLT & CO.,

29 West 23d St., New York.

N. Y. INFORMATION CO., 693 B'way. —Letters with questions requiring research or written reply should contain one or two dozen stamps, unless the writer has a credit with us by last report.

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

New York and London.

NOW READY:

THE CONFLICT OF EAST AND WEST IN EGYPT. By John Eliot Bowen, Ph.D. 12mo, cloth, extra, $1.25. Chief Contents: Mehemet Ali to Ismail, Ismail's Designs, The Road to Ruin, Mehemet Tewfik, Egypt for the Egyptians, The Rebellion of Arabi, The Sûdan and the Mahdi, The Mission of Gordon, The Eastern Sûdan, Gordon at Khartoum and the Government in London, Wolseley's Expedition.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE SUBJECT.

A clear and comprehensive summary of events in Egypt since 1832.

THE FALL OF MAXIMILIAN'S EMPIRE AS SEEN FROM A U. S. GUNBOAT. By Seaton Schroeder, Lieut. U. S. N. 12mo, with portrait and other illustrations, $1.00. A graphic account of a curious and important episode in American History.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

THE STORY OF THE NORMANS. By Sarah O. Jewett. Being the twelfth volume in the STORY OF THE NATIONS Series, 12mo, fully illustrated, $1.50.

Full prospectus of the series and list of recent publications sent on application. Classified and analytical catalogue, 130 pp., sent on receipt of stamp.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL, to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

NOW READY.

MRS. WISTER'S NEW TRANSLATION.

SAINT MICHAEL.

A Romance. From the German of E. Werner, author of 'Banned and Blessed,' etc.

12mo, Extra Cloth, $1.25.

The novels of E. Werner are always readable and in the highest degree entertaining. Mrs. Wister's refined and pure taste never leads her amiss in making her selections, and the novel before us is more interesting than any of its predecessors. She is one of the best translators from the German in this country, and the felicitous manner in which the work has been done in the present volume adds to the charm of a truly agreeable novel.

MRS. WISTER'S PREVIOUS TRANSLATIONS.

12mo, Extra Cloth, Each $1.25.

VIOLETTA,
THE LADY WITH THE RUBIES,
VAIN FOREBODINGS,
A PENNILESS GIRL,
ETC., ETC., ETC.

TAKEN BY SIEGE.

A Novel. 12mo, Extra Cloth, $1.25.

"The story deals with the living forces and events of to-day, and is one of the most vital and strong and keenly interesting of late novels."—Boston Evening Traveller.

For sale by all Booksellers; or any volume will be sent by the publishers, post-paid, by mail on receipt of the price.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY, Publishers,
715 and 717 Market St., Philadelphia.

"S. DAVIS, Jr.," Cincinnati.

DIAMOND HAMS AND BREAKFAST BACON.

Sold by leading Grocers, who have circulars "How to Cook the Diamond Hams."

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1128. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

D. APPLETON & CO.

PUBLISH THIS WEEK:

I.

The Greville Memoirs.

A JOURNAL OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA, from 1852 to 1860. By the late Charles Greville, Esq., Clerk of the Council. Being the third and concluding part of 'The Greville Memoirs.' One vol., 12mo, cloth. Price, $2.00.

The preceding volumes of 'The Greville Memoirs' consist of "A Journal of the Reign of King George IV. and King William IV.," in two vols.; and "A Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, from 1837 to 1852," in two vols. Price in each case, per vol., $2.00.

The volume now published, in addition to personal anecdotes, deals with many important events, such, for instance, as the reëstablishment of the French Empire, the Crimean War, the Indian Mutiny, and the Italian War.

II.

Brazil: Its Condition and Prospects.

By C. C. Andrews, ex-Consul-General to Brazil; formerly U. S. Minister to Norway and Sweden. 12mo, cloth, 353 pages. Price, $1.50.

"I hope I may be able to present some facts in respect to the present situation of Brazil which will be both instructive and entertaining to general readers. My means of acquaintance with that empire are principally derived from a residence of three years at Rio de Janeiro, the capital, while employed in the service of the United States Government, during which period I made many journeys into the interior."—From the Preface.

III.

A Zealot in Tulle.

A NOVEL. By Mrs. Wildrick. 12mo. Price, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

The scenes of 'A Zealot in Tulle' are laid in Florida, the introductory part in Florida of seventy years ago, the main story in Florida of to-day. The plot turns mainly upon romantic incidents connected with a treasure buried in an old fort by the Spaniards at the time of their occupancy.

IV.

Life and Labors of the Rev. W. E. Boardman.

By Mrs. Boardman. 12mo, cloth. Price, $1.25.

The life of the Rev. Mr. Boardman was full of varied incidents and experiences, both in this country and in Europe. It includes graphic pictures of life in California, and striking incidents of the civil war.

V.

The Master of the Ceremonies.

A NOVEL. By George Manville Fenn, author of 'Double Cunning,' etc. 12mo. Price, paper, 50 cents; half bound, 75 cents.

"The interest in the plot is skilfully kept up to the end."—Academy.

"The story is very interesting."—Athenæum.

 For sale by all booksellers; or any volume sent by the publishers by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.

1, 3, and 5 Bond Street, New York.

FOREIGN BOOKS.

Book-buyers wishing to receive the Catalogues of dealers in second-hand books in England, France, Germany, Italy, etc, will please apply for them, stating specialties. Orders promptly filled. Rare books procured and Auction Sales attended to, here and abroad.

Not buying for stock ourselves, our patrons are certain to receive what they order through us, however good the bargain.

B. WESTERMANN & CO., New York
838 Broadway. [Established 1848.]

F. W. CHRISTERN,

39 West Twenty-third Street, New York,

Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

"One of the foremost periodicals in the English language."—Albany Argus.

Critical Notices of January Number

New Princeton Review.

TERMS: $3 a year in advance, postage free. Single numbers 50 cents. We make the special offer of 1886 and 1887—two years in one subscription—for $5. Remittances may be made in P. O. orders, drafts, checks, or registered letters. Full descriptive circulars [giving index of contents for six months in 16 pages], including club rates with the leading weeklies and monthly magazines, sent on application.

NOTICES:

"THE NEW PRINCETON REVIEW IS GAINING AN IMPORTANT PLACE AMONG THE MOST THOUGHTFUL PERIODICALS, NOT ONLY IN THIS COUNTRY, BUT IN ENGLAND, WHICH ONCE POSSESSED ALL MAGAZINES WORTHY TO BE CALLED REVIEWS. HISTORICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL FEATURES DISTINGUISH THE JANUARY NUMBER."—BOSTON JOURNAL.

"THE NEW PRINCETON REVIEW has won for itself a warm place in the regard of the thinking public. It is dignified, always serious, scholarly, without undue pedantry, and it possesses a grasp at once firm and true upon the higher thought of the time, political, ethical, economic, philosophic, scientific, and literary. The January number reveals its comprehensive aims and abundant fulfilment."—Providence Journal.

"The January number of the NEW PRINCETON REVIEW is a notable issue of one of the foremost periodicals in the English language. It contains a great amount of vigorous and scholarly discussion, and its contributors are all eminent men in the field of letters."—Albany Argus.

"THE JANUARY NUMBER IS ONE OF GREAT INTEREST AND VALUE, AND THE REVIEW HAS TAKEN AT ONCE THE HIGHEST RANK IN CURRENT LITERATURE."—LUTHERAN OBSERVER.

"THE NEW PRINCETON REVIEW enters its second year with fine prospects and a determination to strengthen and extend its popular features.

"The 'RECORD,' which is a thorough epitome of the world's progress and events, appears in each third number.

"VICTOR HUGO is vigorously handled by Mr. Fiske. The lyrical genius of the French poet is heartily and generously recognized, but his great defects on the side of sham sentiment, sham pathos, and sham horror are remorselessly emphasized."—Newark Daily Advertiser.

"Under its present management the Review has maintained a high standard of scholarship and excited interest in every number, by the variety of the topics discussed and the names of its contributors."—Brooklyn Citizen.

"CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, IN TALKING OF THE EXTIRPATION OF CRIMINALS, DEALS WITH A SUBJECT IN WHICH HE IS THOROUGHLY AT HOME."—N. Y. CHRISTIAN UNION.

"THE NEW PRINCETON REVIEW has already more than fulfilled the most sanguine expectations of its friends, giving them sound and thoughtful reading of rare quality, and the promises of its publishers for the coming year can be depended upon."—Christian at Work.

"THIS REVIEW is especially valuable for the complete absence of sensationalism with which it is conducted, and the assurance that every reader may feel that whatever subject is discussed in its pages will be fairly and intelligently treated."—Boston Post.

"THE DEPARTMENT OF CRITICISMS, NOTES, AND REVIEWS IS UNUSUALLY RICH AND FULL. THIS IS AN ADMIRABLE REVIEW AND FULLY KEEPS UP ITS HIGH REPUTATION."—PITTSBURGH METHODIST RECORD.

"This is a truly magnificent and very notable number. It contains more vigorous writing than is often found between the covers of any periodical."—Boston Traveller.

A. C. ARMSTRONG & SON., 714 B'way, N. Y.

Public Library

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 107

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 110

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
"The Labor Problem" 112
Arbitration 113
Virginia Coupon-Killing 113
Rhode Island Politics 114
Linen Paper vs. Cotton Paper 115

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Ibsen's "Spectres" 116

CORRESPONDENCE:
The Next Thing in Pensions 117
How to Collect a Library 117
Brazilian River Sources 117

NOTES 118

REVIEWS:
The American School of Evolutionists 121
Recent Novels 123
Tenth Census of the United States 125
The Dragon, Image, and Demon 126
The Mexican Guide 126
The Story of the Saracens 126
The Struggle of the Bulgarians for National Independence under Prince Alexander 127
Goethe's Faust 127

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 128

FINE ARTS:
The Water-Color Exhibition 128
The Etching Club Exhibition 129

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.

Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27.

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top.

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding.

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

Scale of Agate lines.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gilbg & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CONNECTICUT, LYME.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL — A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE. — A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls.
MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887.
Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI- tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY HALL SCHOOL (50th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT AD- mits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

ADAMS ACADEMY. — PREPARA- tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886.
For all information address WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE- paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI- tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course. HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal, Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D. Rector.

NEW JERSEY, Princeton.

EVELYN COLLEGE FOR YOUNG Women. A full Princeton College course. Lectures and examinations by the Princeton Professors. Nothing of co-education. All the comforts and care of a refined home. In which French and German will be spoken. A Preparatory Department included. Special courses for those who prefer them. Music, drawing, painting, and other branches of art under the best New York masters.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES:

President, Rev. W. H. GREEN, D.D., LL.D.
Rev. E. R. CRAVEN, D.D., T. N. MCCARTER, LL.D., Trustees of Princeton College.
Rev. F. L. PATTON, D.D., LL.D., Rev. C. W. HODGE, D.D., Professors in the Theological Seminary.
Rev. J. O. MURRAY, D.D., Dean of the College Faculty.
C. A. YOUNG, Ph.D., W. A. PACKARD, Ph.D., A. MARQUAND, Ph.D., Professors in Princeton College.
Hon. A. V. VAN FLEET, Vice-Chancellor of New Jersey.
CORTLANDT PARKER.

President of the Institution, Rev. J. H. MCILVAINE, D.D., former Professor of Belles-Lettres in Princeton College.
Principals, ELIZABETH D. MCILVAINE, ALICE M. MCILVAINE.

The fall term will open Sept. 28, 1887. Examinations for admission, June 23-24, Sept. 26-27. Application should be made if possible before the June examinations. Prospectus, with full particulars, sent on application to
J. H. MCILVAINE,
Princeton, N. J.

NEW YORK, Hempstead, L. I.

HEMPSTEAD INSTITUTE. — ES- tablished 1861.
A thorough English, Classical, and Commercial Boarding School, conducted udon the Military System. Primary, Intermediate, Higher English, College Preparatory, and Commercial Courses. Spring term begins February 14, 1887. For catalogue, giving particulars as to location, terms, conditions of admission, references, etc., address the Principal.

NEW YORK, New Hartford, near Utica.

MRS. COLLIER'S SCHOOL for YOUNG girls from six to sixteen. Open the entire year.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys.
WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. CHARLOTTE MAY WILKIN- son's Home School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Beautiful and healthful situation on the hills above Syracuse. School year begins Sept. 14, 1887. Refers to Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, George Wm. Curtis, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Hon. Andrew D. White, Louisa May Alcott, James B. Angell, LL.D., Hon. George V. N. Lothrop.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill.
WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies.
Students prepared for College.
Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia.

THE BERLITZ SCHOOL OF LAN- guages.
Philadelphia, 1523 Chestnut Street.
New York, 23 W. 23d Street and 627 Madison Avenue.
Brooklyn, 26 Court Street.
Boston, 154 Tremont Street.
Washington, 723 14th Street, N. W.
Superior native teachers. Conversational lessons a specialty in small classes, $10 per term; also private instruction. Trial lesson free. Terms begin any time.

Teachers.

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER OF Articulation wants a position as governess to a dead child. Good references. Address H. C. W., care Nation.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

JOHN W DALZELL, PRIVATE TU- tor, 15 Appian Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

NATIVE FRENCH AND GERMAN Teachers wanted, able to teach also Spanish or Italian, for summer engagement. Address at once, stating experience, etc. L. A. STAGER, 4041 Haverford St., Philadelphia.

PUPILS INSTRUCTED IN PRACTI- cal Kindergartnering and in Quincy School methods. Address, L. E. L., care Mrs. Weil's School, 711 Madison Avenue, New York City.

School Agencies.

PARDEEN'S SCHOOL BULLETIN Agency, Syracuse, N. Y., may be depended on to furnish suitable teachers, and to inform no others.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

SCHOOL AGENCY.—Oldest and best known in the United States. Estab'd 1855.
J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., 7 East 14th St., New York.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free.
E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

UNION TEACHERS' AGENCY, 16 Astor Place, New York City. W. D. KERR, Secretary.

Wants.

WANTED—A POSITION AS MANA- ger of a first-class hotel. Have had fifteen years experience as a proprietor; have an extensive acquaintance East and West, especially with the Army and Navy. Can give letters from most prominent people in the country. Correspondence solicited. Address B. H., care the Nation.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE

School of Political Science.

This school begins its seventh year October 1, 1888. Its faculty consists of ten professors and lecturers. It offers (1886-7) eight courses in political and constitutional history, seven in political economy, five in constitutional and administrative law, four in diplomacy and international law, three in Roman law and comparative jurisprudence, two in political philosophy, and one in bibliography—in all 42 hours per week through the academic year. The full course of study covers three years. Regular students (such as have completed the junior year in any college) receive at the end of the first year the degree of A.B.; at end of second, A.M.; at end of third, Ph.D. Graduates of other colleges admitted to advanced standing as candidates for A.M. and Ph.D. Students of the School of Political Science admitted to all courses in the Schools of Arts and Law, without additional tuition fee.

SPECIAL STUDENTS admitted to any course without examination, upon payment of proportional fee. Circulars of information sent upon application.
F. A. P. BARNARD, LL.D., President.

THE

Connecticut General

LIFE INSURANCE CO.,

HARTFORD, CONN.

Receipts for 1886, $271,945.26.

Disbursements, $200,317.95.

Assets, January 1, 1887	$1,625,332.65.
Liabilities	1,231,925.05
Surplus to policy-holders by Conn. and Mass. standard	393,407.60
Surplus to policy-holders by New York standard	479,836.60
Ratio of assets to liabilities by Conn. and Mass. standard	132.56
By New York standard	142.77

FRED. V. HUDSON, Secretary.

THOMAS W. RUSSELL, President.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical, costing less than one cent a cup. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

N. Y. INFORMATION CO., 697 B'way, New York.—Books, Indexing and Researches.

TREES—FRUIT AND ORNAMENTAL; ROSES; GRAPEVINES.

SPRING PLANTING.—We offer the largest and most complete general stock in the U. S., besides many Novelties. Catalogues sent to all regular customers, free. To others: No. 1, Fruits, 10c.; No. 2, Ornamental Trees, etc., illustrated, 15c.; No. 3, Strawberries; No. 4, Wholesale; No. 5, Roses, free.

ELLWANGER & BARRY,
Mt. Hope Nurseries, Rochester, New York.

37th Annual Statement

OF THE

ÆTNA

Life Insurance Company,

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

JANUARY 1, 1887.

Premium Receipts in 1886	$3,030,946 26
Interest Receipts in 1886	1,617,992 24
Total Receipts during the year	4,648,938 50
Disbursements to Policy holders, and for expenses, taxes, etc.	3,696,252 66
Assets January 1, 1887	31,545,936 77
Total Liabilities	26,196,060 41
Surplus by Ct and Mass. standard	5,349,870 36
Surplus by standard of N. Y.	6,800,000 00
Policies in force January 1, 1887, 63,293, insuring	92,262,969 44
Policies issued in 1886, 6,728, insuring	13,027,993 00

MORGAN G. BULKELEY, President.
J. C. WEBSTER, Vice-President.
J. L. ENGLISH, Secretary.
H. W. ST. JOHN, Actuary.
GURDON W. RUSSELL, M.D., Consulting Physician.
T. J. MUMFORD, Manager, 165 B'way, New York.

German Simplified.

An eminently practical new method for learning the German language. Edition for self instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each; school edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all book sellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by Prof. A. Knoflach, 140 Nassau St., New York. Prospectus free

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars. Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

7 2/3 % CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures Capital $600,000 Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets. AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s

Saturday Books.

CHANNING'S NOTE-BOOK. Passages from the Unpublished Manuscripts of William Ellery Channing. Selected by his Granddaughter, Grace Ellery Channing. 1 vol., 16mo, $1.

These selections cover a great variety of subjects, treated with that elevated seriousness and lofty purity of mind by which Dr. Channing was distinguished. The controversy which once raged about Channing has so far died away that all noble men and women eagerly and reverently acknowledge his rare nobility, wisdom, and sincerity.

ROBA DI ROMA. By William W. Story. New and revised edition. 2 vols., 16mo, $2.50]

One of the best and most interesting of works written about Rome. Mr. Story's long residence there enables him to write from full observation of all the distinctive features of Roman art, architecture, society, and character. This edition has been carefully revised and corrected to correspond with the changes in Rome since the work was originally written.

A HALF CENTURY IN SALEM. By Marianne C. D Silsbee. In one volume, tastefully printed and bound. 16mo, $1.

The readers of this charming book will find the Salem of fifty years ago living anew in its pages; its schools, churches, shops, "fair women and brave men," and that gay society in which they figured, are all graphically sketched by one who lived among them.

The book is a careful piece of printing. The cover is ornamented with a vignette of the porch of one of the old characteristic mansions of Salem.

 For sale by all Booksellers. Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price, by the publishers,*

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.
BOSTON;
11 East 17th St., New York.

FOREIGN

SECOND HAND BOOK CATALOGUES

Will be mailed to bookbuyers, regularly as issued, on application to

E. & J. B. YOUNG & CO.,
Publishers and Importers,
Cooper Union, Fourth Ave., New York.

Book collectors will find in these Catalogues many choice 'out-of-the-way" books at low prices. We have special facilities for importing from these lists. Correspondence solicited.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, NEWSDEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

LE FRANCAIS,

REVUE MENSUELLE DE GRAMMAIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

JEAN DE PEIFFER, Rédacteur,
Principal Dep. of Languages,
New England Conservatory, Franklin Square,
BOSTON, MASS.

. . . The best French periodical ever founded in this country. . . .—The Nation.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS.—Reprinted from the Nation, and in some measure supplying the place of the first two volumes of the paper, now very scarce. Cloth, 12mo, price $1.50. Sent postpaid, on receipt of price.

HENRY HOLT & CO., New York.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

STÄGER SUMMER COLLEGE OF LANGUAGES,

UNIVERSITY OF VERMONT, BURLINGTON, VT.
July 11th to August 19th, 1887,

To impart a Speaking Knowledge of German or French, or other languages, is the principal aim of the well-qualified Faculty of exclusively native teachers. Terms: $20.00, entitling to all the instruction given during the six weeks. Room and Board at German or French table, $6.00. For Circulars, etc., address the President,

I. A. STÄGER, 4041 Haverford St., Philadelphia, Pa.

EVERYTHING THAT IS NEW IN SEEDS

AND RARE IN PLANTS

is offered and described in our

CATALOGUE No. 393, which this year we send out in an illuminated cover. The Catalogue is replete with new engravings of the choicest flowers and vegetables, many of which can only be obtained from us; and contains, besides, 2 beautiful colored plates, and very full instructions on all garden work. Altogether it is the best ever offered by us, and, we believe, is the most complete publication of its kind ever issued. Mailed on receipt of 10 cents (in stamps), which may be deducted from first order. Please be sure to order Catalogue by the number.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 Cortlandt St., NEW YORK.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

Verdi: An Anecdotic History of His Life and Works.

By ARTHUR PONGIN. With Portrait and Facsimile. Translated from the French by James E. Matthew. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $2.00.

Modern Hinduism.

Being an Account of the Religion and Life of the Hindus in Northern India.

By W. J. WILKINS of the London Missionary Society, author of 'Hindu Mythology—Vedic and Purānic.' Demy 8vo, cloth, $5.25.

GENERAL CONTENTS:

EARLY LIFE.—Birth and Ceremonies—The Hindu Home—The Guru, and Initiation into Hinduism.
HINDU SECTS.—Vedantism—The Vaishnava—Saivits—Saktas, etc., etc.
CASTE.
WORSHIP.—Private—Temple—Festivals—Pilgrimages, etc.
WOMAN.—Her Position—Marriage Ceremonies—Widows—Sati.
MORALS.—Death—Shrādha, and Future Judgment.

A Comtist Lover, and Other Studies.

By Elizabeth Rachel Chapman. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.00.

CONTENTS: Part I.—A Comtist Lover: Being a Dialogue on Positivism and the Zeitgeist—The Extension of the Law of Kindness: Being an Essay of the Rights of Animals. Part II.—The Delphine of Madame de Staël—Some Immortality-Thoughts—Some Novels of William Black.

 "The main essays on immortality and on the Rights of Animals and the Dialogue, are all of them splendid. The clearness with which you have grasped the problems at issue, the justice you deal to your opponents, and the masterly way in which you state your own high convictions are, to my thinking, quite admirable." —Frances Power Cobbe.

A DICTIONARY OF ISLAM: Being a Cyclopedia of the Doctrines, Rites, Ceremonies and Customs, together with the Technical and Theological Terms of the Mohammedan Religion. By Thomas Patrick Hughes, B.D., M.R.A.S. With numerous illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth, $16 80.

*PARACELSUS.—THE LIFE OF PHI-*LIPPUS THEOPHRASTUS, BOMBAST OF HOHENHEIM, known by the name of PARACELSUS, and the Substance of his Teachings concerning Cosmology, Anthropology, Pneumatology, Magic and Sorcery, Medicine, Alchemy and Astrology, Philosophy and Theosophy, Extracted and Translated from his Rare and Extensive Works, and from some Unpublished Manuscripts. By Franz Hartmann, M.D., author of 'Magic,' &c. Small demy 8vo, cloth, $4.20.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

CONTAINING

STANDARD WORKS of EUROPEAN LITERATURE in the ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference,

Comprising in all Translations from the French, German, Italian, Spanish, Scandinavian, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, and Greek.

687 Volumes, $1.40 or $2 each, with exceptions.

RECENT ADDITIONS.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE LATIN AND TEUTONIC NATIONS. Translated by P. A. Ashworth, Translator of Dr. Gneist's 'History of the English Constitution.'

HEINE'S TRAVEL-PICTURES: including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School. Translated by Francis Storr. With Appendices and Map.

GOETHE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH ZELTER. Selected, Translated, and Edited by A. D. Coleridge, M.A.

THE STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF HISTORICAL GEOLOGY. By A. J. Jukes-Browne, B.A., F.G.S., of the Geological Survey of England and Wales. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations.

WERNER'S TEMPLARS IN CYPRUS. Translated by E. A. M. Lewis.
"Werner was a Freemason, and his religious notions were, at the date of his writing this poem, of a theosophic order."—Preface.

PAUSANIAS'S DESCRIPTION OF GREECE. Translated into English, with Notes and Index, by A. R. Shilleto, M.A. 2 vols.

HOFFMANN'S TALES. The Serapion Brethren. First Portion, containing Thirteen Tales. Translated from the German by Major A. Ewing.

HAUFF'S TALES. The Caravan—The Sheik of Alexandria—The Inn in the Spessart. Translated by S. Mendel.

GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. A New Edition, containing pieces hitherto uncollected and a Life of the Author, with Notes from Various Sources. By J. W. M. Gibbs. 5 vols.

FOSTER'S ESSAY ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF TIME. Together with Notes of Sermons and other Pieces.

CHRISTIAN ICONOGRAPHY; or, The History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. By the late A. N. Didron. Translated from the French by E. J. Millington, and completed, with Additions and Appendices, by M. Stokes. 2 vols., with numerous Illustrations.

TALFOURD'S LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. With Explanatory Notes. New Edition, Revised and Greatly Enlarged by W. Carew Hazlitt. 2 vols.

HAZLITT'S SPIRIT OF THE AGE; or, Contemporary Portraits. New Edition. By W. C. Hazlitt.

A SELECTION.

ANTONINUS.—THE THOUGHTS OF M. AURELIUS.
BAX'S MANUAL OF THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (Centenary Edition, edited by Napier). 6 vols.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols. Translated.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols.
FAIRHOLT'S COSTUME IN ENGLAND. (Dillon) 2 vols.
HUGO'S (VICTOR) POEMS. Translated.
MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols.
PEPYS' DIARY. 4 vols.
RICHTER'S LEVANA.
RICHTER'S FLOWER, FRUIT, AND THORN PIECES.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. Translated. 2 vols.
STAUNTON'S CHESS HANDBOOK.

* The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.*

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED.

The Self-Revelation of God.

By Samuel Harris, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology in Yale College. 1 vol., 8vo, uniform with 'The Philosophical Basis of Theism.' $3.50.

This work is a restatement of the evidence of the existence of God and of the reality of His revelation of Himself, as modified by and in harmony with the legitimate results of recent thought, and meeting scepticism in its present positions.

The subject is divided into four parts, the first of which treats of the Revelation of God in the experience or consciousness of man. The three remaining parts are concerned with the verification of this fundamental fact by the other revelations which God makes of Himself, viz.: Part II. His Revelation of Himself as the Absolute Being. Part III. His Revelation of Himself as the Personal God in the Constitution and Course of Nature, and in the Constitution and History of Man. Part IV. His Revelation of Himself reconciling the World to Himself in Christ.

Some Problems of Philosophy.

By Archibald Alexander, Professor of Philosophy in Columbia College. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.00.

Prof. Alexander states briefly but comprehensively and clearly those problems of philosophy which may be regarded as still unsolved, and to understand the nature of which is to understand the present condition and work of philosophy itself.

"It is a book that should be familiar to all who take an intellectual interest in the great questions with which it deals."—The Churchman.

"'Problems of Philosophy' is to be classed among the few books on the subject that the general reader will care to peruse, and, perusing, will find of great value and interest."—Hartford Post.

Old Faiths in New Light.

By Newman Smyth. New and Revised Edition. 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.

The current discussions in Theology give the appearance of this volume in a new edition a special and timely interest. Dr. Smyth's book is a very comprehensive and singularly clear survey of the whole field of modern thought in relation to the fundamental questions of theology, and a very lucid presentation of the changes which have been effected and the positions which are now held by those who believe in the "new theology."

"Few books published in this generation have been more read, more thought over, or had a more stimulating influence on religious thought than this book by Dr. Smyth."—The Independent.

"The author is logical, and therefore clear. He is also master of a singularly attractive literary style. Few writers whose books come under our eyes succeed in treating metaphysical and philosophical themes in a manner at once so forcible and so interesting. We speak strongly about this book, because we think it exceptionally valuable. It is just such a book as ought to be in the hands of all intelligent men and women who have received an education sufficient to enable them to read intelligently about such subjects as are discussed therein—and the number of such persons is very much larger than some people think."—Congregationalist.

* These books for sale by all booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by*

Charles Scribner's Sons,

743-745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1887.

The Week.

THE first debate in the Senate on the Treasury surplus took place on Wednesday while the Sundry Civil Appropriation Bill was under consideration. Senator Morrill of Vermont had made a set speech on this subject a few days after Congress met last December, intending to show that the surplus was all moonshine, and that there was no such thing, but, on the contrary, a deficit of more than $24,000,000, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, Senator Allison, reasoning from the same premises and quoting the same authority, makes out a surplus of $15,000,000, after allowing $5,000,000 for the Mexican Pension Bill and $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 for the Dependent Pension Bill, which had not been passed when Mr. Morrill made his speech—the difference between the two estimates being upwards of $50,000,000. Both included an estimate of $48,000,000 for the Sinking Fund. Senator Allison, however, had the frankness to admit, that the Sinking Fund appropriation had become obsolete, there being no bonds to which it could be applied after the close of the present fiscal year, except by the payment of a high premium. This admission established a surplus of $48,000,000, plus $15,000,000, total $63,000,000, which, Senator Beck said, was $27,000,000 less than the real surplus, as he would take an early occasion to show.

We judge that Mr. Beck is right for once, because the report of the Secretary of the Treasury says in so many words that the excess of ordinary revenue over ordinary expenditure for the past ten years has averaged $100,000,000 per year, which amount has been applied, by the Sinking Fund and by extra bond payments, to the extinguishment of the public debt. Now, the reductions of taxes have not reduced the receipts of the Treasury in any material sense in the past ten years, nor have the expenditures materially increased. The increase in pensions has about balanced the reduction of interest on the public debt up to this time, and the elasticity of the revenue has about balanced the reduction of internal-revenue taxes. The fair presumption is that the future receipts and expenditures, if legislation remains unchanged, will continue to show nearly or quite $100,000,000 of surplus. Allowance must be made for the unknown calls under the Dependent Pension Bill, if that profligate and demoralizing measure becomes a law; but, if we take into account only the present outgo of the Treasury and the present income, there is little doubt that the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, will show a surplus of about $90,000,000, after making allowance for $24,000,000 for waste upon silver bullion.

No measure for the reduction of taxes having been agreed upon, or seriously considered, since the refusal of the House to take up the Morrison bill, and the session being two-thirds gone, it seems highly probable that the adjournment of Congress will leave the Administration just where it is now, with a swelling revenue and no place to put it after the 30th of June. Even the profligate pension bill, added to an equally profligate fortification bill, would fail to meet the emergency, because these measures could not take effect under a twelvemonth. However great their powers of absorption, they would not begin soon enough. What, then, is the alternative? Secretary Manning intimates pretty plainly what he would do in such a case. He would apply the surplus revenue to the retirement of the only part of the public debt which is payable at par on demand, viz., the greenback debt. Could he do otherwise? Could any other Secretary do otherwise? We do not see what else could be done. A surplus revenue must either be hoarded or used. If there is only one way to use it, then that way is the right way and the lawful way. Who shall gainsay it? Certainly not the class of spouters who have been declaiming against Mr. Manning the past two years for locking up his money in the strong box. He could not under existing law cancel the greenbacks, but he could retire them, and leave Congress to decide affirmatively what disposition should be made of them.

The Senate has taken an unusual step in removing the mask of secrecy from the proceedings in executive session in the Matthews case, and publishing a defence of itself for refusing to confirm a certain person to a certain office. Never did the maxim Qui s'excuse s'accuse find an apter illustration. The document given to the public in this remarkable manner is extorted under duress, and in the immediate fear of some serious loss or division of the colored vote, to the harm and detriment of the Republican party. The colored press of the country has espoused the cause of Matthews. Public opinion among the colored people has been profoundly moved by the rejection of a colored man by a nearly unanimous Republican vote in the Senate. In the North this feeling has been pronounced and outspoken. It is no mean political factor in the doubtful States. In New York especially it is potent and menacing. Something must be done to explain and palliate the rejection of Matthews, the colored man, as Recorder of Deeds in the District of Columbia, if the colored vote is to be retained as a solid phalanx in the Republican column. The specific reasons assigned by the Senate for rejecting him are frivolous in the extreme. It is said that Mr. Matthews was not a resident of the District of Columbia, that he was not so distinguished a representative of the colored race as Frederick Douglas, that there is no official evidence that he is a colored man at all, and that his reappointment after having been once rejected was an act of disrespect to the Senate. It is a sufficient answer to all these objections to say that if a Republican President had done exactly what Mr. Cleveland has done in the premises, Mr. Matthews would have been confirmed without any delay or cavil. The real objection to Matthews is that he is nominated by a Democratic President, contrary to a cherished theory that all negroes are Republicans by virtue of their color.

We suppose that it was fear of the "soldier vote" which chiefly actuated a bare majority of the Senate, on Thursday, in discharging the Committee on Pensions from further consideration of the bill removing the existing limitation of time within which application for arrears of pensions may be made, so that if a man in 1887 is awarded a pension on account of a wound or disability incurred in 1861, he may draw his monthly allowance for a period covering more than a quarter of a century in a lump sum — which, for a $12 a month pension, would amount to more than $5,000. The bill now is in such shape that it may be brought up for final action at any moment, and the promoters of the scheme apparently mean to try and push it through. We are glad to note that Gen. Hawley of Connecticut voted against the measure, and we hope that this indicates a purpose on his part to fight the scheme in good earnest. More forcibly than any other Senator he could show that the self-respecting soldiers do not approve these wholesale pension grabs, and that the public man who opposes them need have no fear of offending the "soldier vote."

The vetoes of private pension bills which the President sent to the House on Saturday freshly illustrate the utter recklessness with which claims are now urged by what Gen. Bragg calls "the rubbish of the army." Cuthbert Stone was voted a pension by Congress on the ground that he had incurred a pensionable disability during his "long and faithful service" in the army. The records of the War Department, however, show that he enlisted October 25, 1861, and was reported as deserted from December 31, 1861, until November, 1864. He was mustered out with his company January 31, 1865, with no evidence of disability, and he filed no claim for pension until 1881, when he alleged that he contracted a disability in the winter of 1863, although he subsequently changed this date and alleged that the disease was contracted "while he was being carried from place to place as a prisoner, he having been tried by a court-martial in May, 1862, for desertion, and sentenced to imprisonment until the expiration of his term of enlistment." It thus appears, by his own admission, that he spent most of his term in desertion or in imprisonment for desertion, and yet a committee of Congress reported in favor of granting him a pension on account of the "long and faithful service and the high character of the claimant"! The President withholds his assent, on the ground that "the allowance of this claim would, in my opinion, be a travesty upon our whole scheme of pensions, and an insult to every decent veteran soldier."

The letter of Secretary Manning to Chairman Belmont, in reply to the request of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs for his opinion on the House and Senate retaliation bills, is a very wide-ranging discussion of the whole fishery question. Accordingly it does not seem to us to be a document appropriate to the Treasury Department, but rather to the President of the United States. For once we think that Mr. Manning has overshot the mark. The subject treated relates mainly to the legislation of a foreign Power. It is, therefore, of a diplomatic nature. It concerns the Treasury only so far as it may affect the revenue or the tonnage of the United States. The question whether fishing smacks should have the maritime character of trading vessels engaged in international commerce is hardly a fiscal question. The question whether a British law enacted in 1830 is in the nature of a treaty or compact with us, is not primarily a matter for our Treasury to deal with. We regret, therefore, that Mr. Manning should have given any direction to his reply outside of its purely fiscal bearings. We regret, also, that he should have suggested so extreme a measure as the stopping of A's trade and profits because B has had some trouble with C in a foreign country.

We are not surprised to learn that the impeachment of Secretary Manning, on account of his reply to the House resolution inquiring about the denominations of greenbacks and silver certificates issued by the Treasury Department, has been deferred until the return of Mr. Bland, who is now temporarily absent from Washington. We hope, by the way, that Mr. Bland will be able to give a satisfactory reason for being away at such a crisis. In his absence the laboring oar has fallen to the hand of Gen. Weaver of Iowa, the leader of the Greenback-Labor party, with such small assistance as he can get from Mr. Payson, a Republican member from Illinois. It is most desirable that the impeachment proceedings should be begun under Democratic auspices. It is also important that the grounds for impeachment should be stated so that common people can understand them, a task which might be beyond Gen. Weaver's powers. A careful examination of Secretary Manning's letter throws no light upon the legal basis of the proposed impeachment, although it serves to show just cause for discontent on the part of Weaver and his faction, carrying as it does the lurking suspicion that the movers of the resolution of inquiry were ignorant of divers weighty facts that had already been officially laid before them, and that if they had taken the trouble to examine these facts in the light of existing laws, they would never have asked such questions. We have spent a good deal of time studying the Secretary's letter since the anger of certain persons was aroused by it, but we can find nothing in it that can be regarded as impeachable, except the inference which a logical mind might deduce from it that certain persons are blockheads.

We called attention last summer, when the Sedgwick incident in Mexico was before the public, to the discredit brought on the United States Government by the presence in its service in the City of Mexico of the person who made himself at that time notorious in the newspapers as "Porch, Consul-General." Porch was a backwoods lawyer from Missouri, without a single qualification for his place, ignorant, illiterate, uncouth, and, as it plainly appeared, also an ass. There never was any reason for giving him an office of such importance except that Senator Cockrell had taken a fancy to him and pushed him for it. When Mr. Sedgwick arrived on the scene, Porch took to sending wild and scandalous telegrams about him, and got together a meeting of American waifs and strays at his house to denounce him. He did the same sort of thing afterwards to Mr. Manning. Mr. Bayard ought to have promptly dismissed him when he began telegraphing about Mr. Sedgwick. Why he did not has always been a mystery, but we presume it was because Senator Cockrell fought hard for his ridiculous protégé. We are glad to say that this nuisance and disgrace has at last been abated. "Porch, Consul-General," is a thing of the past. He has been "bounced." His successor, a certain Mr. More, also a Missourian, is said, as far as special knowledge goes, to be as unfit as Porch, but there can hardly be a doubt that he has more common sense and sense of decency.

It seems that the two salesmen whom Judge Bond discharged the other day from an indictment for trading in Virginia without a license after they had offered coupons in payment, were representatives of a Philadelphia and New York house. This is a fact worth noting. It looks very much as if firms in other States had no objection to paying license fees with coupons. It is not impossible, indeed, that they take a positive pleasure in thus retaliating against a State which has, time and time again, by unconstitutional laws, endeavored to discriminate in favor of home salesmen. Now, the State Attorney and Virginian authorities generally base their hopes of non-user of coupons on patriotism more than anything else; but if foreign drummers are thus going to pay license fees at fifty cents on the dollar, it will take a strong dose of patriotism for home merchants to continue to pay their merchants' licenses in gold. Flesh and blood of business men could not stand that. It is safe to say that if the bars to the Treasury are once let down, a stampede will follow. Another straw in this case is that one of the counsel who appeared for the salesmen is a gentleman who has been wont to declare, like State Attorney Ayers, that no power in government can overcome a united people; and yet he has now joined against a united people in the hopeless task of sustaining the Constitution of the United States. This theory, that a united people cannot be made amenable to laws and government, presents a good many difficulties. There are a number of historical facts seemingly irreconcilable with it, and it might be well if the State authorities of Virginia would consult with the Latter-Day Saints of Utah as to why it is that a theory so generally accepted is of such little use to either of them in their present difficulties.

Several canvasses of the New York Legislature have been made recently on the Presidential candidate question, and have all resulted in showing that Blaine is the favorite of the Republican members and Hill of the Democratic, though a large proportion of the members of both political parties are non-committal. As, by universal consent, this is one of the worst Legislatures we have had at Albany in recent years, the preference of its members is a doubtful compliment for any candidate. Here, for example, is the former Hill organ, the World, compelled to say of the very men who favor Hill as a candidate, that their action of a day or two before in voting to repeal the civil-service laws was a "gratuitous performance in butting their heads against a stone wall." We call the World a former Hill organ because just at present it appears to be in favor of Mr. Conkling as the Democratic candidate in 1888. This disposition has called out a friendly warning from the Sun, which may be called the voice of experience. The Sun, while doubting the wisdom of the plan, says: "This is all very well. We live in a free country, and one of the rights which our sires fought and bled for is the right of every newspaper to support or oppose a candidate for office as it may deem advisable." The exercise of this right by the Sun in 1884 brought to its candidate, Butler, the magnificent total of 3,499 votes in this city, and cost the editor about 45,000 subscribers, or one-third of his entire circulation.

Commissioner Woodman of the Excise Board introduced on Friday the following resolution, which was laid over for consideration:

"Resolved, That on and after February 15, 1887, no license shall be granted to open a new saloon in any Assembly district of this city, unless, and until, the number of licensed saloons in any Assembly district from which such license is applied for shall not exceed in ratio one to every five hundred inhabitants of said district: the census to be based on the registration of voters for the Mayoralty election immediately preceding the date of such application."

This is, we believe, the first attempt at official recognition of the fact that one of the duties of the Excise Commissioners is to keep the number of liquor-stores within reasonable limits. Hitherto all that the public has expected of them, and all that they, in their most respectable moods, professed to care about, was the restriction of the licenses to persons who would not or did not permit their houses to become notorious resorts for bad characters. But the public is no longer content with this. It demands that liquor-dealing, no matter how or by whom conducted, be cut down—that, in other words, liquor be made scarce and harder to get; that the presumption that selling it is a useful and harmless industry be reversed; and that licenses be granted solely on the presumption that it is an evil, even if an inevitable evil, and, therefore, is to be made as small as possible. We hope, whether the High-License Bill passes or not, to see the exercise by the present Board of all the powers they now have in the direction of reducing the appalling number of liquor-stores by which this city is now cursed. The Commissioners may rely on the fullest support from the great bulk of the population, and it will never be so strong, and hearty, and determined as when the liquor-dealers come out in force in defence of their infernal trade. Nothing is so desirable as that they should let us hear what they have to say in defence of it.

The land question seems to have dropped into a very subordinate position in Mr. Henry George's mind. He is now engaged heart and soul in demolishing the Catholic Church. His paper, the Standard, published weekly at five cents, is almost wholly given up to this great enterprise. We presume he thinks the removal of this church is an essential preliminary to the process of making the farmers surrender their farms to the Master Workman. We think he is right in this view. We would, were we in his place, get the church out of the way first, and then enlarge his paper and go for the farmers. He has a magnificent job before him, of the kind an industrious man loves.

Some of the newspapers, both religious and secular, have been trying to persuade themselves that the McGlynn affair may develop into a formidable schism in the Roman Catholic Church. This is but the latest manifestation of a curious delusion that a new Luther may be looked for almost any day. In spite of the fact that several of the most promising Luthers have turned out disappointingly—witness Father Chiniquy, Père Hyacinthe, and "Bishop" McNamara, so assiduously heralded as the coming man in this city seven years ago—many still hold to their belief that the genuine reformer will yet arise. There seems to be no way, in fact, of convincing these visionaries that their hopes are equivalent to looking for 1517 over again. What is of more account, however, is the attempt made by many of our contemporaries to show the surprising tyranny of Dr. McGlynn's ecclesiastical superiors, and to contrast it with the methods of Protestantism. It may safely be affirmed that any Protestant church would act in similar circumstances precisely as the Roman Catholic Church is doing in the case referred to—that is, it would discipline, suspend, or excommunicate any of its clergy who should persist in teaching a doctrine at variance with its standards. The fact that an offending minister's parishioners were all devotedly attached to him, and were strenuous in desiring the continuance of his services, would make no more difference with the decision of one polity than with that of the other.

A good case in point is the action of the Presbytery of Philadelphia in refusing to allow Dr. L. W. Bacon to continue as minister of the Woodland Church. Dr. Bacon was willing to assent to the doctrinal standards of the Presbyterian Church, provided he were allowed to explain in what sense his assent was meant. In private conference with him, a Committee of the Presbytery found and reported that his views were substantially orthodox, and that they were consistent with an acceptance of the Westminster Confession; but because he persisted in thinking that they were not, he was refused installation over a church earnestly desirous that he should be its pastor, on the sole ground, therefore, that he would not stultify himself as the Presbytery wished him to do. Those religious newspapers which are saying that the members of St. Stephen's Church will find it an "educating" experience thus to be deprived of the pastor of their choice, ought to see that the same thing might happen in any Protestant communion. "Ah, but it was not for heresy, only for exercising his rights as an American citizen, that Dr. McGlynn had to suffer." Archbishop Corrigan maintains, it must be remembered, and his published letters bear him out, that the offence was purely that of insubordination and heretical teaching. But granting that the Archbishop does not know or is concealing the truth, and that Henry George is correct, even then the contrast between the Protestant way and the Catholic will not appear to be marked. Surely we are not yet so far from the Presidential election of 1884 as to make it hard to call to mind the cases of Protestant ministers who suffered for refusing to vote for Mr. Blaine. Mr. Bacon of New Haven was forced to resign his pulpit for that reason alone, and the same thing happened to an Episcopal rector of Erie, Pa. In short, it needs but a little reflection to see that ecclesiastical governments, as such, cannot differ very greatly from each other; they all propose substantially the same ends, and vary only in the name and form of the machinery adopted to secure them. Looking to matters of polity alone, Steele's jesting description of the difference between the Catholic Church and the Protestant is not so wide of the truth—that the former claims to be infallible, the latter only that it never makes any mistakes.

"Society" is every day becoming burdened with a heavier load of responsibility. The men who robbed the Jersey City Post-office last week explained to the wife of the Postmaster, after they had tied her down in bed and gagged her husband, "that society had driven them to this, as some had everything and they had nothing." What a very solemn fact this is. We have heard often enough that society is responsible for the tramps who infest the country roads in the summer time, but we were really not prepared to hear that society was now driving men into robbing post-offices. The only quick and sure remedy we can suggest is to place on the pension list every man who says that dissatisfaction with the present division of property impels him to be a robber. We ought not to wait until he actually robs before we do this. We ought to take the poor fellow's word for it in advance, before his soul is stained with crime. Could there be a higher and holier use for the surplus than pensioning those who without pensions would become burglars?

The Boston correspondent of the Evening Post gives some account of the attempts which are being made in Massachusetts to deal with the problem of heating and lighting cars in railroad trains, to which the recent tragedy in Vermont has given such horrible significance. It is very disgraceful to the railroad corporations that they should have waited to be forced into improvement on this point by legislation, considering how often accidents have, of late years, been accompanied by the burning alive of human beings, in the presence of the helpless bystanders. One such horror ought to be enough to set every company in the country at work contriving means to get the stove and the kerosene lamp out of the cars. The safe and simple plan of heating by steam from the locomotive has been objected to on the ground that single cars could not be temporarily cut off from the rest of the train, or the train detached from the locomotive, without complete loss of heat. But experiments made in Massachusetts seem to establish the fact that the steam in the pipes will retain its heating power for a full hour, which is as long as it is ever needed in any train or car in the absence of the engine. The one peril which this plan does not provide for is that of being snowed up. This, in some parts of the country, might be now and then serious, but it cannot be compared to the danger of being roasted alive. People can contend against extreme cold, in the shelter of a car, with more or less success. The correspondent's account of the experiments with the electric light is also interesting and important. It is hardly possible that any railroad corporation will venture to delay any longer the attempt to banish both the stove and the lamp, which, in view of these experiments, are "twin relics of barbarism."

There are a good many reasons for believing that the war talk at Berlin is "campaign thunder," intended to affect the elections for the Reichstag, now pending. But this is not as innocuous as it seems, for of course the French will not stand a great deal of threatening, or witness unmoved a great deal even of pretence of getting ready to fight them. It will, of course, suit Boulanger's purpose very well to seem to have his hand forced, and therefore, if he be really as much bent on war as he is accused of being, the war articles in the German press and the German movements of troops must be to his liking. That either the French or German people are anxious for a fight, or see the smallest necessity for fighting, there is not the least sign. If, in fact, the war breaks out, the cause of it will be a secret locked up in the breasts of the high strategists, and it will be as great a discredit to our civilization as any of Louis Fourteenth's. The whole affair illustrates the difficulty of carrying on a parliamentary government based on universal suffrage, while maintaining a large standing army and cultivating the military spirit among the people. If you have a large standing army, you cannot introduce foreign politics into the canvasses before election without running the risk of setting the world in a blaze. Every wild expression of a stump orator or roaring editor sends a shrill of martial ardor through millions of breasts. Here, on the contrary, having neither army nor navy, our orators can hurl defiance to the four corners of the globe without quickening a single pulse.

The revised version of the story of the Italian troubles in Africa is, that the fight in which the Italian troops were worsted was with the Abyssinians and not with the Sudanese after all, which makes the situation more serious, as the Abyssinians are at closer quarters and have a better base of operation than the Arabs. What the use is of Massowah to Italy, does not appear to have been brought out in the debates in Parliament over the despatch of reinforcements.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, to TUESDAY, February 8, 1887, inclusive.

DOMESTIC.

THE Dependent Pension Bill did not reach the President until Monday night, January 31, and he will have until Friday, February 11, to determine upon his course with respect to it. The Cabinet are earnestly opposed to the measure. Secretary Manning and Assistant-Secretary Fairchild think it is the worst bill that was ever sent to the President. They regard it as extremely dangerous. The President has received private appeals from prominent persons urging him to veto the bill.

The President signed the Electoral Count and Inter-State Commerce bills on Friday. He has not yet selected the five Commissioners under the latter bill.

President Cleveland on Monday nominated E. C. More of Missouri to be Consul-General of Mexico. This is the place held by the officious J. W. Porch.

On Saturday the President sent to the House seven vetoed private pension bills.

The House on Wednesday, by a vote of 115 to 136 (not the necessary two-thirds), refused to overrule the President's veto of the bill granting a pension to Carter W. Tiller. Twenty Democrats voted with 116 Republicans against the President's course.

The House Committee on Invalid Pensions has reported adversely on the Senate bills granting pensions to Mrs Logan and Mrs. Blair, and favorably on the bill to pension Walt Whitman at the rate of $25 per month.

On Thursday the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation Bill was reported to the House. The bill makes a total appropriation of $20,286,910, which is less than the appropriation for the current year by $418,545. The estimates aggregated $21,173,000. The number of surveyors-general, which is now fifteen, is reduced by the bill to eleven, and it is provided that on and after July 1, 1888, the office of Surveyor-General shall be abolished, and the records of the offices turned over to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who is charged with the performance of all the duties now performed by the surveyors-general, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. A clause provides that the appropriations for the Civil-Service Commission shall not be available while any rule of that Commission declares persons over forty-five years of age to be ineligible for appointment. The Committee also reduces the appropriation for travelling expenses of the Commission one-half.

In reporting favorably on Tuesday Mr. W. R. Cox's bill to increase the salaries of the Civil-Service Commissioners from $3,500 to $5,000, the House Committee on Civil-Service Reform says that when the act was passed it was regarded as merely tentative, and it was believed that the Commissioners' duties would be comparatively light. Civil-service reform has become, however, one of the fixed institutions of this country. The report continues: "All now agree that 'public office is a public trust,' and should be bestowed and exercised for the public good and not for private ends. Every intelligent man admits that the civil service depends upon the qualifications of the officer for the position he fills, and not the mere political opinions he may entertain. It is not intended to interfere with or destroy parties, all of which are believed to be essential to the faithful and honest administration of the Government. A public servant should be held to a faithful discharge of his public duty, and not held as a henchman to do dirty work. No reformer will dispense with political parties nor with their efficient organization for all legitimate purposes. It is a false assumption to claim that they have no higher aim or object than the mere fruits of office. The British civil service has been freed from partisan control, and yet no more bitter, active, or unrelenting political contest has been witnessed in that kingdom than was seen in their last election. That the public service has been purified and elevated by the efforts of the Civil-Service Commissioners, aided and sustained by the President, cannot be successfully denied. That the clerical service is hereby rendered more and more efficient is universally believed to be true. The Civil-Service Law is the great breakwater of many politicians, who employ it as an excuse for failure to secure positions for friends, and sometimes unjustly attack the law and those who execute it. As this reform has come to stay, it is highly important that the best talent should be placed at the command of the President in order to secure the services of such men as are willing to fill the office for a reasonable compensation, and not accept the position merely through the hope of filling it temporarily as a stepping stone to future preferment."

The Naval Committee of the House on Friday accepted without amendment the bill prepared by the sub committee appropriating $2,450,000 to begin the construction of the new cruisers, four gun-boats, and one torpedo boat for the navy.

The Senate on Wednesday passed, by 34 to 15, the House bill appropriating $10,000 (to be immediately available) for special distribution of seeds in the drought-stricken section of Texas by the Agricultural Department.

In the Senate on Thursday the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. Plumb (Rep., Kan.), calling on the Secretary of the Interior for information as to whether there is any rule of the Pension Office whereby any applicant for pension is denied a hearing by reason of being also a petitioner to Congress, was taken up. The discussion turned somewhat on the question of civil-service reform. On that point Mr. Saulsbury (Dem., Del.) said, that while he would not convert President Cleveland into a public butcher, decapitating every office-holder hostile to him, he would instruct him that it was a duty which he owed to himself, his Administration, the party which elected him, and the country which he served, to purge the departments of the men hostile to his Administration, and unless he did so he would not have a successful Administration.

The Senate passed on Friday, with only one nay, the bill reported from the Finance Committee to refund to the States and Territories the $20,000,000 collected from them under the Direct Tax Act of 1861. The Senate also disposed of the Beck bill in regard to members acting as railroad attorneys. The original Beck resolution was rejected—17 yeas to 36 nays—and the bill was then passed, 39 to 14, in the following shape: "That it shall be unlawful for any member of either house of Congress to accept employment as attorney-at-law, or payment of services of any kind; in opposition to the United States, in any case to which the United States may be a party, or in which its interests may be concerned, or from any railroad company, if such member shall have reasonable cause to believe that measures specially affecting the interests of such company are pending before Congress, or are about to be so pending during his term of office. Any person who violates the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $500, or by both, in the discretion of the court." The nays were (Dems. in italics): Call, Cameron, Farwell, Gray, Hampton, McMillan, Mahone, Mitchell of Oregon, Payne, Pugh, Ransom, Sawyer, Stanford, and Teller.

The Senate on Monday, without division, passed the bill "to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern army ordnance, armor, and other army purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern army warfare," and the bill "to encourage the manufacture of steel for modern naval ordnance, armor, shafting, and other naval purposes, and to provide heavy ordnance adapted to modern naval warfare." These bills appropriate more than $21,000,000.

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary have changed the House joint resolution for an investigation of the Pacific Railroad accounts to the form of a bill. It provides for a sweeping investigation, during the progress of which the Funding Bill will not be pressed. It also provides for the protection of the interests of the Government by authorizing the President to redeem any of the first mortgage liens; and provides that, in future, 40 instead of 25 per cent. shall be paid to the Government. Mr. Hoar (Rep., Mass) reported the bill on Friday morning, and asked for immediate consideration. Mr. Hale (Rep., Me.) objected to the immediate consideration of the bill, and it therefore went to the calendar—Mr. Hoar giving notice that he would call it up at the first opportunity.

Secretary Manning has sent to Mr. Belmont, Chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, a carefully prepared reply to the request of that Committee for his views with regard to the House and Senate retaliation bills, and for any suggestions he may desire to make. The Secretary proposes a bill giving the President power "to close, by a proclamation to that effect, all the ports of the United States against any and every vessel owned wholly or in part by a subject of her Britannic Majesty, and coming or arriving from any port or place in the Dominion of Canada or in the Island of Newfoundland, whether directly or having touched at any other port, excepting such vessel shall be in distress of navigation and of needed repairs or supplies therefor; and every vessel thus excluded from the ports of the United States that shall enter or attempt to enter the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and all the cargo on board, be seized and forfeited to the United States, or the value thereof, to be recovered of the person or persons making or attempting to make entry." Also, power to forbid the importation of merchandise from Canada.

Treasurer Jordan admitted on Friday that Secretary Manning is to be the President and he (Jordan) is to be the Vice-President of the Western National Bank of the city of New York. The resignations of both officials are in the hands of the President, and will be accepted in due time.

A suit was begun in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia on Thursday to test the constitutionality of the Civil-Service Law.

In the joint ballot for United States Senator in the Indiana Legislature on Wednesday, Robinson, the Greenback-Labor man, voted for David Turpie (Dem.), giving him seventy-six votes, and he was declared elected. Harrison received seventy-four votes. The Republicans propose to make a contest. Mr. Turpie is a native of Ohio, but has spent the most of his life in Indiana. He has been twice elected to the Legislature, and has been Speaker of the House, Judge of the Common Pleas and Circuit Courts of the State, and filled fifty days of the time of J. D. Bright as United States Senator when the latter was expelled in 1863. Last year he was appointed United States Attorney for Indiana by President Cleveland.

The Supreme Court of Wyoming Territory on Thursday decided that the bill granting suffrage to women is unconstitutional. Women have been voting in the Territory since the act was passed by the Legislature of 1885.

In the New York Assembly on Wednesday the Judiciary Committee reported against the Kenny bill to repeal all the State civil-service laws. Mr. Kenny moved to disagree with the report and send the bill on its way to the Committee of the Whole. All the Democrats who voted, with the exception of Fitch of Green, Reeves of Suffolk, and Sheehan of Erie, voted against the adverse report, and therefore in favor of repealing the civil-service laws. The Republicans, including the Speaker, who usually refrains from voting, sustained the adverse report and the civil-service laws, the report being approved by a vote of 67 to 30. The Republicans are jubilant, claiming that the vote sustains their charge that Democratic support of civil-service reform has been a deception.

One of the most terrible railroad accidents in the history of this country occurred on the Vermont Central Railroad, not far from White River Junction, on Saturday morning about 2:15 o'clock. The Montreal express left the track on a bridge sixty feet above the river. Two sleepers and two ordinary passenger cars were hurled into the frozen river. Thirty-four are known to be dead, and of these fifteen have been identified, two are missing, and there are thirty-six injured. It is believed that the breaking of an axle of the rear car caused the accident

FOREIGN.

The war scare continued on Thursday. London and Paris markets were depressed almost to a panic. The Russian Government issued an order forbidding the exportation of horses.

The Berlin North German Gazette semi-officially said on Thursday, that the panics on the Paris Bourse were due more to local causes and an excess of speculation than to external influences. This is interpreted as an attempt to relieve the German press from the appearance of giving provocation and exciting alarm.

All European markets were stronger on Friday. A despatch from Berlin asserted that Prince Bismarck had assured the Ambassador of a friendly Power that Germany would on no account attack France.

It was credibly reported in London that M. Herbette, the French Ambassador at Berlin, and Count Herbert Bismarck met on Friday and exchanged peaceful assurances. M. Herbette, it is said, asserted that there would be no movements of French troops without the consent of the Council of State, while Count Herbert stated that the 72,000 reserves would return to their homes as soon as they had been drilled; that 20,000 more would be called out, drilled, and sent back to their homes, and that then there would be no more levies.

The European markets continued stronger on Saturday, and on Monday, but on Tuesday closed rather flat, owing to unfavorable news from Berlin.

The Vienna correspondent of a London paper asserts that the German Bundesrath has actually discussed the proposal for a loan of 300,000,000 marks, and says that the fact that the proposal was not submitted to the Landtag shows that the situation has improved.

The main subject of discussion in political circles at Berlin on Saturday was the publication of the much-talked-of manifesto of the Pope in favor of Bismarck's demands from the Reichstag. It appeared in the form of a despatch from Cardinal Jacobini to the Pope's Nuncio at Munich. It is considered in Berlin by members of the Liberal and Centre parties as not likely to benefit the Government much, because, in the first place, it conveys only a desire, and not a command, of the Pope; and, secondly, because the so-called Church question is an issue between Prussia and the Pope, with which the German Empire as such has nothing whatever to do. It is even confidently expected by the Opposition that this direct interference by the Pope in domestic politics will react strongly against the Government.

Dr. Windthorst, the leader of the Centre (Catholic) party in the German Reichstag, in a political address delivered in Cologne on Sunday, took an attitude of opposition to the Pope's recently expressed wish that the Centre party adopt a policy of conciliation on the Septennate Bill in order to enable the Pope to meet the views of Prince Bismarck, and secure improvement in the position of the Papacy. Dr. Windthorst said that the Pope's advocacy of the Septennate Bill was independent of the merits of the measure, and arose from reasons of expediency and from political considerations. If it had been possible to comply with the wishes of his Holiness, Dr. Windthorst said, the Centre party would have done so, but nobody could accomplish the impossible. The Pope would not be displeased with his faithful sons in Germany for their refusal to comply with his political wishes, when he had closely examined into the reasons which impelled them.

The tone of Lord Hartington's Unionist manifesto, delivered on Wednesday night at Newcastle, was not, despite a certain doggedness, calculated to spread much enthusiasm among his followers. "I hoped," he said, "when we went into this struggle that we all counted the cost. If not, I hope we shall count the cost now; for unless we are prepared to maintain our position and continue our sacrifice to carry through our policy to the end, I, for one, say it would be better that we should retire at once than needlessly and fruitlessly to prolong a struggle which we have not the courage and resolution to carry to the end." He hinted to Mr. Chamberlain that the latter was going too fast, and declared his own intention to drop ordinary party questions while the Irish question was unsettled. The first duty of the Government, he said, was to suppress anarchy and contempt of law. Conferring powers upon extended municipalities of the United Kingdom, and emigration and migration, were the only definite measures of relief he suggested.

In the House of Commons on Friday Mr. Cremer, Radical, moved an amendment to the address in reply to the Queen's speech, demanding an immediate recall of all the British forces in Egypt. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Radical, in seconding the motion, said: "We have raised the funded debt of Egypt from £90,000,000 to £100,000,000, slaughtered many thousands of the natives, crippled the National Chamber, bombarded the principal city of the country under circumstances of the greatest horror, increased taxation, promoted horrible debauchery in the capital, sown dissensions between the Khedive and the people, and crushed out the first little sparks of independence that had been seen in Eastern nations for ages past." W. H. Smith defended the Government's policy. He said the evacuation of Egypt by England would throw that country into a state of anarchy. Mr. Cremer's amendment was rejected by a vote of 263 to 97.

In the House of Commons on Monday night, after moving his amendment, Mr. Parnell made an impressive speech. It is generally admitted that he succeeded in convicting the Government of flagrant inconsistency in the conduct of Gen. Sir Redvers Buller and Judge Curran, who brought pressure to bear on the landlords while prosecuting the Nationalists' own more successful method of the "plan of campaign." "Dynamite," said Mr. Parnell excitedly, shaking his hand over the heads of his followers at the Government bench, "was repeatedly exploding in the crowded streets of your city. Your public buildings were also threatened. Attempts were made to destroy them. Even in this House, Ministers were not safe from violent attacks and attempts at assassination. After all these terrible events, after all this loss of life, some upon the scaffold and many more victims of the wild justice of revenge, after all this peril to your citizens pursuing their lawful occupations in the streets, after all this danger to your most distinguished Ministers, what was the result? The Tory Government came into office and abandoned coercion." This was the most successful point of the speech, and was received by the Liberals and Parnellites with prolonged cheers. Mr. Gladstone promises to support the Parnell amendment

The Parnellites will oppose in Parliament all projects relative to the liquor traffic in Ireland, on the ground that the question should be reserved for an Irish Parliament.

Mr. Chamberlain, in an interview on Monday with delegates from the Scotch crofters, offered, in the event of the Scotch members approving his taking the lead of the party, to introduce a crofter bill in Parliament. The Gladstonian Radicals, jealous of Chamberlain's interference, oppose his assumption of the lead of the Scotch Radicals. Mr. Morley declares in favor of Chamberlain, on the ground that his advocacy of the crofters' cause is a step towards complete reunion of the Liberal party. The Parnellites are incensed. The Scotch members will hold a formal conference before deciding the leadership question.

Lord Randolph Churchill has gone to Algiers with a view to restoring his health. He expects to be absent a month.

The Earl of Dunraven, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, has resigned. This is not of much importance except as one more shot fired at the Tory Government in a critical time.

Peter Rylands (Liberal-Unionist), Member of Parliament for Burnley, is dead. He was born in 1820.

Twenty moonlighters raided the farmhouses near Mill Street, County Cork, on Friday, and seized a number of guns, discharging the weapons to intimidate the farmers. They also sheared the hair off the heads of four girls who had disobeyed the League's order not to speak to policemen.

The determined action of the British Government, in dispensing with the services of the Cunard and White Star Companies unless they would consent to terms having no savor of monopoly about them, has now produced its fruits in the alacrity with which the chief companies have coöperated with the Post-office in devising the new service. In future the White Star Line will take the mails Wednesdays, the Cunard Line Saturdays, the North German Lloyd Thursdays, and the Inman Line for those who wish on Tuesdays. Thus the mail for New York will leave on four days in the week, and the advantages of the Queenstown and Southampton routes will be equally secured.

Henry M. Stanley embarked from Suez on Sunday on the steamer Navarino for Zanzibar direct.

The Egyptian Government has raised the blockade of the Sudan, and commerce with that region has been reopened.

There was a sensation in the Italian Chamber of Deputies on February 1, when Premier Depretis announced that three companies of the Italian troops, engaged in the occupation of the region around Massowah, Africa, had been almost annihilated in a fight on January 25 and 26, near Saati. They were attacked by the Abyssinians. The Chamber at once passed a bill appropriating $1,000,000 to send reinforcements to Massowah.

The République Française on Thursday published a despatch from Suez which said that the Abyssinians captured all the guns of the Italians; that of the 480 Italians in the fights not more than 50 escaped, and that the Italians have evacuated all their advanced positions, and the Abyssinians have carried the first line of the Italian entrenchments around Massowah.

Prime Minister Depretis of Italy announced to the Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday afternoon that the entire Cabinet had resigned. This was owing to the storm raised by the Massowah massacre of Italian troops, and by the doubtful position of the Cabinet in Parliament. It is believed that M. Depretis will be asked to form a new Ministry. Count di Robilant, Foreign Minister, absolutely refuses to enter it. This is considered a bad augury for the preservation of the peace of Europe.

"THE LABOR PROBLEM."

SOME weeks ago we invited our reforming friends who were interested in the labor problem, to give us some account of the legislation which, in their opinion, would solve it. We were accordingly soon deluged with lists of bills which would put an end to the workingman's discontent. Several of our correspondents relied mainly on a lowering of the tariff, which they said was the workingman's worst grievance. Others recommended bills to shorten the hours of labor, bills to abolish the labor of minors, bills to establish Government savings banks, bills to make employers liable for injuries sustained by employees in the performance of their duty, bills to improve tenement-houses and factories, bills to supply free music, bills to establish free libraries and reading-rooms, bills to make arbitration compulsory in labor disputes, bills to increase the number of holidays, and so on. None of these suggestions, however, so far as we could make out, came from real manual laborers, or, in other words, from the persons who make the labor problem and keep it going, and whose discontent furnishes the text for most of the sermons and articles about labor. They came from amateurs—that is, from people whose minds play round the labor problem, and are frightened by it, and think that if the people who do not work with their hands do not provide a solution speedily, something dreadful will happen—something in the nature of a social cataclysm or earthquake—which will knock our civilization into ruins.

We paid very little attention to these suggestions, because we knew very well that they did not contain or even touch the labor problem as Labor understands it, and that every one of the proposed bills might be passed, not only without diminishing the prevailing discontent of the manual laborers, but without preventing its rapid increase. We had not very long to wait for a confirmation of this view of them. On Saturday last, Labor's head man in this city—that is, the Master Workman of District Assembly 49, who has been directing the strikes—went before the Assembly Committee now sitting here, and described the labor problem as Labor sees it. When asked to explain strikes against employers of whom there was nothing to complain, he said these suspensions of industry were simply intended to "enlighten the public as to the wrongs of the strikers, and bring the pressure of public opinion to bear on the employers," and were not really strikes against individuals, but "against a general system." Being asked how such "a movement was brought about, and who could declare it off," he said it could only be declared off by "the yielding of the companies." Being asked for a more general and radical solution of the labor difficulty, he said—

> "That he believed the Government ought to own all factories, and, ultimately, all great stores for the sale of merchandise; when that time came the farmer would no longer own his land; all land, all property of every kind, would be owned by the Government for the common good and common use.
>
> "Mr. Russell — In other words, the Henry George theory.
>
> "Witness — The Henry George theory improved.
>
> "Mr. Quinn then said, in reply to Mr. Hogeboom, that he believed wealth would be more equitably distributed under the system of Government ownership which he advocated, and that therefore the present friction between labor and capital would disappear."

Now, it makes no difference whether Quinn is simply an ignorant man, or a visionary man, or a knavish man. The important fact for our purpose is, that he is the official head of the organized Labor in this city, and sets on foot and directs such attacks on property and order as the strikes either are from the beginning or speedily become. Consequently, his notion about the labor problem is probably that of the great body of his followers and confederates. In other words, he represents the people whom so many politicians, and ministers, and philanthropists are trying to appease, some by silly and hypocritical talk and legislation, and some by predictions of great calamities in case Labor is not satisfied. We here see that what the Quinns have in their minds when they strike is simply the transformation of American society into a huge labor union, in which the Master Workman and the Walking Delegate would have the key of the general storehouse, and the distribution of the food and clothing, and the assignment of our daily tasks.

Of course we have not so low an opinion of American intelligence as to discuss this man's sociology or political economy seriously. We take it up simply to point out the folly of supposing that the men who are engaged in keeping the labor agitation on foot in this country, will be appeased or silenced by the little palliatives in the way of sanitary legislation which our reformers suggest, or the little bits of quackery with which our political demagogues seek to cajole them. They have a large, passionate, very ignorant, and, through their ignorance, very discontented and uncomfortable constituency, mostly of foreign birth and training. These have in one way or another been persuaded that only manual laborers create anything or do any work, and that everything which sustains human existence and makes it commodious or graceful belongs to them of right; that all who think, or plan, or calculate, or direct, or record, or invent, or discover are mere useless excrescences. They care nothing for political freedom, and, in so far as they can, themselves live under a despotism. They are a small minority of the population, but, by rigid organization and by their power of causing great temporary inconvenience, they deeply impress the imagination of politicians, ministers, philanthropists, and sociological speculators and professors, and cause displays of gross cowardice among business men, whose operations they for brief periods check or interfere with. They have, in fact, succeeded in producing a state of things in some of our cities very like that which was produced at the North before the war by the vigor and audacity of the slaveholders. The slaveholders filled our pulpits and counting-houses with "doughfaces," or "Northern men with Southern principles," who were ready to say anything, believe anything, or submit to anything which would prevent "the South" from getting angry, or make it stay in the Union. But "Labor," like the South, is made only the more turbulent and unreasonable by seeing the fear it inspires and the concessions it can exact.

The duty of intelligent Americans is, however, in no way changed by the follies, or exactions, or delusions of strikers. Good citizens are bound, under all circumstances, and no matter at what sacrifice of comfort, to see that their Government and civilization suffer no damage; that the precious union of liberty and order which has come down to them from former generations as a sacred trust is delivered to posterity without either "shortage" or conversion. It ought not to make any difference to them whether it is assailed by ignorance at home or force from abroad. Their business is to protect it against assaults of every kind from every quarter, and to let it be known from the first minute that they will protect it to the last extremity.

ARBITRATION.

THE Chamber of Commerce last week discussed the pending strikes, but without any better result than a reference of the whole subject to the Executive Committee, with power to call a public meeting or take such action as might seem best. The discussion which preceded this rather lame conclusion was marked by the vagueness which characterizes the utterances of nearly everybody who opens his mouth about the labor question. Mr. Henry wanted prompt arbitration, by the Chamber of Commerce, forgetting that there can be no arbitration unless the parties to the dispute not only agree to submit to arbitration, but agree on the questions on which the arbitrator is to pass. A great many people propose arbitration in all these troubles, as if it was a remedy which could be applied by the first bystander, like brown paper and vinegar, without the assistance or consent of the belligerents. Another proposal was made by Mr. James H. Seymour as a substitute for Mr. Henry's plan, which had really a touch of humor in it. He wanted a public meeting of merchants and manufacturers to discuss the situation, and offered Steinway Hall free of charge for this purpose. When one considers the kind of discussion of any subject which takes place at a public meeting, and remembers how much talk in "halls" has been already expended on the relations of capital and labor, one can hardly read this without a smile.

What makes such talk as this on the part of business men all the more extraordinary is, that the nature and origin of the strikes here and in Jersey City are probably understood more clearly and widely than any other subject of the day. There is probably hardly a man in the community who does not know more about them than he knows about any other matter except his private and personal affairs. The pretence in which so many orators and writers indulge, that there is something mysterious and incomprehensible about the strikes, and that what is needed is investigation and discussion, is really, at this time of day, somewhat lamentable. It would, for instance, be a waste of time to occupy a hall and use a large quantity of gas in examining the causes of the strike on the coal wharves in New Jersey, when we all know that it was begun by a dispute about wages. On this the men of the Philadelphia and Reading line struck, and the men of the other companies struck in sympathy with them. Now, does any business man in this city deny the right of any employer to offer lower wages if he thinks best? Does anybody deny the right of the employee to refuse the offer and leave his service? Does any business man maintain that an employer ought to be compelled to pay higher wages than he thinks his business will allow, or that an employee ought to be compelled to accept lower wages than he thinks his services are worth? None that we have ever heard of. Would the public meeting in Steinway Hall propose a legal rate of wages to be fixed by some public officers, like the members of the Board of Arbitration? We presume not. Every member of the Chamber of Commerce knows that this would be an impracticable and indeed silly proposal, even if it were not unconstitutional.

What makes the matter still more unfit for public discussion is, that it does not appear that the business of the coal companies would suffer in any way from their course about wages, were it not for the violence of the strikers. It is not the conduct of the companies in lowering or refusing to advance wages which is causing the scarcity of coal in this city. Every member of the Chamber of Commerce knows this well. It is the violence and intimidation practised by the strikers towards the men who seek to take their places on the coal wharves. Nobody disputes the right of the strikers to strike, and to persuade other men in the same calling to strike along with them. Every man has the right to strike; and it is his duty to strike if he thinks his interests will be served by so doing, and to make combinations for striking purposes. It is not these things which the companies are resisting, or which are causing the disturbances from which the trade and industry of the city are suffering. It is the assertion by the strikers of the right to remain in their places on their own terms—that is, the right to be employed at wages fixed by themselves by persons who do not wish for their services on any terms. They not only assert this right, but they assert it by force of arms—that is, by hanging about the premises of their former employers, and attacking or menacing with sticks, and stones, and firearms other workingmen who do not agree with them about wages and do not belong to their combination. Were these attacks and threats abandoned, there would be no labor trouble in this city to-day, no scarcity of coal, and no shutting down of factories, and no need of any meeting in Steinway Hall, except a meeting to encourage the police in defending property and order, and to proclaim anew the right of every American citizen to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. As long as business men, clergymen, professors, and politicians persist in not seeing this aspect of the case, and in making believe that the whole laboring population is engaged in these strikes and riots, when, as everybody knows, it is a minority which carries them on, and it is greedy and worthless adventurers, in nine cases out of ten, who get them up, they will continue to cause grave social perturbation and disorder.

We have for the sake of simplicity assumed in these remarks that all the labor disputes now pending are disputes between employers and persons who have actually been in their employment, about matters arising in the conduct of their common business. All that we have said would of course have been greatly strengthened by a review of the complications the Knights of Labor have introduced into these quarrels by making men employed in one shop, factory, or wharf, who have no grievance at all, strike in aid of other strikers in other shops, factories, or wharves, with whom they have not perhaps a single interest in common. This programme, if successful, would make each employer responsible for the doings or troubles of every other employer in the country, or, in other words, add enormously to those risks of his business—already numerous enough—over which he has not and cannot have any control. Will any member of the Chamber of Commerce say that business could, in this or any other city, be carried on profitably and safely under such a system controlled by men like the "Master Workmen" and "Walking Delegates"? Why, if submitted to, its effects would be very like those of an arrangement for having the city visited at uncertain intervals by two or three Western tornadoes every year. It cannot be submitted to. It must be resisted and overthrown, at whatever present cost. Of course resistance to it causes loss, just as resistance to invasion or riot causes loss; but the cost of resistance will not be one-hundredth part of the cost of submission.

VIRGINIA COUPON-KILLING.

A NEW coupon case which has just been decided in favor of Virginia by its Supreme Court of Appeals, is, of course, magnified by the repudiators into a great victory, although, in fact, it is much more like one of those successful skirmishes which sometimes brighten, to an inordinate degree, the spirits of an army in full retreat. Among the cases of 1885, decided unanimously by the Supreme Court of the United States against the pretensions of the State; was one to the effect that a fee for a business license was a tax, that a tender of coupons in payment of the fee would allow the party to proceed in his business as if he had paid money, and that a punishment by fine was unconstitutional and could not be imposed. To creep around this decision the Assembly passed a law March 4, 1886, that all coupons offered in payment of business licenses must be verified by a jury, and made it an indictable offence to do business without a license.

It is this law which the Virginia Court of Appeals has sustained, and which Judge Bond has just pronounced unconstitutional, and it therefore becomes necessary to consider the decisions in two aspects, first, whether, if the law be sustained by the United States Supreme Court, it will effect its purpose, and, second, whether it is likely to be sustained. It will be noticed that the law is a return to the miserable chicanery of the Riddleberger law of January 14, 1882. The State, in other words, has given up the fight on total repudiation, and has once more fallen under the proud banner of its present Senator. Experience showed that the Riddleberger law was such an ineffective "coupon-killer" that law after law was passed to do the work it failed to do. The truth of the matter is, that although the Riddleberger law does lessen the value of the coupons, it does not benefit the State. Coupons under it are not as valuable as money for paying taxes, because the person who uses them must go through intricate legal proceedings. But ultimately they come to the State at their full face value. Thus both sides lose, the loss accruing partially to the bondholders, who sell the coupons at a low rate, and partially to the State, who must pay lawyers for conducting the suit. Such will be the barren results of the law, if the decision of the State court upholding it be sustained, but it is hard to see how it can be sustained. The State judges evidently suppose that the pretension on the part of the State that the coupons are counterfeit, gives it a right both to require a deposit of money and to compel the taxpayer to await the finding of the jury. This leaves out of sight the common principles of tender. A owes B money. A tenders payment. B avers the money to be counterfeit. Can B force A to give him other money if A chooses to take the risk of its being counterfeit? Is there any magic in calling out fraud and counterfeit? On the contrary, if B believes the money offered to be counterfeit, let him refuse it, proceed against A by suit, and if A pleads tender and produces the money, then the jury can decide upon its genuineness. Or let B accept the money and sue A, and, when A pleads payment, show that the so-called payment was no payment because the money was counterfeit. Judge Bond says flatly that the coupons are as much legal tender as the greenback.

Meanwhile, the Virginia newspapers which advocate repudiation will probably continue to rejoice. But besides the fact that they have been driven back to the principles of the Riddleberger Act, which is ineffective to prevent coupons from flowing into the Treasury, and besides the fact that in all probability the Supreme Court will hold that the taxpayers need not pursue that act if they choose to rest on tender, there are indications in the realm outside of courts that the party of repudiation is losing its grasp. One of the leaders of the Democratic party has come out for compromise, not because of a change of heart, but upon the express ground that the attempts to repudiate are a failure. He accuses the wicked Republicans of using the coupons with the malevolent purpose of bringing the Democratic party into disgrace. He calls attention to the fact that the enemies of the "resistless Democratic party" made last fall a clear gain of five members of Congress, and that three papers of the State, championing the same "resistless party," are openly fighting the Riddleberger law. He says that the county treasurers have disobeyed the plain behests of the State law and received that "cut-worm" of the treasury, the coupon, and reminds the politicians that a cause once believed in by the whole people was, after four long years of struggle, utterly lost.

The Virginian of Lynchburg implores him to desist from such ill-timed remarks, and, imitating the protectionist fling that revenue reformers are recipients of British gold, says that one of the three papers mentioned is, "according to common report," in the interest of English bondholders. The Virginian further expresses astonishment that a tried leader of the Democratic party should act except in concert with the leading and directing minds of his party, and a few days later takes occasion to publish what it calls a sterling letter from the State Attorney-General, who says that he regards the situation as much more favorable to the State than at any time during the past year. It is not difficult to disbelieve so partial a witness, and the facts he cites to sustain his opinion may be demurred to. He says that the Virginia juries have refused to give punitive damages against the State officers who have proceeded to distrain for taxes in spite of tender of coupons. But as it seems that the taxpayer has his money refunded finally even if he does not get damages, it is clear that if coupons can be bought at a sufficiently low price, it will pay to use them without hope of damages; and when they get to the State, it should never be forgotten, they are paid in at their full face value, so that the State makes nothing, but only has the pleasure of gouging the bondholders. That these suits will continue upon this basis there can be little doubt. In the first place, they have continued; then it is not in human nature to refuse to make money legally because others cry traitor; and, last of all, the Attorney-General's perfervid appeal to taxpayers not to use coupons must call to mind Bob Acres's excited asseveration, "We will not run."

RHODE ISLAND POLITICS.

THE Constitution of Rhode Island differs from that of every other State in the Union in that it provides for a discriminating qualification against American citizens who happen to be of foreign birth. That qualification consists of an ownership of real estate. The Constitution further provides for the payment of a registry tax as a prerequisite to the exercise of the suffrage by any voter who does not pay a tax on personal property. The peculiar legislation upon the statute-books under the latter clause has produced a state of things by which, for many years past, the political control of the State has been in the hands of a plutocracy, which has been annually in the habit of selling the Governorship and the United States Senatorships to those men who have had the means and the willingness to pay the whole of the registry tax due from Republican voters; the remarkable fact being that the registry voter has always, for some reason, deemed himself under an obligation to vote according to the instructions of that person who has paid his tax for him. Possibly the local bosses have seen to it that none but servile voters were duly qualified, or at any rate have seen to it that all persons upon whose votes they could surely rely were duly registered and their taxes paid.

This condition of things has been well known. It culminated two years ago in the nomination of a man whose sole qualification for Governor is that of great wealth, for up to that time he had never held any office in Rhode Island, had not been specially identified with any of its interests, owned no property in it but that which he occupied as a residence in summer, and was not, in fact, in any proper sense a Rhode Islander. Such a selection obviously would not have been made had it not been for the fact that the persons whose purses were available for the purchase of the Republican registry vote, who were actual Rhode Islanders, had been exhausted. At that juncture it happened that no Rhode Island citizen able to afford the necessary sum of money wanted the place, and so it was sold to Mr. G. P. Wetmore of New York, who became Governor of the State in the spring of 1885. The same operation was performed with this gentleman in 1886, and, coincidently with his second election, there was also elected a General Assembly the like of which for corruption and for misconduct of every description has not been seen or known in the State.

On the same day on which the members of this body were elected, the advocates of constitutional prohibition succeeded in capturing the State for an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. It is quite fair to say that the popular vote in favor of this amendment would not have been secured but for the general feeling that no honest effort had ever been made, in any part of the State, to enforce the laws regulating the sales of liquor which had been previously on the statute-books. The vote was a mere expression of popular discontent with the enforcement of those laws, and the General Assembly thus elected thereupon proceeded to make all the use it possibly could of this fundamental change in the law for its own profit and that of its fellows. It adopted legislation ostensibly for the enforcement of the prohibitory amendment, and by that legislation established the office of Chief Constable to enforce the law. It also organized a large number of district courts throughout the State, the ostensible object of which was to administer the prohibitory law, and thereupon proceeded to fill all the offices thus created either with members of its own body or with persons in active sympathy and coöperation with it. Chas. R. Brayton, who had been Postmaster of the city of Providence and compelled to resign in consequence of serious defalcations in his money accounts with the Government, amounting to some $30,000, and who had been for many years the most corrupt and notorious Republican boss in the State, manipulating the bosses of both parties at will in the Republican interest, was elected to the office of Chief Constable, with a salary of $3,000 a year and all his travelling expenses paid.

Members of the General Assembly were elected by that body to fill almost all the offices of judges and clerks of the district courts, at salaries which, in this small State, are considered very large. There is nothing in the Constitution of Rhode Island which prevents the members of the General Assembly from holding another State office, and therefore these men still continue as members of the General Assembly. This transaction is what has been known as the "Newport May Deal," and it produced an emphatic and weighty protest from a very large wing of the Republican party (by which we mean that portion of it which remained loyal after the nomination of Mr. Blaine), including the Providence Journal and other influential Republican newspapers. This wing of the party has continued ever since to wage war upon all those persons who were concerned in the deal, and we think it may be safely assumed that there is but little probability that any amalgamation between the two wings can be effected.

In the meantime the Democrats of the State, combining with another party known as the "Equal Rights" party, formed for the purpose of securing such changes in the Constitution of the State as will place all American citizens on the same footing, without discrimination, and abolish the corruption arising from the manipulation of the registry taxpayers, as above described, has consolidated itself for a grand effort to secure control of the State. Not since 1842 has the party in opposition to Republican rule been so well organized. Its preliminary efforts for the coming spring canvass, in the way of registering its voters and in assisting in the paying up of their registry taxes, have been greater even than in any Presidential year. Complete harmony exists between all sections of the party and also between it and the Equal Rights party.

The Republican leaders, on the other hand, are introducing resolutions in the General Assembly looking to the adoption of amendments to the Constitution having for their object the remedy of the evils complained of; but such amendments under the present Constitution cannot be adopted in a shorter period of time than two years, and will require a majority vote of three-fifths in their favor. The Republican doctrine in the State is, that the Constitution cannot be altered in any way except by the process of amendment. On the other hand, the Democratic and Equal-Rights doctrine is, that remedies can be applied by the calling of a Constitutional Convention, which affords a speedier and shorter method than that which is suggested by Republican leaders, since a constitution framed by a constitutional convention will require the vote of only a majority of the electors of the State, and can be acted upon by a vote of the people in a less period of time than, by the terms of the present Constitution, any amendment can be. The issue, then, in the coming spring campaign is a plain one: Shall the General Assembly call a Constitutional Convention? All Democrats and all Equal Rights men are agreed upon the changes required in the present Constitution. Many Republicans assent to those changes. The question is, then, one simply of method as between these persons. Shall it be done by means of a convention, or shall it be done by amending the Constitution? The large body of the Republican party denies the necessity of any change.

There is no disputing that the spring canvass, which terminates on April 6, on which date a complete State ticket, all the members of both branches of the General Assembly and the Congressman in the Western District, will be elected, will be the most important in the history of the State since 1842. It ought to command national attention, for the questions presented by it are of national interest, far exceeding in importance the size of the State and the influence which it possesses in the body politic. Large numbers of conservative citizens, hitherto opposed to the abolition of the discriminating clause in the Constitution of Rhode Island, will be found either heartily in favor of the changes proposed or else passively submitting to those changes, having discovered that the net result of the existence of these discriminations in the Constitution has not been in favor of political virtue, or the absence of the corruption which exists in many quarters in which no suffrage discrimination is made. For, after all, the best methods of government can be best proved by results. If discriminating suffrage qualifications are productive of corruption equally with a suffrage which does not discriminate, then wherein lies the advantage of the discrimination? It is quite safe to assume that a large mass of voters cannot so readily be purchased as a small one. It is not believed that the canvass will proceed on exactly the same party lines as those upon which the Presidential contest of 1884 did. Some Independents who supported Cleveland will be opposed to the Democratic party, though not many. On the other hand, it is quite certain that all the Democrats who supported Mr. Blaine will be found again in the ranks of their old party, and added to them will be a large section of the Republican party which supported Blaine, and which now realizes that fundamental changes are necessary in order to bring the State to a condition of political honesty. The Democratic party is fully determined to have no one on its ticket in any town or city, or on the State ticket, who is not of reputable character. It will seek to find out its best men as candidates for all offices, and personal interests will in the main yield to the success of the principles which are at stake.

LINEN PAPER VS. COTTON PAPER.

By dint of frequent repetition, the statement that two kinds of paper, distinguished as cotton paper and linen, or, as it is often called, rag paper, were in common use in Europe from a very early period, has gradually come to be generally accepted as true by palæographers and antiquarians. Upon equally good authority it is commonly believed that, while cotton paper was introduced into Europe by the Arabs in the seventh or eighth century, linen (or rag) paper was a European invention of much later date. But the time and place of the invention of linen paper, notwithstanding the long and learned controversies of the last century, have remained shrouded in mystery; nor does there seem to be any immediate prospect of arriving at a definite conclusion concerning these points. In the light of recent discoveries, however, the main question at issue, the comparative antiquity of cotton and linen paper, is in a fair way soon to be solved, if indeed we have not already before us evidence amply sufficient to enable us to reach a final decision, and a decision in direct opposition to the current belief.

The question is one of long standing, and by Mabillon, the founder of the science of palæography, Montfaucon, Tiraboschi, and other scholars, it was earnestly discussed; but inasmuch as no definite rules could be laid down for distinguishing with certainty cotton from linen paper, the discussion, which was characterized by much vehemence of language and a lavish display of learning, seemed likely to be prolonged indefinitely, with little probability of arriving at any satisfactory conclusion. At last, in 1762, prizes were offered by the Royal Society of Göttingen, and by Gerard Meerman of Rotterdam, for the oldest genuine specimens of linen paper, in hope of thus bringing to light some positive evidence as to the date of its invention or introduction. Many specimens of ancient paper manuscripts from Germany, Italy, Spain, etc., were submitted to the committee intrusted with the award. After a long and careful examination of these manuscripts the committee reported, as the result of their investigations, that no evidence had been produced of the use of linen paper before the end of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century, while cotton paper appeared to have been used in Europe as early as the beginning of the seventh century, thus deciding the question in favor of cotton paper. Linen paper they held to be a later European invention, but were unable to decide, from the evidence before them, whether it was first manufactured in Italy or in Germany.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the tests upon which the committee relied to distinguish the two varieties of paper were extremely vague and indefinite, being based almost solely upon the external characteristics of the paper, such as softness of surface, flexibility, thickness, color, etc. Indeed, Meerman, who was himself one of the judges, frankly admits that, unless some chemical test can be found by which to determine with certainty the actual constituents of the paper, he has no hope that the time and place of the invention of linen paper will ever be discovered. Bodmann, a later investigator, who made a careful study of the question, also declared that the characteristic differences between cotton and linen papers could not be detected by the unaided senses of sight and touch, and insisted that recourse must be had to the action of fire and water in order to determine the character of the paper with any degree of certainty. Tests of this nature, however, not only proved to be inadequate to the purpose, but were evidently out of the question in the case of valuable and important manuscripts of great antiquity, these being the very ones the character of which it was most desirable to determine. Still, these later investigations, as far as they went, appeared to confirm the conclusions of Meerman and his associates, and, in the absence of any more satisfactory tests which could be applied, these conclusions came to be generally accepted, and since the beginning of this century the question seems to have been looked upon as practically, if not absolutely, settled in favor of the greater antiquity of cotton paper. De Vinne, indeed, in his 'Invention of Printing,' is inclined to doubt the ability of any antiquary to distinguish between cotton and linen paper, and maintains that the peculiarities of the so-called linen and cotton papers are due more to their distinct methods of manufacture than to the material used. In his opinion, the cotton paper of the antiquarians is merely paper the pulp for which was prepared by grinding the raw material, while the linen paper is paper made from pulp which had been beaten by pestles and stamps, and in which the fibres were rather bruised than cut, as they would be if the pulp were ground.

Meanwhile, it had been found that under the microscope the fibres of linen, or flax, are seen to consist of straight, elongated, cylindrical filaments, or tubes, with comparatively thick walls; these filaments are stiff, tough, and elastic, and do not bind or twist together. The fibres of cotton, on the other hand, show themselves in the form of narrow, flat, transparent tubes with thickened edges, twisted several times upon themselves somewhat like a corkscrew, and readily interlacing one with another. Here, then, was the desired test for determining with absolute certainty the composition of any given specimen of paper, but, as Wattenbach remarked in 1871, the question seemed to have entirely lost its interest, and no attempt was made to reopen it until, in 1884, M. Briquet, a Swiss scholar, published an interesting account of some investigations he had been carrying on. He tells us that, in the course of some researches, undertaken for another purpose, among the Swiss archives, he was surprised to find that the oldest documents there preserved, when examined under the microscope, all proved to be on linen paper. He was thus led to doubt the accepted statements concerning the greater antiquity of cotton paper; and, in order to satisfy his doubts, he succeeded in obtaining, not without difficulty, from various Italian, French, and German archives, fragments of ancient paper manuscripts, ranging in date from the eleventh to the thirteenth century. These fragments, which, it must be remembered, were all considered by palæographical authorities as undoubted specimens of cotton paper, were then subjected to microscopical analysis, and it was found that not one of these so-called cotton papers contained cotton fibres. They all proved to be rag-papers consisting of linen or hemp fibres. Having thus found that the oldest specimens of so-called cotton papers which he had been able to procure are in reality linen papers, M. Briquet is of the opinion that there never was such a thing as cotton paper, and holds that the term cotton paper, when used by early writers, is not to be taken in its literal sense as indicating the composition of the paper, but as referring simply to one of its external qualities, its soft or cotton-like surface.

Without accepting all the conclusions reached by M. Briquet, it cannot be denied that he has proved beyond a doubt that linen paper has a much greater antiquity than any one had hitherto ventured to assign to it. And within the last few months additional evidence has been brought to light which not only confirms the statements of M. Briquet, but establishes the use of linen paper long before the eleventh century, the earliest date for which the Swiss scholar could obtain positive evidence of its use. The remarkable find of ancient manuscripts made a few years ago in Fayum is still fresh in the minds of scholars. The greater number of manuscripts then discovered, ranging in date from the first to the tenth century of our era, have since found their way to Vienna, and form what is known as the Archduke Rainer Collection. Though the papyrus manuscripts, which number upwards of 70,000, constitute the bulk of the collection, there are also many specimens of manuscripts on leather, parchment, and paper; of those on paper, 159 more or less complete manuscripts have been discovered. The latest of these dates from the year 953 A. D., while many are of the eighth century, and some, it is thought, will prove to be of still earlier date. The task of determining the composition of these papers by means of microscopical analysis was intrusted to Prof. Julius Wiesner of the Vienna University, who has lately published the results of his examination, and the most important of these may be briefly stated. He finds, contrary to the opinion of palæographers, who were inclined to consider these manuscripts as being on cotton paper, that all the Fayum papers are rag papers, and are composed chiefly of linen rags. Scattered throughout the mass of worn linen fibres, occasional traces of worn cotton fibres are found, indicating that the rags had been carelessly sorted, or perhaps not sorted at all, though it is evident that the raw material must have consisted almost entirely of linen rags; and so far from being an invention of the fourteenth century, it is now conclusively proved that rag or linen paper was known and in common use at least as early as the eighth century, and that in all probability it is not a European, but an Arabian invention.

The examination of these Fayum papers by Prof. Wiesner has also brought to light some interesting facts concerning the material used for sizing. It is frequently stated that the use of starch as a size for paper is a modern European practice, introduced after paper began to be made by machinery, and that the early papermakers used only a size made from glue or gelatine. But it is now found that, in these Fayum papers of the eighth century, starch was the material used for sizing, though whether it was wheat starch or barley starch has not been positively determined, but the probability is in favor of wheat starch.

IBSEN'S "SPECTRES."

BERLIN, January 22, 1887.

SOME six weeks ago the curiosity of the Berlin public was aroused by the announcement of a performance of Henrik Ibsen's domestic drama, "Spectres." This work of the Norwegian poet has made a deep impression in his native land, and attracted widespread attention in Germany. It has been on the répertoire of the Meiningen company for some time past. Towards the close of 1886 the singular statement appeared that the director of the Residenz Theatre of Berlin had obtained permission from the department of police to put the drama on the stage, on condition that it be given once only and for charitable purposes. This had the charm of the extraordinary about it, and those not acquainted with the piece hastened to inform themselves. It is not yet quite clear why these police precautions and conditions were found necessary, for the character of the play is by no means so alarmingly shocking or so dangerous to public morality as the zealots of the daily press have heated themselves to believing. At all events, the peculiarity of the circumstances helped to make this performance the dramatic event of the season. Cheap copies of the text were displayed in all the book-shops. Bill-posters kept the matter before the public, and the amusement columns bristled with "Spectres in preparation." Berlin was haunted.

An amateur rendering of the play took place on the 21 of January, and caused some comment, but the much anticipated professional performance came off at noon on the second Sunday of this year. It was held with "closed doors," the papers announced mysteriously—a thing usual enough at this season, to prevent draughts. The theatre was crowded. Comparatively few tickets reached the general public, the greater part having been disposed of before the opening of the box-office. The director informed me that some two hundred representatives of the German press were present. The audience was one of critical intelligence, and the presence of Henrik Ibsen himself gave the event still greater interest. His appearance on the stage at the close of the first act was the signal for most enthusiastic applause. After the second act this applause, though still hearty, seemed uneasy; the audience was nervous, and when the curtain fell on the last act, the tokens of approval were comparatively faint. But this very fact was partially a tribute to the dramatist's art. So completely does the deep gloom of the closing scene take possession of mind and mood, that clapping seems almost as much out of place as applause at a funeral, and the hands remain involuntarily at one's side. An outline of the play will make this effect intelligible.

The spectres with which Ibsen deals are not the goblins of Romanticism that flit by night and haunt the churchyard; they are far less innocent. They are, first of all, the spectres by which all society is haunted: the host of traditions, conventionalities, and prejudices, which, in the form of laws, systems of morality, venerable customs, religious and social observances, put restrictions upon each individual in the name of all. Or they are the revenge that society takes upon those who overstep the traditional bounds of what passes for morality. Or they are the sufferings of those who submit to the conventional requirements and struggle in a false cause. They are, last of all, and these the most ghastly of the spectres—they are the sins of the fathers that are visited upon the children. Such spectres haunt the luxurious home of the Alvings. More than twenty years before the opening of the play, Helena, the heroine, was married to the dashing young Lieutenant Alving. Her heart would have had it otherwise, but this was a brilliant match. Her mother was prudent, as the world goes, and had found a man to her turn. This was the first misleading spectre, and Helena's love for Pastor Manders was sacrificed to wealth and position. She was not long in discovering to what manner of man she was wed—a libertine of the lowest order, one that spared not the sanctity of his own home. Mrs. Alving had the choice between two spectres: obedience to the injunctions of established law and religion and a life with a libertine, or flight in defiance of what society enjoined and the pursuit of happiness elsewhere. There would be much to suffer in either case, but she chose the latter course and fled. Society proved too strong. It was to one she loved that she fled, but Pastor Manders was clergyman first and lover only in second degree. He was the representative of all that bore the name of law and order, social, moral, or religious. His brain was haunted by whole troops of these spectres, and, with a self-command of which he was not a little proud, he sermonized in the well-known terms: a wife's place is by her husband's side in prosperity as in adversity, to love, to honor, to obey, and the like. He prevailed. Mrs. Alving returned to her husband, who never learned of this flight.

The spectres of the stronger sort had triumphed, and, as is the case with every finer nature, Mrs. Alving caught the spirit of that noble enthusiasm with which one sacrifices self upon the altar of a high duty, even though the duty be a false one and misunderstood. With the resolution of a strong character, she assumed control of affairs. Her pride assisted her. She resolved that the world should never know that the wealth and luxury of the Alvings' home were the whitening of a sepulchre. She proceeded to build up a structure of deceit wherein her husband's excesses and her own misery were to be concealed. An accident gave her the upper hand over her husband. She discovered an affair of his—with her own waiting-maid. This discovery put the sceptre in Mrs. Alving's hand. She found a husband for her maid, and thus saved the girl's reputation. The daughter that was born passed for the child of the poor cabinet-maker, Engstrand. Some years later Mrs. Alving took this child, her husband's daughter, into her own home and cared for her. Lieutenant Alving, in the meantime, was raised to the position of Chamberlain (Kammerherr), but his excesses told upon his health. Mrs. Alving assisted him in his duties; did what his debauchery often rendered him unfit for; made herself the companion of his drinking bouts, that she might keep him at home; cared for him; shielded him. Zealously she watched the family honor and concealed her sufferings. A new incentive was given her, and a new hope. She became the mother of a son, but, with heroic self-sacrifice, sent him away from her when he was still but a child, that he might never suspect the truth about his father. Her letters nourished in him a filial reverence, as for an ideal. So much could love and resolution do. Alving remained unaltered to the end; his excesses caused his death.

After twenty years of married life according to society's prescription, Mrs. Alving is set free. She seems to have accomplished her purpose. The name of Alving is honored in the land, and she resolves to put the final stone to this structure of pious deceit by erecting an asylum to her husband's memory. A second motive moved her to this step. She devotes to this undertaking the whole of the original fortune with which Lieut. Alving had wooed and won her. Nothing but the after accumulations, which were due to her energy alone, shall reach her son. Pastor Manders has been intrusted with the management of the affair, and the asylum, now finished, is to be dedicated on the morrow. This is the situation at the opening of the play. Oswald Alving has returned from his Paris studio. Regine, in the bloom of young womanhood, holds the position her mother once had held. Her supposed father, a rascal of rare hypocrisy, is about to start a "sailors' home," the nature of which is sufficiently indicated by his anxiety to secure the services of a pretty girl like Regine for his enterprise. Regine has quite other hopes and aspirations. Pastor Manders comes to make the final arrangements concerning the asylum. It is his first visit since Alving's death, for this spectre-haunted clergyman has a wholesome regard for what people might say. Mrs. Alving's greeting is cordial and frank. Admirable is the art and tact with which the author now proceeds to develop before us the long story that has gone before. Amid Manders's interjections and occasional homilies, Mrs. Alving relates to him the whole story of her married life. The good man's wonderment has no end; he is especially amazed at the startling conclusions to which her experiences have led her. Their views have drifted wide apart during these years of trial. These scenes of narrative and explanation are all managed with the highest refinement of the dramatist's art. The characters are drawn in clear, unmistakable lines, with that inward contrast which the different life-experiences have made. The heroic liberal cast of Mrs. Alving—with that high calmness without coldness, that resignation without bitterness, with resolute will, and the indescribable patient tenderness of a mother's love—is one of the finest creations the domestic drama has ever produced. And then the good, spectre-haunted pastor, child-like and sincere, but credulous, strict, shrinking from all things new upon which old custom has not set its sacred seal, ever eager to admonish the erring and interpret the will of God—this, too, is masterly character drawing.

From the entrance of young Oswald, a premonitory gloom pervades the play. He is inert; one sees that he is sparing himself. He throws a shadow of dead hopes, that gradually darkens into final night. He has lived among young artists in Paris, and knows the beauty of that free life there, where those who love may love and ask no priest's consent. That brightness and happiness he must exchange for a sunless life in Norwegian mists. The good pastor is beside himself with amazement and indignation, and does vigorous battle for his spectres; he sermonizes ex officio et ex ignorantia. But Oswald cannot bear the excitement of animated conversation, and goes into the adjoining room, where Regine is preparing the evening meal. Mrs. Alving listens patiently to the pastor's homilies; she professes complete agreement with the views of her son; she will devote her life to his happiness, and forget all else. The "long comedy" is now at an end. A chair is thrown over in the next room, and in a sharp whisper is heard, "Oswald, are you mad?" Spectres! It is that couple from the years gone by that haunt the house still and whisper there—children of one father! Manders sees all now. It is a masterpiece of explanation, and thus ends the first act.

The development is now more rapid. It is Mrs. Alving's turn to hear revelations as well as to make them, and this scene is one of torturing intensity. Hesitatingly, despairingly, Oswald discloses to his mother his terrible condition. His mental powers are broken, annihilated, he says; he shall never be able to work again nor take brush in hand; he dare not even think of his art. His physician has told him all; "the old cynic" said that the sins of the fathers would be visited upon the children. He feels this to be a slander on his father's memory, and yet the thought that he is himself to blame is torture. He turns to his mother with the sudden question, "What do you think of Regine? She is my only salvation." It is a trying moment for the mother. She seems to be compelled to a choice between destroying her son's ideal of his father and concealing the parentage of Regine. She feels that the time has come to put her principles resolutely into practice. Regine is summoned; she is expectant, half-triumphant, half-defiant; Oswald feels that a secret is being kept from him; Pastor Manders is petrified—he has a presentiment of the mother's purpose. Suddenly shouts are heard, and a red shimmer lights up the sky. The asylum is in flames. Manders was unwilling to have it insured, because insurance implied a lack of trust in God's gracious Providence. Here, too, a spectre had been at work. The conflagration closes the second act.

All is now ready for the catastrophe; the forces are all in motion. The last act is extremely painful. Oswald's exertions were more than his weak condition could endure. The mutual confessions are made complete. He has softening of the brain; the loss of his reason is imminent; it is the heritage of his father's excesses. This, too, his mother must confirm, and the ideal, which had cost twenty years of self-sacrifice and loving care to nourish, was destroyed with a word. In the presence of both, Mrs. Alving reveals the relationship between Regine and Oswald. The despicable character of the former now shows itself—this, too, perhaps inherited. She sees her hopes are vain, and she departs in wrath, with the expressed intention of taking after her mother. With her, Oswald sees his last hope depart. He had lost his reason once for a brief period, and, once more lost, it would be gone for ever. He carries poison with him; he may not need it for years yet, and life has not lost every charm, but when the moment comes it will come suddenly. Some one must be by to perform the labor of love and cut short the life of hopelessness and helplessness. In this sense Regine would have been his salvation. She would have done this for him from selfish motives, had she become his wife. All this he tells his mother, but it is more than a mother's love can promise. Gradually, in the course of this indescribably painful scene, one sees him sinking into that state of physical and mental helplessness which he describes. His muscles relax; his voice becomes toneless, at last inarticulate, and his face loses expression. His mother bends over him in the agony of despair; she feels convulsively for the phial, hesitates, struggles with herself, and stares at him in speechless suffering. The sun breaks from the clouds that have hitherto shrouded the Norwegian landscape, and "The sun, the sun!" are Oswald's last articulate words. The mother's struggle is left undecided, and the curtain falls upon one of the most harrowing scenes of the modern stage.

The acting of this drama left nothing to be desired. Every character came out with full effect, as Ibsen must have conceived it. Especially the heroic character of Mrs. Alving received all those touches of exalted strength and tenderness that make us understand how she could pass through what she has, and still be what she is. The light in which she is presented during the few hours of her final trials make all that she tells us of her past life credible and natural. It is a glorious creation, to which the critics of the press have done only half-justice.

Long articles appeared in all the papers, the opinions expressed varying all the way from violent condemnation to cautious praise. The most thoughtful and on the whole most favorable criticism appeared in the weekly Nation. Mr. Oscar Blumenthal pronounces the drama a very common hospital story, an anatomical study. "Écrasez l'infâme," cries the Tägliche Rundschau, and forbears to describe the play out of regard for the fine sensibilities of its female readers—mentioning, however, an easily obtainable edition of the work, so that these same readers may not be wholly disappointed. Others consider the drama an offence against public decency, and brush Ibsen aside as a mere Philistine. The motives in the work are declared to be pathological and not dramatic, and nearly all agree that the drama is not fit for the general stage or for the average audience. The majority of readers will probably acknowledge its unsuitableness for the daily répertoire, but the depth of thought and the consummate skill in the treatment raise the "Spectres" above all violent or contemptuous criticism. It must be admitted that the presentation of the diseased Oswald on the stage, with all that is thereby suggested, makes a disagreeable and almost repulsive impression, and this quite apart from the uproar of objections that is raised by the upholders of sacred institutions. Inherited softening of the brain terminating in puling helplessness may be real enough, but it is not edifying, nor does it seem to be a proper subject for artistic treatment. A timely warning, however, comes from the Nation of Berlin against this hasty dogmatizing—art must this, and art must that—and calls attention to the press criticisms of a century ago, when objections were made to the early plays of Schiller very like those now being raised against the work of Ibsen. It will be long before the last word has been spoken, for we have to do with an important creation and a man of genius, and both can afford to wait for the time of clearer and calmer judgment. The wish has been expressed that a book be written concerning the philosophy of the "Spectres"; the material is certainly there, and the dialogue is full of suggestion for interesting speculation, ethical and sociological.

C. H. G.

Correspondence.

THE NEXT THING IN PENSIONS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A circular from a Washington attorney has come into my hands with the somewhat startling caption: "Mexican soldiers and their widows, over sixty-two years of age, are now entitled to U. S. pensions." Is this prophetic? Why not? The supply of domestic material for the pension roll is fast diminishing, and if we must go abroad to get rid of "the surplus," there are many reasons for beginning with Mexico, unless we can trade off pensions for mackerel privileges with the Kanuckers. * * *

Baltimore, February 4, 1887.

HOW TO COLLECT A LIBRARY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The discovery of a method of collecting a library at absolutely no cost, with the additional advantage of tickling the amour propre of the authors by the most delicate of all flatteries, has been reserved to an ingenious Russian. The first step is indicated by his procedure with me in the following letter:

"Chemins de fer
Du Süd-ouest
de la Russie.
—
Direction Centrale.
—
"Kiew, November 20, 1886.

"Dear Sir: May I venture to ask as a great favor that you will be good enough as to send me a copy of your abridged edition of Mill's Principles of Political Economy for translating it into Russian.

"I am forced to solicit this favor by impossibility to obtain this book in this country.

"I am, dear sir,

"Yours most respectfully,

"Roman Plastounoff."

It seemed a little strange that a book supplied with illustrations and facts adapted to American classes should be chosen for translation into Russian. The usual inquiry was made of my publishers, with the result that a copy of the book was forwarded to the would-be translator. This then enabled him to display the second step in the process. Having made sure of the volume, the method adopted to escape from his situation may be recommended as a model of clever impudence. His reply to my note reads:

"Dear Sir: I have received your kind letter of 1th inst., which gave me a great pleasure, but I suppose there is some mistake, as I wrote you asking for a copy of your edition o Mill without any intentions to translate this work in wholly into Russian, but for some other purposes. Io will give me a pity if you have understood me wrongly. Were I free to consult my own wishes I would gladly accept your suggestion in this respect, but, unfortunately, I am unable to do this at present, although, by your kind permission, in some future it will be practicable for me.

"However it might be, the book (which I hope will reach me in safety), which is valuable in itself, shall be doubly esteemed by me as a gift from you.

"Believe me," etc

The beauty of the method is seen by the light in which the author appears, not only as making the suggestion to the translator (the italics are mine), but as urging it upon a hard worked and busy man. Such conduct, on the part of authors, is contemptible. The wickedness of such a course has so weighed on my mind that I am impelled to make a public confession as a warning to others. "It would give me a pity" to find that others were in the same box with me. In fact, the same method, as I found out accidentally, has been already tried on other writers.—Yours truly,

J. Laurence Laughlin.

Cambridge, Mass., January 31, 1887.

BRAZILIAN RIVER SOURCES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: On my return from a long journey into the interior of this country, my eye fell upon a notice in the Nation for July 22 of "An interesting account of the 'Physical Geography of Brazil,' given by Mr. James W. Wells, C.E., in the June number of the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society." In speaking of Mr. Wells's account, you say: "In describing the river systems, he shows that northeastern Brazil is practically an island, the source of branches of the San Francisco and the Pará being in the same lake." You also say that, in the discharge of his professional duties as an engineer, Mr. Wells has travelled extensively in Brazil. It is hardly probable that as an engineer he was called upon to travel into the distant, wild region of country where lies the divide between the San Francisco and the Pará. Unless he did so, and verified his statement by actual observation, I must doubt it.

I do so not at all to discredit Mr. Wells, but to discredit the story which he heard, until it is verified. I am led to do this because I had heard the same story here in Brazil about Lagoa Feia (Ugly Lake), situated near the town of Formesa, in the eastern part of the province of Goyaz. I think I once saw it laid down on a map as the source of two small streams, one running eastward into the San Francisco and the other northward into the Tocantins or Pará. In 1884 I had occasion to visit Formosa; I then saw the lake, and can testify that the story, so far as that lake is concerned, is a mistake. Formosa is 1,225 metres above the sea level. The water from the streets runs southeast into Lagoa Feia, which is about eight miles distant. A small stream (Rio Preto) runs from the lake on the south, and finally empties into the San Francisco, which empties into the Atlantic south of Cape St. Roque. A small creek, formed by the waters from the town and country eastward, runs into the lake on the north. About a mile north of the town the rains begin to be drained northward into the Tocantins, which empties into the Pará, or southern mouth of the Amazon, and it is of course several miles north of the town that any creek can be formed. About a mile west of Formosa the waters are drained southward into the La Plata. Formosa is, therefore, an interesting place, because it is situated at the only spot where the three great valleys of the Amazon on the north, the La Plata on the south, and the San Francisco on the east come together. Lagoa Feia does not, however, give rise to branches of the three great rivers (which is the exaggerated form of the story as I had heard it), nor even to two, as Mr. Wells heard; it lies entirely within the San Francisco valley. It is about one mile wide by two in length. There may be another lake northeast of Formosa, along the divide between the San Francisco and the Tocantins, which gives rise to branches of those two rivers. I made inquiries about that region while in Formosa, but heard nothing of such a lake.*

You make another statement, on the authority of Mr. Wells, which I am sure needs to be greatly modified. You say: "One can also go in a canoe from the Orinoco to the Plate with one carry of only a few hundred yards." One can go up the Orinoco to its source, and thence across to the Rio Negro through the Cassiquiare, and down to the Amazon. He can there ascend to the sources of the Plate by the Madeira, the Tapajos, or the Tocantins. But his carry across the country from the sources of these streams to the sources of the Plate (i. e., between streams large enough to navigate loaded canoes), would be very much more than "a few hundred yards." Maury extends the distance to "a few miles" ('Physical Geography,' p. 198). This is true, if by "a few" we may mean about fifty.

There is no man living more competent to speak on this point than Gen. Couto Magalhães. One of the most learned and intelligent men in this country, he has been made President several times of the provinces of Goyaz, Pará, and Matto Grosso. He has frequently ascended the Plate and descended the Madeira, Tapajos, and Tocantins. Not only so: he has repeatedly travelled along the divide which separates the sources of those streams. Being thoroughly acquainted with the Indian language, of a fearless and untiring nature, he has spared himself no fatigue or pains in exploring the river systems along the great divide between the Amazon and the Plate. The towns of Goyaz and Cuybá, capitals of the provinces of Goyaz and Matto Grosso, are both situated on that divide. In the discharge of his duties as President of those provinces, as well as General in the Paraguayan war, he frequently travelled between the two places. In his book, 'O Selvagem' (p. 149), he says that his travels through the interior amount to 4,500 leagues, or 18,000 miles (a Brazilian league is 6,600 metres). He then adds:

"In these journeys I have acquired geographical and topographical knowledge which is not entirely without interest, especially in regard to the divide, whose road [i. e., the road from Goyaz to Cuyabá], being of recent date, has not yet been travelled by any geographer capable of giving a description of that immense territory which separates the two greatest river systems in the world, along latitude 15° and 16° south."

Then follows a description of four routes by which one can go from Montevideo up the Plate, across the divide, and down to the Amazon by any one of its southern tributaries. If he wishes to go down the western confluent (the Madeira), his carry across the divide would be twenty leagues (eighty miles). If he should wish to descend the Tapajos, his carry would be thirty-eight leagues (152 miles). He could, however, by a carry of twenty leagues (eighty miles) cross over from Cuyabá to the Rio Manso, which runs in an easterly direction and empties into the Araguaya (the western branch of the Tocantins) at the great island of Bananal. No one in modern times has travelled on the Rio Manso, but its sources have been discovered near Cuyabá by Gen. Magalhães, and, under his direction, laid down on the official maps of the empire. Its mouth is also known; but it still remains to explore the river, 900 miles in length. In regard to the fourth route, Gen. Magalhães says that while President of Pará he heard from old river men the tradition that in colonial times the Jesuits used to ascend the Tocantins and cross over to the Plate with a portage of only fifteen leagues, and adds:

"I made repeated journeys along the divide, and never could comprehend what streams those energetic fathers followed in order to pass from the Tocantins into the Plate with a carry of only fifteen leagues [sixty miles]. That the waters of the two basins interlace and sometimes confound themselves was well known. [Here he means, of course, the slopes, or rather the flat prairies with their numerous sloughs.] That navigation [by canoes, of course, for the Jesuits went in canoes] in the two systems should approach so near, however, is what I could not understand."

He supposed, therefore, that the tradition was incorrect until June 5, 1871. Being on a journey with others from Goyaz to Cuyabá, their dogs raised a panther, and all followed it until late in the evening, when it was killed. They were then suffering from thirst, and followed down the dry bed of a rivulet, when suddenly and most unexpectedly they came upon a beautiful large stream. Two days afterwards he met a fearless backwoodsman who had explored a part of those solitudes. Then it was, he says, that his eyes were opened, and he understood the route of the Jesuits as clearly as if he himself had been along with those audacious explorers. They would ascend the La Plate to the Paraguay; the Paraguay to the S. Lourenço; the S. L. to the Itiquira; and that small confluent to its source; then cross the divide by a march of fifteen leagues, gain the Garças (the stream so unexpectedly found by him), and descend it to the Tocantins and Pará. The shortest carry, therefore, between the Plate and the Amazon confluents would be sixty miles, instead of a few hundred yards. Future explorations will no doubt lessen the distance; but in view of Gen. Magalhães's statements it would seem highly improbable, if not impossible, that the carry should be reduced to anything approaching "a few hundred yards."

Yours truly, JOHN BOYLE.

MOGY-MIRIN, PROVINCIA DE S. PAULO,
December, 1886.

* I hope at some future time to travel through that region, and should I see or learn from some reliable source of such a lake, I will communicate the fact to you.

Notes.

SCRIBNER & WELFORD will issue, in connection with the London publishers, a new and cheap edition of Mme. Campan's 'Memoirs of Marie Antoinette.' It will contain more steel portraits than the English edition.

Lee & Shepard, Boston, have nearly ready for publication Prof. A. P. Peabody's 'Moral Philosophy,' being the lectures delivered to his students in Harvard College, and adapted for textbook purposes. There are twelve essays in the series. This same firm announce a new edition of Archbishop Whately's 'English Synonyms,' under the title, 'English Synonyms Discriminated'; a volume, by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, consisting of an article published some years ago in the Atlantic Monthly, giving practical advice to contributors to the press, and his recent brief essay, "Hints on Speech-Making," which appeared in Harper's Magazine; and 'Danton in the French Revolution,' by Laurence Gronlund, author of 'The Coöperative Commonwealth: an Exposition of Modern Socialism.'

Belford, Clarke & Co., Chicago and New York, will publish by subscription the authorized 'Life of Gen. John A. Logan,' by George Francis Dawson, ex-Librarian of the Senate. The work will be fully illustrated.

'Principles of Art,' by J. C. Van Dyke, at one time editor of the Studio, will shortly be issued by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York. The work is divided into two parts—the first treating of "Art in History," its causes, nature, development, and different stages of progression; the second treating of (modern) "Art in Theory," its aims, motives, and manner of expression.

The officers of the Minnesota Historical Society give notice that they will soon have ready a report proving the falsity of the claims of Capt. Glazier as discoverer of the headwaters of the Mississippi. This has already been done so effectually that the game hardly seems worth the candle, but it would appear that Capt. Glazier and his friends are active enough to be annoying.

'Alice's Adventures Under Ground: being a facsimile of the original MS. book afterwards developed into "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," by Lewis Carroll, with thirty-seven illustrations by the author' (Macmillan), is a little volume which needs no recommendation as a curiosity. So far as the text goes, it shows that Mr. Dodgson's second thought was generally sound, so that he improved upon this rough sketch, just as Tenniel improved upon the crude designs from Mr. Dodgson's own pencil, here printed in their proper places. The pious reflections which precede and follow the manuscript facsimile are singular accompaniments of it, being in the nature of a clerical apology for childish mirthfulness as not displeasing to Deity. They throw some light upon the character and limitations of Mr. Dodgson's humor, which has fallen flat except in the two Alice books. The profits of this memorial volume, so to call it, are to go to children's hospitals and convalescent homes.

Bohn's Standard Library (Scribner & Welford) has been enlarged by three volumes of translations from the German—Ranke's 'History of the Latin and Teutonic Nations from 1494 to 1514,' by Philip Ashworth, who has used the third (1885) edition of a work first published in 1824, and who yet had his task committed to him by the veteran author shortly before his death; Hoffman's 'Serapion Brethren,' vol. i, by Maj. Alex. Ewing, who makes the first attempt to present in their proper connection tales which have heretofore been given detached in their English dress; and finally, Heine's 'Travel-Pictures, including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School,' specimen selections by Francis Storr, who, by translating 'The Romantic School,' makes accessible to English readers the whole of the 'Ueber Deutschland,' of which it forms the second part. To Bohn's Scientific Library is now added a 'Handbook of Historical Geology,' by A. J. Jukes-Browne, of which the first part discusses the laws and application of palæontology, and the second gives an historical account of the rock-groups of the earth's crust beneath the British Islands. The book is freely illustrated.

One of the results of the recent Colonial and Indian Exhibition was the publication of an official handbook entitled 'Her Majesty's Colonies,' edited by A. J. R. Trendell (London: W. Clowes). The introduction, by Prof. J. R. Seeley, treats of the origin and history of the colonies and their relations to the mother country, and is followed by an interesting series of diagrams giving statistics of population and trade. The accounts of the various colonies (in which, it should be noted, India and Burmah are not included) consist of brief historical sketches, with descriptions of soil, climate, productions, resources, government, etc. The most carefully prepared of the longer articles, and, we should judge, the most accurate, is upon Canada. From the very full statistics given it is interesting to note that, while the total foreign trade of the Dominion has increased since 1868 nearly £70,000,000, the trade with England, both the exports and the imports, has decreased during that period. In this respect it differs from the Australian colonies, whose trade with Great Britain was nearly £13,000,000 greater in 1884 than in 1874. The chapters upon this group of colonies are not so well done as the others, and are criticised as tending to give too favorable an impression of the climate and the productiveness of the soil. Many of the accounts of the smaller colonies are signed by their authors, in some cases officials, and give in general a very clear idea of their present condition. The maps are hardly as good as might have been expected in a Government publication, but the absence of an index in a book intended to assist emigration is inexcusable.

'Seven Years among the Fjort,' by R. E. Dennet (London: S. Low), while devoid of literary merit, gives an apparently truthful picture of the life of a trader among the natives of the Congo Basin. His is by no means an easy lot, but is full of anxieties and dangers, to say nothing of privations, arising on the one hand from the character of the people with whom he has to deal, and on the other from the continual interference of European officials, all of whom, whether French, Portuguese, or English, seem to be regarded by the trader as a nuisance. In imitation of Mr. Thomson's sketch of the Masai, Mr. Dennet produces the autobiography of a negro prince who becomes the headman of a factory, describing many native customs and beliefs that might easily escape the notice of an ordinary traveller. Of the coast missionaries and the results of their labors he naturally writes very unfavorably, considering the opinion which they freely express of the trader and his work. Slavery he believes to be on the increase throughout Central Africa, except on the Western Coast. There is also an interesting chapter on the liquor traffic, the chief responsibility for which is laid upon the Hamburg and Bremen merchants, who send nearly seven-eighths of the whole amount of liquor imported into Africa. Speaking for his class in general, the author says: "I am sure most of the traders on the coast would be overjoyed to see this traffic annihilated in Africa." The appearance of the famous French explorer De Brazza, on his return from one of his journeys, is described as follows: "A wretched helmet, a ragged shirt, compasses, chronometers, pedometers, and what not, slung from his neck, shoulders, and waist, and a dirty piece of flannel girded about his loins, completed his toilet." The illustrations of the coast scenery are fairly good, but those of the native life and customs from the author's own sketches had better have been omitted.

Mr E. G. Ravenstein, the cartographer, in connection with the preparation of his great map of Equatorial Africa, the eastern section of which has already been, and the western is about to be, published, has nearly completed a bibliographical handbook of this part of Africa, including Abyssinia, the Nile valley to Khartum, and the adjacent provinces of the Sudan. The introduction will be a history of African exploration, illustrated with maps and diagrams. The bibliography will contain references to all papers contributed to periodicals and scientific societies, as well as books and maps. In addition to these will be given biographical sketches of all persons prominently connected with this part of Africa, both native and foreign, with an account of their work and an estimate of its value. Some idea of the extent and fulness of this part of Mr. Ravenstein's handbook may be formed from the fact that these sketches are already more than 3,300 in number. At the end will be a chronological list of travels, the authorities quoted, and a classified index of names and subjects.

We have received the volume of Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science at Buffalo in August, 1886, with its usual reports, abstracts, and titles of papers and addresses.

Science announces that it has in preparation a series of original maps of explorations and geographical investigations in various parts of the world, under the direction of Dr. Franz Boas, himself an explorer. The first map will accompany one of the March issues.

An unsigned first article on "John Cleves Symmes, the Theorist," is quite the most striking article in the Southern Bivouac for February. It is illustrated by a portrait of Symmes, and by a facsimile of the Supplement to the Cincinnati Western Spy of November 6, 1819, containing reprints of Symmes's articles on the hollow globe, "habitable within, and constituted of a number of concentric spheres, the poles of which are open twelve or sixteen degrees." His rude diagrams are likewise reproduced.

Exceptionally full of interest is the New England Historical and Genealogical Register for January. It opens with a biographical sketch of the late ex-Gov. Hiland Hall of Vermont—a notable figure, in his day, in State and national politics—by his son. Readers will find in it some historical matters of importance. The paper is accompanied by a steel portrait. Two prominent and related families among the intellectual and moral élite of New England, the Wares and the Allens—descendants respectively of Robert Ware of Dedham, Mass., and of the Rev. John Allen, Dedham's first minister—are genealogically illustrated in this number of the Register. Mr. Waters's latest "Gleanings in England" introduce us to the Quineys of the John Harvard connection (Shakspere's daughter Judith married a Thomas Quiney of Stratford-on-Avon), to Higginson, Dummer, Kirkland, Davenport, Revere (Revoire), and other well-known families, their friends or relatives. Mr. J. T. Hassam adds fresh items to his former account of Ezekiel Cheever, the famous master of the Boston Latin School, and prints a long and characteristic letter of his written in 1651. A curious early flag of New England (1695–1701) is copied on page 93 from a Dutch sheet of flags of the world issued about that time.

With the February number, now before us, the Syracuse Academy enters on its second volume, and makes a permanent enlargement to forty-eight pages. Its prospects ought to be more than "fair," as it says they are, for this journal marks an era in our pedagogical literature. Those who read in the present number Prof. W. G. Hale's comment on Principal Peck's address on the teaching of Latin, will eagerly await the appearance of Prof. Hale's 'Art of Reading Latin,' now in the press of Ginn & Co.

Members of the Shelley Society will be interested to learn that Mr. F. S. Ellis announces in the Athenæum the discovery of the lost MS. of the 'Mask of Anarchy,' in the poet's own hand. Forman printed it from a copy of Mrs. Shelley's, and suggested that it was originally dictated to her. The original draft now found bears out Forman's emendations "pretty well," Mr. Ellis says, and he suggests the Society's reproducing the piece in facsimile. With it was a curious and characteristic letter of Mrs. Shelley to Sir John Bowring, February 25, 1826, in which the impression of her romantic life with Shelley is still felt in strong vibrations of feeling.

The Boston Advertiser, noticing the approaching abolition of "sale by candle" at the Bremen exchange, recalls the fact that this "method of auction was at one time common throughout England and Scotland," and "still survives in some places north of the Tweed." Pepys, we will add, has a reference to it in his diary for November 6, 1660: "To our office [the Admiralty], where we met all, for the sale of two ships by an inch of candle (the first time that ever I saw any of this kind,) where I observed how they do invite one another, and at last how they all do cry, and we have much to do to tell who did cry last." An American parallel is found in the old plantation license to the slaves to hold their midnight religious song-and-dance meetings, designated as "one-candle shouts," or two-candle, etc., according to the time allowed.

Goldsmith's life is condensed in a long paper in Le Livre for January, but we pass it by to remark on the item concerning the great newspaper collection of the Library of the Arsenal. By the law enforcing the legal deposit of journals in this library, it is in constant receipt of about seven hundred current publications. Meantime it is building up collections of the press of the past, especially of the Revolution and thence downwards. These are already vast and invaluable. Colonial journalism has only recently been cared for, but Algeria is now represented at the Arsenal by some hundred journals of all sorts, including several in the Arab tongue, three in Hebrew, and one in Spanish. This number of the Revue also contains the French text of the Berne convention for international copyright. On p. 33 we read that M. Gréard, the new Academician, has been "interviewé" by a reporter—the first time that we recollect seeing this participle.

Keble's 'Christian Year,' Dickens's 'Christmas Carol and The Chimes,' Waterton's 'Wanderings in South America' (with a good introductory sketch of this eccentric naturalist), and the 'Life of Lord Herbert of Cherbury,' are the latest issue in "Cassell's National Library."

'The City Government of Philadelphia,' by E. P. Allinson and B. Penrose, and 'The City Government of Boston,' by James M. Bugbee, form Parts i-ii and iii of the fifth series of the Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science. Though much the older settlement, Boston is by far the younger corporation, and these two pamphlets furnish in this and other respects a very instructive contrast. The editor of these Studies announces for publication in March an extra bound volume entitled 'Baltimore and the 19th of April, 1861; A Study of the War,' by George William Brown, Mayor of the city in 1861. Judge Brown's point of view may be inferred from the summary of the second chapter: "The Compromises of the Constitution in regard to Slavery.—A divided House.—The broken Compact.—The right of Revolution."

The American Economic Association has just published 'Coöperation in New England,' by Edward W. Bemis, Ph.D., following Mr. Shaw's excellent monograph on 'Coöperation in a Western Town,' lately noticed in these columns.

A year ago a subscription was started to present Edward Caird of Glasgow with his portrait, in recognition of his distinguished services as philosopher and teacher. The pleasant project met with a hearty response. A great company of scholars from Scotland, England, and Germany contributed. Twenty subscriptions were sent from this country. George Reid, R.S.A., painted the portrait, which, at Prof. Caird's request, was presented on January 8 to the Senate of Glasgow University. Sir William Thomson presided at the ceremony. Prof. Henry Jones of University College, in speaking for the former pupils of Prof. Caird, called attention to the remarkable fact that "there is not a provincial college in England or in Wales where the teacher of philosophy is not heir to Prof. Caird's thought. In the College of Liverpool, at Manchester, at Cardiff, at Lampeter, at Aberystwith, at Bangor, at Kingston, in the United States and in Australia there are those who, according to their capacity, are witnesses to the truth which they learned from him."

'Short Stories from Modern French Authors' (London: Hachette; Boston: Schoenhof) is an excellent collection of thirty-four extracts from good modern writers, edited by the well-known annotator, M. Jules Bué. The passages selected are all made to serve as material for French conversation by well-directed questions upon the subject-matter, supplemented by grammatical questions which are in some cases very searching. These are not made by the editor, but, as the title-page tells us, by a group of "professors," some of whose names appear probably for the first time in a printed volume. The questions are in general so good that teachers who desire to make their pupils talk French in class will find the volume desirable to use, and very suggestive in the difficult art of asking pertinent questions that pupils can answer.

The third volume of the 'Histoire de la monarchie de Juillet,' by M. Thureau-Dangin (Paris: Plon; Boston: Schoenhof), embraces the period between 1836 and 1839. These comparatively uninteresting years of the reign of Louis-Philippe offer ample material for the author's severity of judgment and disdain. A fervent Catholic and a partisan of parliamentary monarchy, he brings his talents as a polemist to bear upon past events so as to make his work full of allusions to the present. Partisan though it be, M. Thureau-Dangin's history cannot be neglected by any one interested in either the political, literary, social, or religious movement that preceded the revolution of 1848. It is a book full of life, and reliable, if the author's lofty point of view is accepted.

M. Albert Vandal continues his researches on French influences in the Orient. We noticed, when it appeared, his interesting essay on 'Le Pacha Bonneval.' He has now just published a work of much greater scope and importance: 'Une Ambassade française en Orient sous Louis XV.—La Mission du Marquis de Villeneuve' (Paris: Plon; Boston: Schoenhof). This is preceded by a masterly preface, which broadly traces the general tendencies of French policy in the Orient in the eighteenth century, a policy of which Hammer, in his 'History of the Ottoman Empire,' could say that never before nor since "was it felt by results so brilliant." M. Vandal's new book throws a flood of light upon many obscure contemporary questions in regard to Russia and Turkey and the Eastern question generally.

'Les Amours d'un ténor' (Paris: Westhausser) presents itself with its title and its fanciful cover designed by Caran d'Ache as if it were a French novel of the most modern realistic school. Yet it is signed D. Mouravline (Prince Dimitri Gallitzin), and the title-page tells us it is translated from the Russian by Serge Nossoff. But "il y a fagot et fagot," and it will not take many such stories as 'Les Amours d'un ténor' to bring into discredit the phrase traduit du russe. The book is full of characters and scenes which have all the disagreeableness of realism without the merit of being true to nature.

The same publisher has recently issued other translations from Slavic writers of a very different order: Sacher-Masoch's 'Nouvelles slaves,' with a preface by Victor Cherbuliez; 'Sans Cœur,' by the celebrated Polish novelist Kraszewski; 'Berlin et Paris; voyage satirique à travers l'Europe,' by one of the most famous of living Russian authors, Saltykoff, or (to give him the name by which he signs all his literary work and by which alone he is known as a writer) Shtchedrin.

—The midwinter number of the Century is unusually rich in its text. Better travel-sketching than William C. Church's little paper on the Bahamas, illustrated after Winslow Homer's water-color studies in Nassau, it would be hard to find. One gets from it an all-round view of the islands, their history, the characteristics of the people, notable events, scenery—every phase, in fact, down to the geological claim which our nation might advance to their possession, as a part of the débris of the Mississippi, though this mode of acquiring territorial jurisdiction by a kind of natural earth-right may not be readily admitted by Britishers. The sketch of the oldest church in London, with Pennell's illustrations, is also a brief study, admirably condensed and arranged; and Prof. Lanciani's description of the fate of the Roman bronzes, and of the recovery of the two athletic figures in the Quirinal in 1885, is also a model bit of popular archæological writing. The instalment of Lincoln's Life covers his Congressional career and some years of law practice, and is of less interest because less personal than the previous chapters. One regrets, too, having to say that the analysis of the political situation shows strange defects of comprehension and curious errors of detail. Who would credit that Charles Sumner is called a Democrat? The political grasp is weak here; and in the field of history, it must be acknowledged, the biography does not sustain the hopes of excellence it excited. Mr. Atkinson's paper on the weakness of nations uses the phrases of political economy more freely than did the former one, but he succeeds in making his reasoning about the relations of wages, taxes, and profits tolerably clear to the common mind: or, at least, his conclusions are driven home. His view of the financial future abroad is a dark one, and there is something worth attention for the rigorous social moralist in the mood of mind with which he regards repudiation of dynastic and war debts by the European democracy, and in his views as to the right of one generation to mortgage the labor and spend the substance of the next. He certainly writes very cheerfully of the spoliation which he suggests is coming. The illustrations of the number are largely portraits, among which those of Dr. McCosh and Father Taylor give occasion for articles; of those in the Lincoln paper that of Joshua R. Giddings and that of the Cartwright couple are remarkable, and all are good.

—The January number of the new quarterly Deutsch-Amerikanisches Magazin is full of valuable and interesting articles, most of which are from the pen of its editor, Mr. H. A. Ratterman. Although it prints eight or nine poems and a number of miscellaneous papers, it is mainly devoted to the history of the German element in America and the biography of German-Americans, treated in several series of essays continued from number to number. The bound volumes of this review will thus have a permanent value, and constitute an important contribution to American historical literature. If it receives the support to which it is entitled on its merits, its future is secure. No American of German birth or descent can read it without being stimulated at once to greater respect for his ancestors and a warmer attachment to his present home. The biographical department of the present number includes the first instalment of a life of Gen. Augustus Moor, who came to Baltimore in 1833 and served in the Seminole war of 1837 under Maj. Powell; the second part of an account of the youth of Gen. Muhlenberg, relating how, at the age of twenty, he ran away from a grocer in Lübeck, to whom he had been apprenticed, and enlisted in an English regiment bound for America, in order to get back home, to the great chagrin of his pious father, several of whose letters are here printed to the great entertainment of the reader; a first essay concerning Augustine Herrman, or, as known in Dutch and English writings, Heermans, a prominent merchant of New Amsterdam, a member of Peter Stuyvesant's Council of Nine in 1648, and one of the "Proprietors of East Jersey"; and, finally, a second part of the life of Friedrich Kapp, principally consisting, however, of copious quotations from Dr. von Holst's article in the Preussische Jahrbücher. A third article is promised, treating of Kapp's literary and historical activity. There are also two interesting historical contributions, one a first chapter of the history of the German-American newspaper press, and the other a continuation from the previous number of the journal of Johann Konrad Döhla, who served as a private in one of the two regiments furnished by the Margrave of Anspach to the British army in 1777 to 1783. There is abundant amusement to be got from this journal, such as the following account of the causes which led to the war:

"England, which must be understood to mean the Parliament, desired to burden the citizens and inhabitants of the thirteen colonies with higher taxes. In addition thereto they sent them tea, which they were to buy, and at high prices, too, so as to draw the more profit and revenue from this country. But as America grows plenty of tea of the best quality, and the inhabitants were abundantly supplied, they refused to receive any from England, and petitioned the King and the Parliament to spare them any further shipments, as they had enough and more. And they sent back the ships and the tea and as much money as the same was worth, etc."

—A few unimportant criticisms of this useful publication suggest themselves. Why should not a German work appearing in this country be printed in Roman characters? Then, also, it would contribute to the convenience of readers if the notes were printed at the foot of each page rather than at the end of each article. A graver fault is that the style is not entirely free from the American corruptions that render the reading of so many German-American newspapers almost painful. It is true there are not many of these. One of them is too comical a literal translation from the English: Authorities are cited in bulk, to which "ein allgemeiner Kredit gegeben wird." The use of the word credit in this sense, quite common in English, but not in German, reminds one of Heine's account of the numerous thrashings he got, as a boy, from his French master, because he persisted in rendering "der Glaube" (faith) as "le crédit," instead of "la religion." "I must confess," he adds, "that le crédit has been of more use to me throughout life than la religion."

—M. Charles Bigot, in the Revue Bleue for January 22, continuing his impressions of America as a Bartholdi delegate, thus sings the praises of the national capital:

"C'est une jolie ville, une fort jolie ville que Washington. Elle réjouit singulièrement nos yeux au sortir de New-York. Ici, point de plan géométrique, point de rues tirées au cordeau et qui se coupent implacablement à angle droit. La promenade a de la variété, de la fantaisie et de l'imprévu. Partout des jardins publics et privés, de grands squares plantés de beaux arbres, des arbres aux environs des grandes avenues, la nature mêlée à l'humanité. On habiterait Washington avec plaisir. Les maisons sont de belle apparence, d'un meilleur goût que celles de New York. Les magasins s'étalent spacieusement, sans être trop pressés. Washington n'a pas seulement bon air, il a grand air. Il prend au sérieux son rôle de capitale. Il fait penser à Versailles, mais à un Versailles moins uniforme, moins rectiligne, moins solennel."

With this it is instructive to recall the picture of the same city drawn in 1840–42 by the French Ambassador Bacourt in his home letters ('Souvenirs d'un Diplomate'):

"Nous avons visité la ville, qui ne se compose en réalité que d'une seule rue, nommée l'avenue de Pennsylvanie. . . . L'avenue est plus large de moitié que la rue de la Paix; elle est plantée et garnie de trottoirs en briques; le milieu, macadamisé et jamais arrosé, est un terrible amas de poussière l'été, et un cloaque l'hiver. Les autres rues ne sont pas pavées non plus, mais ont des trottoirs. . . . Les maisons, à un seul étage et toutes en briques rouges, ont une apparence mesquine; elles sont beaucoup trop éparpillées pour les vingt-cinq mille habitants qu'elles contiennent. . . . La prétendue ville de Washington, qui n'est vraiment ni ville ni village; ce sont des maisons jetées à droite et à gauche, sans des alignements fictifs. Tout cela a un air désolé, misérable, qui, même avec de la verdure, fait pitié! Jugez de ce que ce sera par la pluie, la neige et la gelée. . . . Un endroit de désolation et dont le séjour est intolérable."

—On another point our Frenchmen are as closely in accord as they are here (for good reasons) divergent. The view from Greenwood Cemetery impresses both alike. On September 14, 1840, M. Bacourt writes:

"Je suis allé, ce matin, à six milles d'ici voir l'emplacement et les préparatifs d'un nouveau cimetière qui ressemblera à un magnifique parc anglais. . . . Sur le point le plus élevé de ce cimetière . . . se trouve une plate-forme, sur laquelle on se propose de placer un monument à la mémoire du général Washington. La vue que, de cette plate-forme, on a sous les yeux, est certainement la plus belle qui existe dans le monde entier!"

M. Bigot, in the autumn of 1886, is a little more restrained; but if we interpret his last sentence in a broad sense, he thinks the view well worth crossing the Atlantic for:

"Nous montons au point le plus élevé du cimetière. Là se trouve le monument commémoratif en l'honneur des victimes de la guerre de sécession. D'ici la vue est admirable, par cette belle journée d'automne sans nuages. Nous dominons Brooklyn et la grande cité de New-York. Au fond, Jersey City et les collines des rives de l'Hudson ferment l'horizon. Devant nous et à notre gauche s'étend la rade de New-York, semée d'îlots, toute lumineuse, brillante comme un miroir sous le soleil de midi, sur laquelle courent en tous sens des douzaines de grands bateaux à vapeur crachant la fumée par leurs cheminées, faisant siffler et grincer leurs sirènes. N'y eût-il que ce spectacle à chercher ici, il vaudrait la peine de faire le pèlerinage."

—The first volume, of ten, of Mr. John Bigelow's edition of the works of Benjamin Franklin (Putnams) shows that the series will have, typographically, the essential merits of Mr. Lodge's Hamilton. The paper is excellent, the print large, the margins generous. On the other hand, some of the defects we had to point out in the case of the latter series are visible here, and we mention them thus early because there is abundant time to rectify them, even at the sacrifice of absolute uniformity. To begin with, there is no other running title than "The Works of Benjamin Franklin," and yet one-half of the present volume is taken up with the Autobiography, while the shorter pieces which follow could all to equal advantage have been indicated at the top of the page. This is no slight matter. Then care is not always taken to distinguish Franklin's notes from the editor's. Then the table of contents is too perfunctory. "To Sir Hans Sloane," "To Mrs. Jane Macom," "Letter from Antony Afterwit," yield no help to the searcher; whereas nothing would have been easier than to indicate in two lines the subject of the communication or essay. Finally, the proof-reading leaves something to be desired. On page 359, in a foot-note, reference is made to "supra, ii., pages 152, 153," as if it were not volume one we had in hand, but some volume later than the second. In fact, the "supra" is right, but the "ii." has no meaning that we can discover. In a note on page 23, the date of Mr. Bigelow's 'Life of Franklin' is given as 1884 instead of 1874.

—That this Life should be mentioned only thus obscurely seems odd on Mr. Bigelow's part, since his introduction dwells at so much length on his finding of the original manuscript of the Autobiography, and one who did not read carefully would be led to suppose that it had never before been printed in its integrity. It would have been more natural for him to direct the reader at the outset to the Lippincott edition of 1874 for a particular account of the treasure trove, adding (if he chose) some of the amusing but historically unimportant letters of his agent here given at length. As it is, neither narrative of the circumstances is complete without the other. In making this collection, Mr. Bigelow of course depends in the main on Sparks's edition of the Works, but corrects the mistaken emendations of this too "proper" and adoring historian, arranges his pieces chronologically instead of topically, and adds from three to four hundred new ones derived from the mass of Franklin manuscripts bought of Henry Stevens by our Government, and now in the library of the State Department. In the end, therefore, we shall have an edition not likely to be superseded—and also, let us add, not easy to procure, since only 600 copies have been printed for sale, and from types, not from stereotype plates. Mr. Bigelow reproduces the steel portrait after the pastel by Duplessis, which formed the frontispiece to the Life of 1874. From Parton's Life of Franklin he borrows the summary of Poor Richard prefaces. We remark on p. xviii. of his Preface a very exceptional use of the word organ, in the passage which speaks of a letter of William Temple Franklin's printed in an obscure Paris newspaper—"an organ not one note of which was likely to reach England or America." This is like calling it a medium not one drop or particle of which, etc.

—In view of the aptitude for numerical calculation which the Hindus are acknowledged to possess in a marked degree, it seems singular that India, in modern days, and especially during the period in which it has been subject to the English, with their free-handed educational encouragement, should have contributed so little to the development of mathematical science. It was not destined, however, that Bhâskarâchârya, Brahmagupta, and their compeers of ages far remote should be wholly without their nineteenth-century successors. Râmachandra, a native of Delhi, besides translating numerous works on mathematics, including the higher, from English into Urdû, produced, a generation ago, at least one work in the same language, distinguished by accredited originality. Reference is here intended to his 'Problems of Maxima and Minima,' the second edition of which, prefaced by the late Prof. De Morgan, was published in London in 1859, under the auspices of the Court of Directors, who signified their appreciation of it by presenting its author with £200, after their liberal fashion. And now we have to announce the appearance, last year, of a kindred treatise, but one of much ampler scope, 'Chalana-kalana,' bearing the alternative title of "A Hindî Treatise on the Differential Calculus." This admirably printed volume, extending to nearly 500 pages, has for its author Pandit Sudhâkara Dvivedin, Librarian of the Sanskrit College at Benares. The learned Pandit, already favorably known as a mathematician by what he has written, in Sanskrit, on the properties of the ellipse, lays claim to the introduction of many new methods, over and above demonstrating the validity of a certain method which had previously been pronounced unsound. In an English preface, abounding with interesting facts and criticisms, he gives it as his opinion that Bhâskarâchârya, who, though he flourished in the twelfth century, is supposed to have been indebted for nothing to European sources, "was in no way inferior to Archimedes, in respect of his methods of differential calculus." As the Pandit expresses himself with perfect clearness in our language, it is due to his reputation that he should render into it those portions of his treatise in which, as he alleges, he has improved on what has been accomplished by his predecessors—Mr. Todhunter and Mr. Hall, in particular.

THE AMERICAN SCHOOL OF EVOLUTIONISTS.

The Origin of the Fittest: Essays on Evolution. By E. D. Cope, A.M., Ph.D. (Heidelberg). D. Appleton & Co. 1887.

WHILE the general doctrine of evolution is nowhere more appreciated than among American naturalists, the same can hardly be said for that particular form of it which is usually known as Darwinism. For many years there has been a tendency among the younger students of nature—those who have grown up under the influence of the new ideas and the new methods of research which have prevailed since the 'Origin of Species' was published—to be dissatisfied with the doctrine of natural selection as an explanation of the forms, structures, and complex relations of organized beings. While admitting the reality and importance of Darwin's great discovery, they urge that it affords at best but a partial explanation of the facts; that it deals with only half, and that the least important half, of the problem. They maintain that the real essence of the problem is to discover the efficient causes of those "variations" which are selected, of those "fittest" modifications of structure which can alone survive; and they believe that the time has come when these great problems may be successfully attacked, and a new light thrown on the inmost recesses of nature's laboratory.

Foremost of this school is Dr. E. D. Cope, the well-known anatomist and palæontologist, who in the work now under notice has collected together the various essays, papers, lectures, and addresses by means of which, during the last eighteen years, he has made known his views on evolution in all its bearings. We find here discussions on the relations of animals and plants, on the influence of mind in nature, and on the origin of consciousness, with others on less recondite problems, such as the causes which have brought about the specialized teeth and feet of the various orders of mammalia, and the general evidences for evolution afforded by the vertebrate animals. Some of these questions are discussed at great length, and in several distinct essays from somewhat different points of view, so that it is not always easy to get at the author's exact meaning. We will do our best, however, to give our readers a general idea of Mr. Cope's views upon some of the more interesting questions, pointing out where, in our opinion, his arguments or his conclusions are open to criticism.

One of the largest and most important chapters is that on the Origin of Genera, which, it is alleged, is a more distinct subject from the origin of species than has been supposed. Throughout the whole essay it is tacitly assumed that generic characters are of a different nature from specific characters, and are always to be distinguished from them, and hence that "genera" are definite realities in nature quite distinct from mere groups of species. This view is directly opposed to the teaching of Darwin and to the experience of systematists, to whom the successive grades of sub-genus, genus, and sub-family are often uncertain and fluctuating; while the idea seems to have arisen from the author's greater familiarity with the skeletons than with the external structures of animals. Mr. Cope further maintains that allied genera differ from each other by single characters only, and that these characters are rarely adaptations to external needs or forces, but are due to laws of acceleration or retardation of growth which act without any reference to fitness at all. In other chapters this acceleration is said to be due to "growth-force," and to be determined in its direction by use and effort.

It is interesting to note that this leads to an origin of genera quite distinct from that postulated by Darwin, and which has seemed to most naturalists not only to be simple and probable, but to be a logical result of the theory of development. On the theory of natural selection, new species are produced when any change of conditions requires slight modifications either in color, form, or structure to keep up the harmony between the animal and its environment; or when the struggle for existence is so severe that some individuals of a species are driven to adopt a somewhat different mode of life from their fellows and become modified to suit it—as, for example, when allied terrestrial and arboreal species have acquired differently formed feet. Now, if a species which has thus struck out a new course of life becomes gradually modified into more perfect adaptation to it, and then gives rise to a set of varieties or new species each adapted to some specialized form of that new mode of life, this new group of species constitutes a new genus, and is characterized usually by some structural peculiarity—such as differences in the feet or teeth—which is the special adaptation it has needed and acquired. On this view every new genus has originated in some one modified species of an allied genus.

Mr. Cope's view is very different from this. He believes, to use his own words, "that a new genus has been established by the transition of a number of species of a preceding genus, without necessary loss of specific characters"; and he even thinks the same process may have gone on in the transition of a large number of genera into new orders or sub-orders "by the assumption or loss of the character or characters of that to or from which they were transferred, and that without necessary loss of their generic characters." He believes that this explains the similarity of external form which is often found in corresponding species of distinct genera or distinct families, a similarity which Darwinians explain by the influence of similar conditions affecting growth or coloration.

To make the difference of principle clear to readers not familiar with minute generic distinctions, we will take an extreme and imaginary case. Let us suppose that the two great families of the wolves and foxes (Canidæ), on the one hand, and the cats (Felidæ), on the other, were much more alike externally than they really are, differing mainly in the important character of the retractile and non-retractile claws and in the habits corresponding to this difference, and that it is required to explain how the Felidæ had been derived from the Canidæ. According to Darwin, some species of fox-like animal had been driven to climb trees in search of food, and every modification giving increased prehensile power to the claws and increased agility had been preserved by natural selection; while subsequently many modifications of this type had been developed to prey upon different kinds of animals, some of the larger ones again becoming adapted to a terrestrial life, and using their agile bodies and retractile claws to capture antelopes, deer, and other swift and wary creatures. But, according to the theory of Mr. Cope, a number of species of primeval Canidæ each acquired independently the characters of retractile claws and agile limbs, and formed the new group Felidæ, which was thus not derived from any one common ancestor, but from a number of distinct species which, through similar causes, had undergone an almost identical structural change. It must be clearly understood that this is only an illustration, since the two families referred to are too remote and too specialized to have been derived directly the one from the other; but the principle is the same as that which would apply to any two distinct but closely allied groups.

Perhaps the most distinctive feature of the new school is the return to the teaching of Lamarck, that use and effort are the immediate causes of useful variations, and that the individuals which exhibit these are the "fittest" which survive. It is claimed that the "origin of the fittest" can be explained in no other way, and that, until the right variations are produced, no effective selection or useful survival can take place. With regard to the effects of use, Mr. Cope says:

"Another reason for believing in use as a cause of structural change is the manner in which the same useful structures have evidently appeared on totally distinct stems, as an evident adaptation to the same circumstances in which different types have been equally placed. Thus the birds of prey possess the hooked, often toothed, beak appropriate for tearing and destroying animals. Their stock is the same as that of the cuckoos and parrots, and even of the pigeons. The butcher-birds are of the division of songsters, not widely removed from the thrushes, and far enough from the raptores, yet the same hook and dentate bill reappears in them, as adapted to flesh-eating habits. Among the reptiles, which were no doubt originally land animals, and derived from batrachians, we have a large number adapted to swimming in the ocean, and these not all of the same stock. Thus the Plesiosauri are crocodilian in relationship, while the Pythonomorpha of America were of the same [stock] that produced the snake and lizard. Again, the same modification appears in the Cetaceans, or whale, etc., among mammals, which are primarily a terrestrial division."

To all this the Darwinian would probably reply that no causal connection has been shown to exist between the feeding on flesh instead of insects, and the production of a hook or tooth to the bill. The use of the bill in seizing larger animals might conceivably strengthen the muscles or even enlarge the bill itself, but could have no such effect as causing the tip of the bill to bend downwards, or a definite portion of the margin to grow out into a tooth. On the other hand, any individual variations in the form of the bill tending towards a hook or a tooth (and just such variations occur now whenever large numbers of specimens are examined) would give a slight advantage in seizing the prey, and would therefore be preserved and accumulated by natural selection. So with the tails of marine animals: the action of swimming might strengthen the muscles of the tail and lead to an increase of its size, but how it should lead to its compression and lateral expansion is by no means clear. Any such change of form would, however, undoubtedly improve it as a swimming instrument, and thus every variation in that direction would be preserved.

An equal want of relation between the supposed cause and the result to be explained exists in the case of the rattle of the rattlesnake, where "the habit of violent vibration" is said to tend "to determine an increased amount of nutritive fluid" to the tail. This might increase the muscular power of the tail by the constant use of special muscles, but something more is required to account for the formation of the horny rattles and modified caudal vertebræ of the rattlesnake.

Use, however, implies some organ or part to be used, the variations in which can be preserved by natural selection, and it is urged with some force that the beginnings of new structures or organs cannot be thus accounted for. For this the doctrine of effort is appealed to, as being a power adequate to direct the "growth-force" in a definite direction, and thus initiate a new organ. The power of imagination or desire acting as a stimulus to the secretions is called in to aid and extend the effects of this principle. As one of the best illustrations of the effects of effort, Mr. Cope refers to the production of horns or shields on the heads of so many animals. Toads are said to protect themselves from attack by presenting the top of the head forward and using it as a shield, and the result is seen in the more highly developed forms possessing more completely ossified crania, while some have projecting angles on the head rarely developed into short horns. The phrynosoma, or horned toad of California and Arizona, is really a sluggish lizard which has developed sharp horns on the back of its head for protection. In the case of the Ruminants, it is remarked that they have the habit of defending themselves by bending down the head with the horns forward, and this habit in the primitive hornless ancestors is supposed to have produced the horns by the combined action of the mental effort directing nutriment to that part, and the surface irritation produced by friction whenever the head was used in combat or defence. In support of this view it is pointed out that the generalized group represented by the hog, which were no doubt the genetic predecessors of the Ruminants, also throw the head down in defence in the same way. It is not, however, explained how it is that in this case tusks and not horns have been developed.

Perhaps the most valuable and suggestive of the applications of the theory of use in modifying structure is presented in the short chapter "On the Origin of the Foot-Structures of the Ungulates." The remarkable progressive change of a four or five-toed ancestor into the one-toed horse, and the equally remarkable division of the whole group of ungulate animals into the odd-toed and even-toed divisions, are attempted to be explained by the effects of impact and use among animals which frequented hard or swampy ground respectively. On hard ground it is urged that the long middle toe would be most used and subjected to the greatest strains, and would therefore acquire both strength and development. It would then be still more exclusively used, and the extra nourishment required by it would be drawn from the adjacent less-used toes, which would accordingly diminish in size, till, after a long series of changes, the records of which are so well preserved in our American tertiary rocks, the true one toed horse was developed. In soft or swampy ground, on the other hand, the tendency would be to spread out the foot so that there were two toes on each side. The two middle toes would thus be most used and most subject to strains, and would therefore increase at the expense of the lateral toes. There would be, no doubt, an advantage in these two functional toes being of equal size so as to prevent twisting of the foot while walking, and variations tending to bring this about would be advantageous and would therefore be preserved. Thus, by a parallel series of changes in another direction adapted to a distinct set of conditions, we should arrive at the symmetrical divided hoofs of our deer and cattle. The fact that sheep and goats are specially mountain and rock loving animals may be explained by their being a later modification, since the divided hoof once formed is evidently well adapted to secure a firm footing on rugged and precipitous ground, although it could hardly have been first developed in such localities. It will be noted, however, that throughout all this series of changes the influence of natural selection would be required to seize upon and preserve each favorable variation as it occurred.

Another interesting chapter is that on "The Evolution of the Vertebrata Progressive and Retrogressive." Many types in all orders of vertebrates present rudimentary organs, as rudimentary digits, feet, or limbs, rudimental fins, teeth, or wings. There is scarcely an organ or part which is not somewhere in a rudimental and more or less useless condition. These cases may be either persistent primitive conditions to be regarded as ancestral types which have survived to the present time, or, on the other hand, they may be the results of a process of degeneration, and therefore comparatively modern. The former interpretation was once the most generally adopted, but of late years so many proofs of degeneration have been discovered that it is seen to have played a very important part in bringing about the existing forms of animal and plant life. Mr. Cope defines degeneracy as a loss of parts without corresponding development of other parts. In determining the grade of development (or what should be termed advancement) in the organic scale, we have often to strike a balance between degeneration and progression according to the importance of the parts implicated. We regard sensibility as the highest of animal functions, and mind as the highest form of sensibility. Therefore development of organs of sensibility and mind constitutes a better claim of progress than development of stomach or of skin. The ruminating animals are said to be much superior to man in the structure of their feet, teeth, and stomach, yet we assign the higher position to the quadrumana and to man, on account of the superior complication of their brain structure.

The earliest reptiles, the theromorpha, were more nearly allied to mammalia than any now living, so that reptiles as a whole may be said to have degenerated. They have, however, become specialized for certain modes of life, and the whole order of snakes have entirely lost the limbs, so that we have here a process of creation by degeneration on a large scale. Some lizards have also lost either the fore or hind limbs, or in some cases all the limbs, thus resembling snakes in outward form though differing from them altogether in structure. The earliest birds probably possessed a long bony tail as well as teeth, both of which they have lost. The whales and manatees among the mammalia have degenerated by the loss of their posterior limbs and the modification of their fore limbs into swimming paddles. The seals have partially degenerated from the carnivorous type, and the sloths and ant-eaters are supposed to have lost the teeth which their ancestors possessed, and thus to have suffered degeneration.

One of the most curious speculations to be found in this volume is the tracing of plant to animal life through a progressive automatism and loss of consciousness. It is urged that all definite motion in organic beings must have been once conscious motion, and that all automatic or unconscious motions or acts were acquired and organized in states of consciousness. All evidence goes to show that actions sufficiently often repeated become automatic, and it is now believed that all the vital actions of the heart, lungs, stomach, and other organs originated in voluntary motions of some lowly organized ancestor. Mr. Cope thus applies this principle to plants:

"Bearing in mind the property of protoplasm to organize machinery which shall work automatically in the absence of consciousness, we can glance at the succession of vegetable forms. The active movements of the primary stages of the Algæ are well known. After swimming actively through the water, they settle down, take root, and assume the rôle of plants. The Aethalium, swimming with the movements of a Rhizopod, has been known to take food before establishing itself on the damp piles of the tan-bark, where it speedily becomes a low form of fungus. The approximation of the lower forms of plants to animals is notorious. The fungi, it is said, are the only terrestrial plants which live like animals on organic matter, appropriating the humus of their rich nidus in a state of solution. Now, the palæontology of animals has absolutely established the fact that the predecessors of all characteristic or specialized types have been unspecialized or generalized types. It may then be regarded as almost certain that the ancestors of the present higher types of plants were more animal-like than they; that the forms displaying automatic movements were more numerous, and the difficulty of deciding on the vegetable or animal nature of a living organism greater than it is now. Hence it may be concluded that animal consciousness has from time to time organized its machinery and then disappeared for ever, leaving as a result the permanent form of life which we term vegetable. But it is not to be supposed that all changes of structure cease with the departure of consciousness. Given spontaneous movement (i. e., growth), and surrounding conditions, and the resultant product must be structures adapted to their surroundings, just as the plastic clay be fitted to its mould. And this is essentially the distinguishing character of vegetable teleology as compared with animal. In the average plant we see adaptation to the conditions of unconscious nutrition; in the animal, adaptation to conditions of conscious contact with the world under a great variety of conditions."

Whether this remarkable theory of the relations of plant and animal life be ultimately proved to be true or not, it is certainly very suggestive, and opens up before us illimitable vistas of inquiry into the obscure arcana of nature. Many such intellectual gems may be found in the volume under consideration, but they have to be dug out from a mass of unattractive ore. The great fault of the book is that no attempt has been made to systematize and weld together the material of which it is composed. Hence frequent repetitions and self-quotations, with a considerable amount of purely technical matter, quite unreadable by any one but an experienced anatomist. There is ample proof of the author's ability to write a connected work which should set forth his matured views on the great problems of evolution in an attractive as well as an instructive manner; and it is much to be regretted that the somewhat pretentious title here attached to a mere reprint of his collected papers was not reserved for such a work.

RECENT NOVELS.

The Princess Casamassima. By Henry James. Macmillan & Co.

The Minister's Charge. By W. D. Howells. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

Rankell's Remains. By Barrett Wendell. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

Sir Percival. By J. H. Shorthouse. Macmillan & Co.

A Demigod. Harper & Brothers.

The Bow of Orange Ribbon. By Amelia E. Barr. Dodd, Mead & Co.

Between Two Loves. By Amelia E. Barr. Harper's Handy Series.

'THE PRINCESS CASAMASSIMA' disturbs the conviction that Mr. James is the chief apostle of that restricted realism which ignores extraordinary events and unusual characters, and denies the influence of the apparently accidental on the general current of life, and of exceptional individuals on the history of humanity. It fits an empirical yet generally accepted definition of realistic fiction about as neatly as does 'Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp.' One hardly stretches a point in drawing a parallel of improbability between the adventures of Aladdin with his Princess and the adventures of Hyacinth, bookbinder of Soho, with his Princess, the "most wonderful woman in Europe." Let it not be supposed that Mr. James has gone over to romance and magic; he has only selected people whom very few of us are likely ever to know, placed them in circumstances best suited to develop them, and dispassionately told the whole truth about them. His persistent desire to see the truth, and his marvellous ability for telling it, whether the case under consideration be special or typical, prove that he has become a "realist" in the only significant or, indeed, intelligent sense of the word. Though, as a rule, the value of a study of types is, of course, greater than that of exceptions, the exceptional, if well chosen, almost certainly gives the author the best chance to show his greatest strength. In this series of studies of exceptions Mr. James shows a versatility and power hardly hinted at in his former work. Such complex and high-strung natures as Hyacinth and the Princess call out reserves of keenness and intellectual refinement unexpected even in him; and in the score of uncommon people temporarily united by common interest in a great question, his wit and sarcasm are agreeably tempered by a tenderness and even intensity of feeling which he has hitherto carefully repressed. The gain to the reader in interest is enormous, for, if a novelist will not give us a dramatic plot or thrilling scenes, and will leave off just when he has prepared us for a splendid finish, we are more than compensated for emotional disappointment by the intellectual pleasure of thought directed towards aims and objects not circumscribed by personal desire or local predisposition and habit. Throughout the novel we are carried far away from the average man and his motives in the ordinary conditions of life, but we are not invited to step outside of humanity; on the contrary, our understanding of humanity and sympathy with it are very materially extended and stimulated.

The Princess is an enigma, brilliant and inscrutable. All her frank and illogical talk, all her eccentric behavior, all the author's analysis, fail to make her comprehensible, but they accomplish his intention to portray a woman beyond shadow of doubt dazzlingly incomprehensible. Her personality smacks as little of the respectable aristocracy as of the middle class or the mob. She is a product of high fashion, of the great world, sick to death of all that goes to produce her. She is irresponsible, elusive, incalculable. She is never in the highest sense spiritual, never basely sensual. Her passions are only caprices, and her caprices have for the moment the active force of a great passion. While we know her, her dominant whim is to identify herself with the people, to clap the great democracy on the back, to imagine herself an intimate counsellor of the darkest conspirators, to believe, as she likes to say, that she is head and shoulders "in it." The Princess, as nearly as we can get at her, is a monument of sincere insincerity, and it was well for poor little Hyacinth, who long supplied her imagination with a concrete representative of her caprice, that the end came before he wholly realized the truth.

Little Hyacinth, born in a slum, bred on a poor dressmaker's charity, doomed to bear the burden of a parentage doubtful in all but its shame, is the great figure of the book. His organization is most sensitive and exquisite, and in him all the author's intellectual subtlety and distinction find expression. He is no easier to classify or label than the Princess. He is specifically of the unhappy only—the most unhappy, for his case is not so much that of a nature at war with circumstances as of a nature made up of incongruous, irreconcilable elements—a nature for ever arrayed against itself. At his worst, Hyacinth is never sordid or grudging or snobbish; at his best he is aflame with nobility, not heroic, romantic, and impossible, but entirely consistent with modern sentiment and the aspiration that is permissible or possible to us. Always, in his enthusiasms and dejection, in the light, ironical mood which is most frequent, Hyacinth is indefinably sad. The people whose lives touch Hyacinth's are each in his way as exactly and vividly drawn. No English novelist has given us such a Frenchman as Poupin, such a German as Shinkel, such an Italian as Prince Casamassima. The London shop-girl Milicent Henning—who, by the way, is typical—is perfect in her superabundant health and slang, her scrupulous care for her virtue, and her hopeless, unconscious vulgarity.

It is rash to venture any conclusions about the author's personal attitude towards the Socialistic movement which agitates and colors the lives of his characters. He may be accused of using a serious movement simply for literary purposes, of scoffing at its intensity, playing with its passion, treating it often as frivolously as if it were a question of woman's-dress reform. But there is an undertone of earnestness suggesting that he, like Hyacinth after his eyes began to open, sees most clearly, at the bottom of the cry about elevating the people, the "ulcer of envy, the passion of a party hanging together for the purpose of despoiling another to its advantage.

It is hardly fair to leave this novel without a word about its literary manner and style. There is, of course, very little plot, and that little is immaterial. There is a mass of what, from a hasty reading, may be stigmatized as super-subtle analyses, ultra-refined phrases, fine-spun nothings. But a careful reading—and for the dimmest appreciation that is necessary—will pretty surely acquit the author of such sins, and compel the recognition that, putting aside his skill as a novelist, he has written a book remarkable for the precision, elegance, and distinction of its style.

The points of resemblance in the writing of Howells and James, so evident that we naturally couple their names as representatives of a school, are very forcibly present to one reading the 'Minister's Charge' close upon the 'Princess Casamassima.' There is the same facility and apparent delight in laying bare the secret recesses of thought, the same habit of presenting sentiment and what may be called mental tragedy through a medium of light, humorous satire, a similar command of telling and brilliant expression. For downright cruelty and cold-blood in the dissection of the meaner and shabbier part of every man, the one has often proved himself the equal of the other. They have done it so often, at such great length, with such unquestionable fidelity, that, with the mote "realism" in our eye, we have cried in despair, Are the qualities in men that we know to be fine not real? Are trivial baseness, petty viciousness, the only truths? Are we ourselves, in our occasional better impulses and actions, pure hypocrites imposing on stupidity, as our own density is in turn imposed on? At last Mr. James has given us some comfort, but Mr. Howells plunges us the more deeply in gloom. In this novel, as in 'A Modern Instance' and 'Silas Lapham,' he shows himself a masterly realist, laboring under obvious restrictions in his selection and view of character. Accepting the work, with its limitations, it has neither the strength nor value of 'Silas Lapham,' for its most important character, Lemuel Barker, is not so widely representative, and, shorn of Mr. Howells's interpretation, is insignificant. Deduct Howells from Lapham, and Lapham remains a force in his world; deduct Howells from Lemuel Barker, and there remains a dull, conscientious, country boy, the loss of whom his world could bear lightly. The author does not overlook anything there is in Barker. He makes the most of his reticence, his self-consciousness, his pride that scorns to accept a favor, yet, until he has imbibed city notions, feels no shame in menial service; his dogged adherence to a Puritan conception of right. He absolutely invests Barker's career as man-of-all-work, "elevator boy," horse-car conductor, with mild interest, but, as Barker himself would probably have phrased it, "there's not enough to him" to hold people of moderate cultivation through thirty-five chapters. The author seems to have been oppressed by Barker's insufficiency, for he resorts to much padding of a flimsy kind, and, worse still, of a kind with which he has already made us familiar. He provides the Boston spinster of adequate means, and social position, who laughs immoderately and pours out silly impertinences which are uttered and received as specimens of delightfully frank humor. Then he brings on our old friend, now known as Mrs. Sewell, the lady who keeps her husband's conscience, who alternately snaps and gushes, who frequently explodes in question or affirmation which, though apparently irrelevant, really illustrate an unerring intuition. Marching through the pages is the phalanx of men of good disposition but inclined to perpetual ironical mirth, broad or delicate, according to their position in life. These men, distinctively Howells's men, are frequently entertaining, witty, and acute to a degree which partially offsets their hardness and frightfully bad taste. The author has made the world so intimate with them, that a stranger in New England must suffer a shock of surprise should he meet a man who can treat weakness tenderly, sorrow reverently, who is capable of wholly serious thought and direct, unequivocal expression. Mr. Sewell, the minister, who here leads the band devoted in their own peculiar manner to driving dull care away, is a strained and tiresome person. Attributing to such a man continued and extreme feeling of responsibility for Barker is about as grave a departure from probability in character as any romanticist could be guilty of, with nothing picturesque or entrancing to balance the untruth.

From Mr. Howells's later works, the inference is justifiable that he desires impartially and fearlessly to record New England life both in its broad tendencies and its detail. So far he has shown us that there is little variety in the people—that their prominent characteristics are of a mean order and strikingly disagreeable. Nothing but his literary efficiency could induce inhabitants of the remaining quarters of the globe to tolerate the majority of them. It is a matter of history that we owe our national leaven of spirituality and intellectuality to New England, and no one believes that the stream of ennobling influence has dried at its source. Therefore a series of novels delineating only people devoid of spirituality, and meagrely intellectual, is either a suppression of that part of the truth best worth telling, or an indication of the author's unfortunately contracted vision.

If the author of 'Rankell's Remains' had lived two hundred years ago, he would have cast his work in allegorical form, with Rankell as the monster, Mammon. Rankell is an embodiment of the passion for making money, a passion perhaps no more modern than ancient, and always selfish, unscrupulous, and insatiable. In three imperfectly connected episodes, the author depicts a character so detestable as to excite loathing for the man and for all that he represents. There is no pleasure in reading about Rankell. Still, for the healthy after-effect—the detestation of force expended in evil—it is worth while to share the pain his iniquities inflicted on his victims. The methods by which Rankell rose in life so closely resemble those ascribed by common report to many men who have accumulated great fortunes, that it is foolish to say the author had any individual in mind; but the vengeance wreaked on Rankell's remains by a victim who had been impotent to harm him living, is a clear use of a singular and widely known incident. The employment in fiction of circumstances that all the world has recently been talking of is generally in questionable taste—about on a plane with personal journalism; but in this case the aptness and artistic treatment of the incident are sufficient excuse. It is just as easy to particularize the Convention where Rankell's gold was potent, and to put one's finger on the candidates and wire-pullers. At the Convention Rankell reached the climax of infamy, for here he stepped aside from what might be considered legitimate rascality—went out of his way, as the author says, "to play for his own gain any game that would bring money to him, even though it brought dishonor to the country; and he played it by stirring up what was worst in these men about him—their silliness and greed." Detached from the story, the episode of the Convention is a clever bit of political satire, setting forth certain principles which, if taken to the national heart, might inspire hope that such proceedings will speedily become "portion and parcel of the dreadful past." It is a pity that the author confesses even as much tenderness and compassion for Rankell as he does in the preface and last chapter. The evil done by Rankell was of the kind that literally lives after a man, for it blighted other lives and sowed seeds of infinite misery. It was so far-reaching and malignant that no weak sentiment for a woman's memory, nor endowment of a church of fabulous cost and ethereal beauty, could ever nullify or even extenuate it.

In the tale of 'Sir Percival' the author of 'John Inglesant' attempts an impracticable thing—to infuse a religious rhapsody with an appearance of actuality. He seems to have wanted to write a poem exalting the beauty of unassailable religious faith, of pure and unselfish living, and he has hampered himself in every conceivable way. His own mind is full of the legend of Sir Percival of the 'Morte d'Arthur,' but he makes no better use of it than to harass the reader's mind with ineffectual effort to find some sort of a parallel between the all-but-blameless knight and the very faulty modern hero, Sir Percival Massareen. Then he puts his narrative in the mouth of a girl—a very fine figure for a saint, perhaps, but, as a mere human girl, making about as profound appeal to sympathy as does an iceberg. In a number of poetical passages she amplifies the idea that through suffering alone the spirit may reach purity and holiness, but there is nothing except her abstract ecstasy to prove that she suffered at all. She seems to have lived a life of luxurious seclusion and devout reverie exactly to her taste. In crises that must have plunged a real girl in an abyss of despair, she has no trouble in bearing up. She wonders how she can be so happy. When a young man from the Foreign Office comes with news of Sir Percival which is almost surely fatal, she experiences rapture. Her deliberation in waiting to open the young soldier's last letter until she shall have walked a mile or so through the park, and installed herself in a particular corner of a chapel, would be comical if she had not from the first chilled the sense of humor out of existence. The impression made by the tale is the reverse of that which the author intended. It is a failure not because it is inadequate to the test of probability, but because it is so clumsily managed that the imagination which it ought to delight is severely kept in check by cold reason.

It would be difficult to imagine a more worthless and ridiculous book than 'A Demigod,' impossible to write one with less regard for propriety of form and expression. The Demigod is descended through seven generations from an English physician who, disgusted with the degeneracy of his race, retired to the most inaccessible wilds of the Taygetus Mountains. There he ate no meat, cherished no ambitions, avoided notoriety (a task which, considering his location, was not beset with obstacles), and devoted himself to what the author calls "harmonious self-nurture." He bound his son under oath to do likewise, and the oath was transmitted from father to son down to Hector Vyr the seventh, the Demigod. When a Vyr wanted a wife he sallied forth from his castle—furnished always in the highest taste of the time, without regard for cost—crossed a moat, tossed aside a gigantic oak that served for a bridge, and, single-handed, rescued a party of travellers about to be put to the torture by bandits. A perfectly beautiful woman, thus rescued, always gave her love and life in gratitude to her rescuer. Hector Vyr got his wife in traditional fashion. She was without speck or blemish, her teeth were perfectly sound, and she came from Boston. The place of her nativity and bringing-up suggests that the eccentric Vyr method is not essential to the attainment of absolute physical and mental perfection. A difference between Hector Vyr and other men, as marked as his perfection, is his candor of speech, his ignorance of the art of polite equivocation. He is a combination of the enfant terrible and the guileless red man of fiction. The charm of his ingenuousness is much enhanced at first by his childish diction, but the author soon wearies of sustaining that, and, long before the end, his only attractive expression is "whyfor." The book would be beneath comment were it not for a slap-dash pretentiousness, a superficial smartness, which easily pass current for cleverness and remarkable originality.

'The Bow of Orange Ribbon' is a very picturesque story of New York in 1756, all alive with sturdy Dutch men and women, and brilliantly set off with King George's soldiers in splendor of scarlet and gold. The antipathy of certain honest, godly Knickerbockers for the youthful English representatives of the flesh and the devil is discussed with a great deal of humor and vivacity, and the romance of the little Dutch maiden with the giddiest of the offenders is as sweet and natural as tale of true love, not always running smooth, can be. The atmosphere of the story is thoroughly old-time, and, whether the separate pictures are historically accurate or not, they make a pleasant combination. The end is happy, and that is pleasant, too, for to leave such whole-souled, friendly, nice people in permanent unhappiness would be positive grief.

The scene of 'Between Two Loves,' another story by Mrs. Barr, is in an English manufacturing town. Its quality is not so excellent as that of 'The Bow of Orange Ribbon,' but it is nevertheless a very good story. The characters are those which the author wisely selects to write about because she is perfectly in sympathy with them. The men have generally warm hearts, quick tempers, deep prejudices, and the fear of the Lord in their souls. The women are pure of heart and mind, faithful and strong in love, and religiously subservient to Calvinistic theories of duty—good men and women all, in the main, whose petty weaknesses, follies, and occasional vices weigh light in the balance against their integrity and truth.

Tenth Census of the United States. 1880. Vol. XX. Statistics of Wages. Washington.

THE twentieth volume of the final report on the Tenth Census of the United States is devoted chiefly to statistics of wages. With a view to showing what wages will buy, there are added tables of the average retail prices of the necessaries of life. Supplementary reports upon trade societies, and strikes, and lock-outs are also included; but as they do not profess to be at all complete, and are of little interest after the lapse of six years from the date of their compilation, we need not refer to them. As to the statistics of wages, it is evident that great labor has been performed by those having the work in charge, both in the selection and in the arrangement of materials. Returns from fifty-three industries were obtained, and are here displayed in 627 tables, accompanied with explanatory remarks. They constitute, according to the belief of the Superintendent of the Census, "the largest magazine of statistics relating to the wages of labor to be found in any single publication." If size is to be the standard of judgment, this opinion is probably correct, as the tables must contain nearly 150 cubic inches of printed matter. But if they are intended to be used by students of social science, they seem to be in several respects untrustworthy.

The work of the statistician is commonly regarded as of a purely clerical character. Nothing could be more erroneous than this view. No statistical work can have other than accidental value, unless it is carried on by men competent to judge of testimony, to weigh evidence, and to conduct experiments in accordance with scientific principles. To distribute blanks and tabulate returns is not enough; it amounts frequently to nothing more than putting an official stamp upon misstatements. As an illustration of the defects of this method, we may take the answers received by the special agent to his question concerning the cost of the labor employed in making ploughs, of which he is moved to observe: "One works cannot produce at an expense of 12½ per cent. for labor what costs the other 50 per cent." Again, we have the statement that while in New York common brick sold at $7 per thousand, and pressed brick at $15, the labor cost was the same for both, $2.35 per thousand. This is improbable enough, but immediately below we read that in Pennsylvania the price per thousand for common brick is $4.60, and for pressed brick $8, while the labor cost for the former is $4.10, and for the latter $7. In the same connection it is stated that in Ohio the prices of fire brick, according to grade, are $16, $30, and $42; that the cost of labor per thousand is $5.45, and that the percentage of wages to cost is 35 per cent. for the cheapest grade, and 40 per cent. for the two higher grades. This means either that labor cost is a different thing from wages, or that price is a different thing from cost, or else that $5.45 is at the same time 35 per cent. of $16, and 40 per cent. of both $30 and $42.

If we attempt to compare the wages paid in different establishments, it is impossible not to be struck with the extent of the variations. Thus in the boot and shoe manufacture we find that a cutter in an establishment in Massachusetts was paid in 1880, $2.50 a day; in an establishment in New York, $2; in one in Pennsylvania, $1.50 to $1.87. In the same establishments a finisher was paid $1.33, $2.33, and $2.62. In two establishments in Ohio, finishers were paid respectively $3.50 and $2 a day. Moreover, the Massachusetts finisher has had his wages reduced from $3.50 in 1870, while the New York finisher has lost very little, and the Ohio finisher has gained fifty cents since 1876—the limit of the table in this case. It is almost incredible that for the same work there should be paid such different sums as $1.33 and $3.50. But if the work is different, such tables as these are worthless; no averaging of results will correct errors that arise from calling different things by the same name.

Turning to the carpet industry, we learn that in a Massachusetts mill a carder is paid $0.60 a day, while in an establishment in Pennsylvania he receives $1.66. In the same two mills reelers get respectively $0.85 and $1.00, warpers $0.99 and $2.50, spinners $0.71 and $2.00, and so forth. In the cotton manufacture, if we compare two establishments in Connecticut, we find the following rates of wages: Card-strippers $0.76 and $0.91, frame-spinners $0.70 and $0.48, spoolers $0.90 and $0.62, warpers $1.75 and $0.91, and mule-spinners $0.84 and $1.25. Taking two woollen mills in New Hampshire, it appears that spoolers get in one $0.67 a day, in the other from $0.75 to $1.00; spinners respectively $0.66 and $1.50 to $1.75; carders $1.02 and $0.80 to $0.90. It would be surprising to find such different rates of wages in establishments in the same State, even if we could discover some proportion in the variations. But when we find that the first mill pays one class of workmen twice what the second mill pays, and another class only half what the second pays, our surprise changes to scepticism. It is impossible to derive any sound inferences from such data. A protectionist could easily prove from them, more suo, that half the factories in the country must at once shut up on account of the pauper labor employed in the remainder.

It is hardly probable that any one wishing to trace the prices of the great staples of consumption would consult this report, since the statistics of the various commercial journals and societies are much more complete than those here given. We find the same uncertainty as to the meaning of terms that detracts from the value of the statistics of wages. To take a single illustration: the price of men's heavy boots per pair at one town in Indiana is stated to be from $2 to $2.75; at another town in the same State it is from $4.50 to $7.50. The only useful inference to be drawn from such statistics is, that when the inhabitants of Terre Haute want to buy heavy boots they had better go to the town of Washington to do it.

It is, however, possible to gather some valuable information from a compilation like this. Certain establishments give returns of the wages that they have paid for many years past, and in these cases we may presume that the nature of the services rendered is indicated with substantial accuracy by the name given to the workman. It is somewhat interesting to observe that the number of establishments in which eight hours constitute a day's work has decreased during a term of years, although upon the whole the working day has been materially shortened. In fact it looks as if from nine to ten hours was the normal period for most classes of factory work. If more hours are worked, the product, although somewhat larger, tends to be of inferior quality; while if the day is shorter, the decrease in quality of production is not made up in any other way. As to the time of payment of wages, about the same number of establishments pay monthly as in former years, while more pay weekly—the difference being explained by the fact that yearly and quarter-yearly payments have practically ceased. But these scattered suggestions are a very small return for the labor that has been expended in the preparation of this volume, and we fear that it must take its place in that innumerable procession of public documents that is always marching from the printer's to the paper-mill.

The Dragon, Image, and Demon. By the Rev. H. C. Du Bose. A. C. Armstrong & Son.

So good a book as Mr. Du Bose has written ought to have been better. In the matter of contents, it is worthy of a place alongside of Dr. Legge's 'Three Religions of China,' for, while the scholarly translator of Confucius gives a view of the three systems from the professor's study, the missionary of Soo-chow shows what these religions are in the daily practice of the people. The student of Christianity does well to see the faith as the Copt, Abyssinian, Greek, Roman, and even the theologians of Peoria or Tübingen, as well Canon Farrar as Gen. Booth, hold it. So it is good, after perusing the savant's monographs read before learned circles, to read the missionary's accounts given from an every-day point of view. Mr. Du Bose, a missionary of fourteen years' experience at Soo-chow, has studied the graphic and artistic symbols at first-hand, and the documents mostly at second-hand. Leaving the genesis and development of the Chinese faiths to be treated by others, he has done a most desirable piece of work in giving us, besides his text, accurate, though rudely drawn and engraved, pictures of objects worshipped. These illustrations number nearly two hundred. He has thus furnished a serviceable handbook of easily recognized divinities in the Chinese pantheon. Lawyers and magistrates on the Pacific Coast and elsewhere, who remember Gibbons's dictum as to the religions of Rome, might easily make this book of Mr. Du Bose's really serviceable.

In literary form, the book is disappointing; and the writer might easily have made it more acceptable if he had followed the best traditions of the craft of book-makers. To say in the preface that "many of the best thoughts in this volume are obtained from the writings of Edkins, Eitel, Legge, and Beal, . . . and other sources," and then to give in the body of the work only quotation-marks, with no reference to author, book, or page, is exasperating. In this the author injures himself, for often the quotation, with context of his own, casts real light upon points left obscure by others. Further, instead of weaving his matter into continuous summaries, his thirty chapters are comminuted into paragraphs with headings in heavy type, like the items of an old-fashioned country newspaper. The author's point of view is, of course, that of an evangelical missionary bent on helping to destroy paganism. He makes much of the Nestorian influence in China, and thinks that some direct modifications of the Buddhist cult are directly traceable to this form of Christianity. For instance, he says (p. 298) that the idea of Amita [Amida] Buddha, and the Western Heaven ["Reformed Buddhism" of Japan] "was borrowed from the Nestorians, whom the Buddhists likely met in Central Asia." In other ways, he perhaps strains the Nestorian theory, and cracks the nuts of nice scholarship too easily. Yet it is certain that this whole subject has as yet not been properly examined. The problem of "Reformed" Buddhism, which has thus far defied the attempts of Max Müller and other Orientalists to solve it, is full of mystery and interest. The Kioto theologians of the Shin-shiu sect shift the sources of the revelation to inaccessible Thibet, and talk of manuscripts and books never as yet seen in Europe. Whether this be the makeshift of ignorance or cunning, or the weakness of ecclesiastics called to face facts that are undermining their system, remains to be seen. Very interesting are the resemblances between Buddhism and the Roman form of Christianity which the author details on page 29. The book abounds with terse statements and epigrammatical generalizations. The author clings to the old view of the traditional trustworthiness of Chinese chronology, giving Confucianism a life of four thousand years, despite the fact that the researches of Mayer and La Couperie show the contrary.

The Mexican Guide. By Thomas A. Janvier. New edition. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1887. Pp. 523.

THIS is a great improvement on the 'Guide' of 1886. Much of the material of the first edition has been thoroughly recast and brought up to date, while additions of over 200 pages have been made. The principal new matter is a chapter on Language and Literature; one giving an Historical Summary; and a much-needed part, 150 pages long, on Provincial Mexico. The revision and enlargement thus effected enable us to give an even more unqualified commendation of the work than that expressed in our review of the former edition. Plan and execution are alike highly successful.

The announcement that the 'Guide' is to be an annual publication, invites criticism on a few details which ought to receive attention in the next issue. Passing over several misprints and occasional infelicitous translations—"the religious," for example, better Spanish than English—we would suggest to Mr. Janvier the need of fuller and better historical authorities than the Mexican "school histories" upon which he relies. We do not mean that his summary of Mexican history is inaccurate, to any extent, but simply that he falls into some errors almost inevitable in a condensation of a condensation. Thus, he repeats the curiously inveterate misstatement that Cortes "burned" his ships (p. 44), wrongly says that the real Remedios image was once in the great teocalli of Tenochtitlan (p. 448), and implies that Cortes had no priests with him until after the fall of the capital city, overlooking Juan Diaz and Father Olmedo, not to mention Aguilar, the deacon (p. 20). The statement is made too unguardedly (p. 46) that the first press was established and the first American book printed in 1535, by Juan Pablos. It is true that trustworthy writers assert that the 'Escala Espiritual' was published in the year mentioned, but it should have been added, we think, that no fragment of it is known to have survived, and that it is extremely doubtful if Pablos could have published it, since his date is usually given 1548–60. Prior to him was Juan Cromberger, 1540-54, and from the latter's press came the first American book any part of which is certainly in existence—the 'Manual de Adultos,' two leaves of which are still preserved. Clavigero, Veytia, and Gama should have been placed, of course, in the eighteenth, not the seventeenth century (p. 36). On p. 75, for 1864 read 1861. In the account of Protestant missions (p. 31), no mention is made of the work of the Congregationalists or of the Southern Methodists. Mr. Janvier is more sanguine than the Mexicans themselves as to the decreased extent of illiteracy. He thinks that "probably the majority" (p. 32) can now read and write, but a careful estimate made in 1885 (careful for Mexico, that is—we sympathize with Mr. Janvier's despair at Mexican statistics) placed the total at 2,500,000, or less than one-third. "The Standing Committee of Congress" (p. 18) is perhaps an adequate translation of "Comision Permanente," but it conveys a very inadequate idea of the nature and functions of that body. The ground should have been more clearly stated upon which Gen. Díaz, in the Plan of Tuxtepec, "denied the rights of the existing Government" (p. 74)—the claim, that is, that reëlection was unconstitutional. When Mr. Janvier wrote it, it was true that the "pleasing pastime of bull-fighting is prohibited within the Federal District," but it is so no longer, unfortunately. Perhaps by the time this is printed, the first "funcion" will have been given in the new Plaza de Toros in the capital, the last Congress having repealed the prohibitory law.

With the improvement to be expected in such minor matters as we have enumerated, and with a fuller treatment of provincial Mexico, still a desideratum, it may reasonably be anticipated that the forthcoming editions of this 'Guide' will make all other writings of the kind superfluous.

The Story of the Saracens, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of Bagdad. ["The Story of the Nations" series.] By Arthur Gilman, M.A. With maps, many illustrations, a chronological table, and a list of books treating the subject. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

MR. GILMAN'S 'Story' is a decided improvement upon most of the preceding volumes in the collection to which it belongs. It is of all, perhaps, the best embodiment of the plan expressed by the leading word in all the titles, and at the same time, by its fulness and measured diction, the nearest approach to a real history. Boys will read it with pleasure, and readers well posted in the wide domains of the past will find in it—thanks to the author's use of the latest and best authorities on the subject—much that is new and fresh. The book would be more valuable had more attention been bestowed upon geographical and ethnic conditions and intellectual and social developments, and less space given to personal actions and chiefly warlike exploits—often of little importance and great sameness; but, even as it is, the traits of the Saracenic people and rulers have been vividly and characteristically brought out in their various shades and alternations of native fierceness and heroic and religious exaltation, and the Oriental background has been kept in relief. Free from Christian prejudice in dealing with the Prophet of Allah and the fanatics who carried his evangel, at the point of the lance, from Medina to Poitiers and from Medina to Samarcand, the author is just as little inclined to spread a halo of romantic greatness over characters and scenes in which the sublime so nearly bordered on the barbarous.

Careless proof-reading—a general and grievous defect of the series—is responsible for a large number of misprints. We may instance "sharq," for sharq, in the first paragraph of the preface; "to called" (p. 28); "to dispose Kalid" (p. 232); "Antioch, lying directly east from Aleppo" (p. 243); "632," for 622, as the year of the Hegira (p. 260); "Emessa" (p. 297); "Semiramus" (p. 356); a succession of blunders on page 340: "Vienna [e], . . . Maçon, Chalons," "the Verres [es] and the Catilines"; and many disfigured German titles in the bibliographical list, which is otherwise very valuable. The author's own haste—a necessary consequence, we suppose, of the rapidity with which the volumes of the series are brought out in succession—is responsible for some loose expressions and some slips. The word "Roman" is very often used instead of Byzantine in a way which must be incomprehensible or misleading to most readers; we even read of "the navy of Rome" (p. 278), when the Byzantine is meant. "In the year 660, forty years after the emigration of the Prophet from Mecca"—which took place in 622—is correct only according to the Moslem calendar, which has shorter years than ours, and with reference to the more precise dates of the occurrences (p. 284). "Southeast of Nineveh and Mosul" (p. 351) is not correct, Mosul being on the site of Nineveh. Nor is "Sus, the royal Shushan of ancient Median memories" (p. 256), "Median" standing for Persian. The worst slip is "Nineveh on the Euphrates" (p. 4).

The Struggle of the Bulgarians for National Independence under Prince Alexander. A Military and Political History of the War between Bulgaria and Servia in 1885. Translated from the German of Major A. von Huhn. London: Murray. 1886.

In a little more than three hundred pages, Major A. von Huhn has narrated what he describes as the "Military and Political History of the War between Bulgaria and Servia in 1885." That the book is readable throughout no one will deny; but a very unequal value attaches to the military and political parts of the narrative. The former is a record of occurrences which passed before the eyes of the writer, and can, therefore, be accepted as an authentic account, by a thoroughly competent eye-witness, of a struggle which the critical condition of Southeastern Europe invested with a European interest. The political narrative is simply an excessive glorification of Prince Alexander and all his doings, and is largely composed, as it seems to us, out of the gossip of political quidnuncs—an abundant species, we suppose, in Bulgaria, as in every other country.

Prince Alexander, unquestionably, showed himself to be a brave and able commander in the brief war against Servia, but it cannot be denied, also, that he failed conspicuously in the first duty of a Prince of Bulgaria at the present time. That duty was to maintain cordial relations with the Czar and the Government of Russia. There is little doubt that for Russia the wisest as well as most generous policy would have been to leave the Bulgarians to the unfettered enjoyment of the freedom which Russian soldiers had won for them. By so doing she would have grappled them to her by hooks of steel. But there are few governments which, in a choice of policies, make selection of the wisest and most generous; and, having regard to the gigantic sacrifices incurred by Russia in the cause of Bulgarian independence, it was only natural that she should be excessively jealous of the intrusion of other influences into the new principality. The Czar and his advisers were all the more jealous and suspicious because they knew that whatever could be done for the destruction of their influence, without actually provoking a breach of the peace, would be attempted by the Austro-Hungarian Government, and not in any way discouraged by the British Ministry and the British Houses of Parliament. It might well appear to Russian eyes that the question at stake was not whether Bulgaria should be free or Russianized, but whether the Russian should be ousted from the province in order to give place to the German and the Magyar. Prince Alexander, in proportion to his ability to rule as an independent sovereign, must have chafed under the sense of tutelage; but he ought to have recognized that it was the condition of his ruling at all. This he did not recognize, and the loss of his crown and the present critical condition of united Bulgaria are the consequences of his want of perception.

Maj. A. von Huhn will admit nothing of this. He attributes the distrust with which Prince Alexander inspired the Russian Government to the general depravity of the Russian character. He touches lightly, however, upon this part of his hero's Bulgarian career. It is as a ruler of the Bulgarian people that he makes him the subject of his glorification. According to the Major, the achievements of the Prince, in this character, are nothing short of miraculous. Not only has he, single-handed, civilized the Bulgarians, but—a miracle, we believe, without precedent in the history of mankind—he has, by the inspiring influence of his single personality, animated the entire people with a spirit of religious toleration. The great adversary with whom he has had to contend is, of course, the Russian "agent." We confess to a feeling of despair whenever, in a book purporting to be historical, we come across this Russian "agent." The ubiquitousness of this agency is only to be paralleled by its complete inefficiency. According to Maj. A. von Huhn, Russian "agents" had been freely sprinkled over Eastern Rumelia ever since the close of the Russo-Turkish war. Yet these gentry had no idea that the design to unite the two Bulgarias was hatching until it had taken shape and action. In Bulgaria the Russian "agent" appears to have devoted his sagacious mind to the invention and circulation of scandalous gossip about Prince Alexander, with the view, we presume, of rousing the austere morality of the Bulgarian people into revolt.

The real cause of the animosity of the Russian Government against the Prince is not to be found in the silly proceedings of these intangible agents, but in a very simple and sufficient reason. Three days before the revolution broke out in Philippopolis which deposed the Turkish Governor, the Prince, in a personal interview, had assured M. de Giers that he did not believe a movement for the unification of the two provinces was likely to break out within a measurable space of time, and that, in any case, he personally would undertake nothing in that direction. When, close upon the heels of this declaration, the movement occurred, and the Prince, without a moment's hesitation, placed himself at the head of it, the Czar naturally felt that he had been deceived and insulted. Maj. A. von Huhn declares that the Prince was himself as deceived and unprepared as the Czar; and this may possibly be so. But it is hard to believe this, and if hard for an indifferent outsider, it is not strange that it was altogether incredible to the Czar.

The main facts of the war between Servia and Bulgaria are well known. The greatest danger to Bulgaria was occasioned by the fact that when the Servian army crossed the frontier, three parts of the Bulgarian troops were far away from the scene, being collected on the road to Adrianople to oppose a Turkish advance on Philippopolis. This danger was enormously increased by the order of the Czar recalling the Russian officers who were serving with the Bulgarian troops. There did not remain in consequence a single officer with Prince Alexander above the rank of captain, or one who had seen more than eight years' service. But the enthusiasm of all classes wrought marvels. The troops were transferred from the Rumelian frontier to that of Bulgaria with astonishing speed, considering the almost total lack of proper machinery for effecting the transfer. The young captains, promoted to the command of brigades and divisions, developed unexpected talents for command. The Servians, when they thought that Sophia, the Bulgarian capital, was already in their possession, were repulsed with heavy loss, after two days' severe fighting at Slivnitza. The Bulgarians then assumed the offensive. The Servians were driven back, in a demoralized condition, across the frontier. They endeavored to make a stand in the town of Pirot. But by this time the fight had been pretty well knocked out of them, and the Bulgarians had little difficulty in occupying the town. The Servian kingdom now lay open to the victors. The Servian army was mutinous, and would have disbanded itself if at all hard pressed. At this supreme moment, however, Austria stepped in, and saved its wretched tool, King Milan, from the fate to which it had exposed him. Under a threat of war, the Austrian envoy constrained Prince Alexander to stay his advance. An armistice was arranged, which was followed by a peace.

All this is told by Maj. A. von Huhn in a very lively and interesting manner. Interesting, too, for military readers, are his remarks on the causes of the Bulgarian victories. The Servian troops were, he says, a militia embodied for the purpose of the invasion, while the greater part of the Bulgarian army consisted of regiments which (as Maj. A. von Huhn sorrowfully acknowledges) had been admirably trained and disciplined by their Russian instructors. They fought, in consequence, with a unity and tenacity that did not exist among their opponents. Then the young Bulgarian officers exhibited a dash and readiness of resource, an aptitude for military command, which were really amazing. A general in command, as the Major points out, is liable to be over-cautious because he has a reputation to lose. If he wins a battle, it is no more than is expected of him; but if he loses, he loses also all that he has hitherto achieved. But a young captain suddenly placed in the position of a general has everything to gain, and risks nothing. If he fails, the worst that can be urged against him is that the experiences of a regimental officer do not suffice for the duties of a general; but if he wins, he mounts up, as it were, by a single step, into that most select class of "heaven-born generals." The main cause, however, of the Bulgarian victories was the patriotic spirit which animated the rank and file of the army.

Maj. A. von Huhn, who appears never to have heard of the Bulgarian massacres and other notorious incidents of Turkish rule, would have us believe that the Bulgarians had little to complain of at the hands of the Turkish Pashas and their underlings. But the zeal for their national existence displayed equally by Moslems and Christians, the sacrifices made by all classes of the population, belie his fanciful picture of Turkish rule. It was a war in which every Bulgarian soldier felt that he had a direct personal interest. They fought not only for freedom, but to compel an indifferent and unbelieving Europe to acknowledge that here was a people which had fairly won its right to be free. The Servians, on the other hand, were without any such animating influences, and appear to have been most inefficiently commanded as well. The handling of their artillery was particularly bad. There is a superstition in the Servian army that a special disgrace attaches to the loss of artillery; the consequence of which was that the Servians used them only at long ranges, and left their infantry unsupported by artillery fire just when these stood most in need of it. Only upon one occasion, in the succession of encounters between Slivnitza and Pirot, was a Servian battery handled with courage and thorough effectiveness, and Maj. A. von Huhn records, with pardonable pride, that this was commanded by a Prussian officer. He had been trained in a school not favorable to the growth of idle superstitions.

Goethe's Faust. A Commentary upon the Literary Bibles of the Occident. By Denton J. Snider. Boston: Ticknor & Co. 1886. 2 vols.

In one of the interesting essays of the late Wilhelm Scherer are to be found some amusing comments upon the fact that in these days every man has his own Goethe. "I know a Goethe," says Scherer, "who, when he wrote the lines,

> 'Warte nur, balde
> Ruhest du auch,' was thinking something like this: 'How tired I am with climbing the Kickelhahn; but at any rate the wind, which is usually so disagreeable here, is quiet, and, God be praised, I shall soon be in bed.'" Mr. Snider's Goethe is not of this sort, but of its polar opposite. He is a poet who wrote the First Part of "Faust" in accordance with the following "structural outline," which we quote literally from vol. i, pp. 105-106:

"I. The internal movement, which shows the struggle in Faust between Intelligence, which denies Truth, and Aspiration which affirms Truth. This is theoretical denial out of which Mephisto is generated. From the 'First Soliloquy' to 'Auerbach's Cellar.'

"II. The external movement, which shows Faust's struggle with the Perverted World, into which he is conducted by Mephisto. This is practical denial, realized not only in the action of a man, but in an institution, a world. From 'Auerbach's Cellar' to the scene called 'Gloomy Day.'

"III. The struggle in which Faust subordinates Mephisto and compels him to aid in rescuing Margaret, who, however, refuses the external rescue, but obtains forgiveness, the inner reconciliation. To the end."

Number II. of this scheme is mapped out in the table of contents thus:

"I. Auerbach's Cellar, or the Perverted Tavern.
II. The Domestic Perversion.
(1.) The Witch's Kitchen, or the Perverted Family.
(2.) The Story of Margaret, or the True Family Perverted.
III. The Social Perversion.
(1.) Walpurgis Night, or Perverted Society.
(2.) Walpurgis Night's Dream — Literary Brocken."

Mr. Snider has evidently anticipated difficulty in getting his views promptly accepted by the world. Here and there he takes his readers into his confidence, and warns them to put no faith in what the silly critics may say of him. Thus, alluding to his propensity for schematization, he says, p. 105:

"The lofty critic, we know, is on his perch, and is ready to pounce down upon these harmless diagrams, declaring that they are evolved from the writer's inner consciousness and not from the poem; for has not he, the intellectual giant and infallible critical pope, read the poem himself and found no such thing there? So he will say, because he is always saying so, having little else to say in any matter but No. Reader, do not regard him, I beg thee, he is a denier, really his brain leaves off where this Faust begins, and has never entered it, cannot enter it, in his present unregenerate condition. Test the scheme by the fact; if it is wrong, make another and better; but beware of any one who puts a zero into thy soul, lest he end by putting thy soul into a zero."

It can do no harm to admit that the raptorial instinct did begin to stir within us faintly at sight of such a prey, and if it were a simple question of putting a zero into some one's soul, we might make the pounce even now and jump the consequences. But the bare thought of incurring the awful responsibility of putting some one's soul into a zero is surely enough to make one shrink back in dismay and consternation. We keep our perch.

In other words, we pass in voiceless wonder from the outline to see what the filling-in may be. Concerning the familiar opening monologue of "Faust," this commentator discourses thus, page 145:

"Herewith, too, is derived the present form of the poem: it springs from the innermost nature and essence of the theme. The form is that of a soliloquy, of one man talking to himself and unfolding in himself. Still it is a drama, though it be a drama of the soul holding its dialogue and acting its parts all within itself. To Faust, another man with whom he might talk, can have no veritable reality, if there be, as he thinks, no veritable reality; indeed, the entire world outside of him is a high-walled, smoothed-stoned fortress, which no knowledge can scale For the present, therefore, he has only himself to talk with, hence the monologue. But out of himself he will generate certain shapes with which he may hold converse hereafter," etc., etc.

Here we must call a halt. When a man deliberately puts it down in black and white that a dramatic poem begins with a soliloquy because, in virtue of philosophic necessity, there is no one for the speaker to talk with, and because any other characters have first to be "generated" from the mind of the soliloquist, we cannot undertake to follow his lucubrations further. It is not that we are of a savage and exacting temperament. Notwithstanding Mr. Snider's poor opinion of the whole critic tribe, the writer of these lines is a person of suave and teachable disposition, with whom it is a veritable bobby to keep his mind open to the light from all quarters. He would be the last one in the world to make excessive demands upon the writer of books. But really it seems reasonable to draw the line between sense and nonsense.

We would not, however, seem too peremptory in this matter. There is much that is good in Mr. Snider's work, but we hold that its method is radically vicious. And this opinion springs from no shallow contempt for philosophy, from no lack of an organ for philosophic thought. Beyond doubt philosophy has much to say in the interpretation of "Faust," and there is much to be learned from the philosophic commentator. But there is little indeed to be learned from one who deals largely in abstractions such as found no lodgment in the mind of Goethe. This is what Mr. Snider does. To be sure, he denounces others, his predecessors, for doing the same thing, but that is ultimately because their interpretation differed greatly from his. What we say is, that if the araneous method of spinning cobwebs from one's own interior is to be adopted at all, it is a comparatively unimportant matter what particular sort of web is spun. This method we call wrong, and we call it so not simply out of prejudice for another method, but because it has been tried and found wanting. For thirty or forty years after the death of Goethe, the expounders of "Faust" nearly all went at their work in the manner of Mr. Snider. They had the field to themselves, and what they made of the poem is well known. They made of it either a Serbonian bog, or a nightmare, or a joke, according to the temper of the person who tried to read it in the light of their explanation. But now a better era has arrived. Of late the drama has been extensively studied and expounded in accordance with the principles of common sense and sound philology. The result is, that we now see the beginning of a better entente between the modern intellectual world and the great poem of its great poet. Multitudes of people have learned to read "Faust" and enjoy it. But if the poem were what Mr. Snider makes it out to be, the great majority of these people would turn from it with aversion. It would appeal to no one, except, perhaps, the small class of austere philosophers to which he himself belongs. If it were necessary, for example, to read the story of Margaret as he reads it, to put his construction upon it and to think about it as he does, the story would become to nearly all those who now read it with delight an insufferable bore, from which a tale of Zola would be a welcome relief. For they would say, Here at least is life.

We are, therefore, compelled to do substantially what the author has himself more than once surmised that all the blear-eyed, shallow-pated critics would do—namely, warn the public that the volumes before us are an exposition, not of Goethe's "Faust," but of Denton J. Snider's. As an exemplification of the araneous process, they are good—the best, perhaps, in the market. If, therefore, one admires that process; if he enjoys having a discursive philosopher between himself and his author; if he is fond of tossing on a sea of abstractions, and takes delight in a never-ending chase after world-embracing symbolisms; if he wants a guide who will always try to persuade him that every hole in the ground leads down to the roots of Ygdrasil; if, moreover, he enjoys a literary style which is surcharged with the worst mannerisms of Carlyle; if his soul is awed by capital initials, and his taste revels in grandiose rhetoric apropos of little or nothing; if he finds pleasure in sustained and highly wrought apostrophes, in astonishing figures and forms of expression, and in transcendental jerkiness generally; if, in short, a person likes that sort of thing, Mr. Snider's commentary will be just about the sort of thing he will like.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Allaire, Etienne. La Bruyère dans la maison de Condé. Études biographiques et historiques sur la fin du XVIIe siècle. 8vo. T. I and ii. Boston: Schoenhof.
Bernard, J. Retrospections of America. 1797-1811. Edited from the MS By Mrs. Bayle Bernard. With an introduction, Notes, and Index by Laurence Hutton and Brander Mathews. Illustrated. Harper & Brothers.
Bowne, Prof. B. P. Introduction to Psychological Theory. Harper & Brothers.
Carey, Rosa Nouchette. Uncle Max. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. 50 cents.
Chapman, Elizabeth Rachel. A Comtist Lover, and Other Studies. Scribner & Welford.
Delzant, Alidor. Paul de Saint-Victor. Boston: Schoenhof.
Heine, H. Travel-Pictures; including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School. Scribner & Welford.
Kingsley, C. Yeast: A Problem. Harper's Handy Series, 25 cents.
Meriwether, L. A Tramp Trip How to See Europe on Fifty Cents a Day. Harper & Brothers.
O'Connor—McWade. Gladstone, Parnell, and the Great Irish Struggle. General Introduction by Charles Stewart Parnell, M. P. Illustrated. Philadelphia: Hubbard Brothers.
Ohnet, Georges. Noir et Rose. New York: Christern.
Ohnet, G. Edmée. Les Dames de Croix Mort. Frederick Warne & Co. 25 cents.
Oliver—Walt—Jones, Profs. A Treatise on Algebra. Ithaca: Dudley F. Finch.
O'Reilly, Dr. B. Novissima; or, Where Do Our Departed Go? The Baltimore Publishing Co.
Pougin, A. Verdi: an Anecdotic History of his Works. Scribner & Welford.
Rees, J. R. The Diversions of a Book-Worm. George J. Coombes $1.25.
Roosevelt, T. Life of Thomas H. Benton. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25.
Scott, Sir W. The Lay of the Last Minstrel. Edited with Notes by W. J. Rolfe. Illustrated. Boston: Ticknor & Co. 75 cents.
Scott, Sir W. The Waverley Novels. Vols. i.-vi. Philadelphia. J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.75 per volume.
Scrivener, F. H. A. Novum Testamentum Textus Stephanici, A. D. 1550. London: Geo. Bell & Sons.
Sons and Daughters. By the Author of 'The Story of Margaret Kent.' Boston: Ticknor & Co. $1.50
Spear, J. W. Out of the Gulf. Philips & Hunt. $1.25.
Stack, E. L. Grammar and Language. An Attempt at the Introduction of Logic into Grammar. Boston: W. B. Clarke & Carruth. $2.50.
Tennyson, Lord A. Locksley Hall, Sixty Years After, etc. Harper's Handy Series. 25 cents.
Thackeray, W. M. The Virginians. Handy Edition. 2 vols. London: Smith, Elder & Co.
The Campaign of Fredericksburg. November-December, 1862. A Study for Officers of Volunteers. By a Line Officer. Scribner & Welford.
Thomas, Miss Bertha. Elizabeth's Fortune: A Novel. Harper's Franklin Square Library. 20 cents.
Thseau, L. de. Hélène. Frederick Warne & Co. 25 cents.
Towle, G. M. The Nation in a Nutshell; a Rapid outline of American History. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 50 cents.
Towle, G. M. Young People's History of Ireland. Boston: Lee & Shepard. $1.50.
Vaschalde, Henry. Olivier de Serres, sa vie et ses travaux. 8vo Boston: Schoenhof.
Von Ranke, L. History of the Latin and Teutonic Nations, from 1494 to 1514. Scribner & Welford.
Von Reber, Dr. F. History of Mediæval Art. Translated by Joseph Thacher Clarke. Illustrated. Harper & Brothers.
Warfield, Prof. B. B. An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

Fine Arts.

THE WATER-COLOR EXHIBITION.

THE twentieth annual exhibition of the American Water-Color Society at the Academy of Design comprises 656 pictures. This is a smaller number than was hung last year, but the present exhibition shows a better average quality than its immediate predecessors. While the average is good and there are fewer offensively bad pictures than have been seen in former years, it is noticeable that this exhibition is unmarked by any single conspicuously fine work; in short, there is no "sensation picture," or what the French call, in their expressive art parlance, a "clou." Mr. Abbey, to whom we have been accustomed to look for such a work, is absent, and Mr. Winslow Homer, who has at other times overtopped his contemporaries at these exhibitions, this year only sends some unimportant and not particularly attractive sketches in Florida. Mr. J. Alden Weir's picture, "Consolation," No. 335, is hung in the place of honor of the exhibition, that is, in the middle of the south wall of the south gallery. It is in many respects an excellent work. Its greatest merits are an agreeable general tone and a good quality of atmosphere; its great defects are insufficient drawing of the figures and a somewhat eccentric perspective. As it is, it is one of the best things in the exhibition, but it does not rise far enough above the other pictures to be a real clou.

"Russian Tea," No. 384, by Miss Kathleen H. Greatorex, hung at one end of the same gallery, is an important work. It shows a thorough knowledge of the medium, and, being a composition of still life, it possesses one quality that every still life should have, to claim a reason for being—beauty of color. That it is insubstantial and flimsy, that the brass urn and kettle, the china cups, and the bouquet of flowers should all be of the same texture, is unfortunate, for, had more care been taken in painting to give to each of these objects a distinctive texture, the picture would have gained a great deal. It is quite a large picture, painted in pure water color, and has the distinction of having been awarded an honorable mention at the Salon of 1886. At the other end of the south gallery is hung a picture by T. de Thulstrup, "Horse Artillery Going into Action," No. 299. The composition is striking and the figures are drawn with a certain dash and spirit, but it lacks the quality of color. Truth of color in detail is sacrificed to a general scheme of dusty reddish brown, and to such an extent that the picture is almost a monochrome. It is, however, cleverly done, and far more successful as a picture of horses and soldiers than we are wont to see from the hands of American artists. Mr. de Thulstrup's facility as an illustrator stands him in good stead in undertaking such a subject as this one, for he is accustomed to look out for general effect. We are apt to find in his pictures a completeness that is lacking in pictures made by more timid hands. "A January Thaw," No. 336, by F. Hopkinson Smith, a large picture of Madison Square looking south, remarkable for a general aspect of outdoors and the realization of an effect of New York atmosphere on a muggy day in winter; "A Tramp," No. 418, by Hamilton Hamilton, a bright effect of sunshine in a door-yard with figures; "The Scarlet Letter," No. 396, by Rhoda Holmes Nicholls, much more successful in the treatment of the landscape than in the figures of Hester Prynne and the villagers in the street of the old town where the scene is laid; and "They're Coming," No. 352, by James Symington, an interior with two figures of young women at work spinning wool, are other pictures hung in prominent places in the south gallery. We find here also a large study by Meissonier, No. 443, lent by Mr. John Jacob Astor, a single figure of a soldier of the time of Henri II., no more remarkable than what might be done by any first-rate figure painter. Though rather brutally handled, it is a good, vigorous drawing, and the pose of the soldier sturdily planted is spirited. "A Portrait," No. 431, good in character and attractive by its unaffected boyishness and good-humored expression, is by J. Alden Weir; and No. 456, "The First Snow," is an interior possessing some of the fine qualities of color of the "Consolation," but careless in drawing and hard in texture, by the same artist. "A Sea Witch," No. 329, is a handsome piece of color by George W. Maynard. It is thoroughly artistic, and impresses at once as being something quite out of the common. The half-submerged figure of the Sea Witch is a little confused in drawing, but its exceptional qualities of color make this work of Mr. Maynard's one of the most interesting pictures of the exhibition.

Seven water colors by Robert Blum are scattered about the exhibition. They are all quite small and are sketchy bits of Dutch scenes. There is not much of them, but what there is is of an excellent sort. "Costume Study," No. 199, is a small figure of a Dutch woman in white cap and apron, charmingly drawn and delightful in sentiment. Of Mr. Blum's other pictures, "On the Dunes," No. 198, and "House Duties," No. 454, may be picked out for particular mention. W. H. Lippincott, always a prominent contributor to the water-color exhibitions, and one of those who best know how to manage the fickle medium, is well represented this year. "The Approaching Storm, Crécy-en-Brie," No. 363, shows him at his best in landscape, and "The Last Rose," No. 27, although somewhat artificial, is a cleverly painted head. "Gentlemen of the XVIIIth Century," No. 271, by Léon Moran, a brilliantly handled little study; "The Country Boarder," No. 248, by F. Childe Hassam, a quietly painted light interior with a single figure; "Julius Cæsar and his Grandmother," No. 98, a negro character sketch by Alfred Kappes; "The Fortune Teller," No. 593, by Francis Miller, an unequal work, good in drawing, but crude in color; "The Favorite Print," No. 51, a delicate bit of painting by F. C. Jones; "The Student," No. 57, an ambitious work by Wm. Magrath, possessing good qualities of color and some excellent painting in the accessories, but rather weak in the drawing of the figures; "The Letter," No. 21, a dainty little composition by Percy Moran, and the half dozen pictures by Irving R. Wiles, including "Study in Sunlight," No. 187, and "Head," No. 372, are among other notable contributions from figure painters.

The landscapes in the exhibition are, as usual, numerous and of varying degrees of excellence. It is a great temptation to the tyro in water-color painting to sketch a landscape, it seems so easy. There are fewer of the meaningless daubs resulting from such attempts than in former exhibitions, and there are happily each succeeding year fewer artists and critics ready to find imaginary beauties in them. Of serious landscape work, we find some here that is really excellent. In "Moncour," No. 293, by Emil Carlsen, a picturesque French motive is admirably treated. It is fresh and true in color. D. W. Tryon, who usually sends four or five pictures, has but one this year, "Morning," No. 322, a strong realistic effect broadly washed in over a grayish-paper ground. Two pictures, suggestions rather than pictures, with a charm of their own, are by A. H. Wyant, "Pat Rooney's Farm," No. 106, and "Forenoon in Kerry," No. 278. Several crisply-handled winter scenes, such as "A Winter Piece," No. 426, and cleanly painted bits of field and sky, such as "Long Island Study," No. 298, by Bruce Crane; such pretty color schemes as the landscapes by Charles M. Dewey, "Dark Days," No. 59, and "The Autumn Light," No. 412, or those by J. Francis Murphy, "November Gray," No. 58, and "On the Lowlands," No. 388; such bright colored studies as R. W. Van Boskerck's "White Birches, Saddle River," No. 29, or "On the Edge of the Pond," No. 234; such cool and refreshing forest scenes as "Woodland Path," No. 406, by R. M. Shurtleff; such richly toned impressions as "A Harvest Moonrise," No. 83, by F. Childe Hassam, go to make up a very creditable showing in landscape.

Horatio Walker shows two good animal pictures, "Landscape and Calves," No. 34, and a flock of sheep in "Evening," No. 70. "Dutch Farmyard," by Ter Meulen, No. 377, is a fine piece of subdued color, showing a shepherd with his flock and his sheep dog at the doorway of a fold. J. A. S. Monks is represented by half-a-dozen of his characteristic studies of sheep. "Late Afternoon, Winter," No. 16, and "Repose," No. 219, perhaps best exemplify him. When we add that Henry Farrer, F. W. Freer, Edward Moran, C. Harry Eaton, Charles Warren Eaton, Matilda Brown, W. V. Birney, W. H. Drake, Perceval De Luce, Frances Richards, C. C. Curran, Rosina Emmet, W. H. Gibson, F. S. Church, Alice Hirschberg, John La Farge, H. Bolton Jones, J. C. Nicoll, F. D. Millet, Homer Martin, George H. McCord, H. W. Ranger, Henry Muhrman, F. K. M. Rehn, R. F. Zogbaum, W. J. Whittemore, C. Y. Turner, George H. Smillie, and James D. Smillie, whose work is familiar to regular visitors to the water-color exhibitions, are represented here by from one to as many as ten examples each—a fair idea of the character of the exhibition may be obtained.

It is plain that there has been a good deal of weeding out this year, since but half the works sent in to the jury for examination were hung; and while no doubt some good pictures have had the misfortune to be left out, the exhibition has gained greatly in that it presents a much more complete and good all-around appearance than heretofore. This is progress. Still, more progress may be made, and of a kind, too, that will tell immensely on the character of the exhibitions, if the artists will take more pains to find subjects peculiarly fitted for illustrations in the medium of water-color. Without being hypercritical, it may be said that the greater part of the pictures in the present exhibition might better have been painted in oil; there is so little of the true water-color quality about them. Mr. Blum's "Costume Study," or Mr. Percy Moran's "Gentlemen of the Eighteenth Century," or some of Mr. W. H. Drake's landscape motives, or Miss Greatorex's "Russian Tea," are good examples of fit subjects aptly treated in the main; and more of the sort of work shown in them, if it were to be found generally throughout the galleries, would give a distinctive character to the exhibitions which they do not at present possess in a sufficient degree.

THE ETCHING CLUB EXHIBITION.

THE New York Etching Club holds its regular exhibition this year as usual in connection with the Water Color Society, and the west gallery is entirely given up to the exhibition of etchings. There are 234 numbers in all. Such an exhibition of etchings by American artists as this one is would have been impossible a few years ago. There is great progress shown, and some half-dozen etchers have produced plates this year which would hold their own in any company. That there is still a considerable quantity of the old-fashioned trash that passed for etching in New York years ago is undeniable, but there is such a large amount of really meritorious work here to overbalance it that its effect on the general character of the exhibition is insignificant.

As a fair example of the genuine progress which has been made by our etchers, the collection of reproductive etchings made from pictures in the A. T. Stewart collection, and intended for the catalogue of that exhibition about to be published, may be cited. The plates are all small, but some of them are of great merit. "Cattle" (after Troyon), No. 11, by Wm. M. Chase, admirably suggests the rich quality of the original painting, while as an etching per se it is bold and sure in execution. "A Misty Morning" (after Michetti), No. 76, by Hamilton Hamilton, is singularly charming from its purity of tone and the delicate gradations in its subtle values. "The Month of May" (after Daubigny), No 136, by Thomas Moran, and "Landscape and Cattle" (after Troyon), No. 67, by R. Swain Gifford, remarkable for the fidelity with which the respective painters' styles are preserved in the reproduction, and the skill with which the effect is obtained; "Reminiscence of the Franco-Prussian War" (after Meissonier), No 165, by F. Raubicheck; "La Marquise" (after Madra-

20), No. 78, by W. St. John Harper; "After the Ball" (after Alfred Stevens), No. 93, by J. S. King; and two little bits of "Objects of Art," Nos. 210 and 211, by Sidney L. Smith, all of the best sort of modern work, are among the other things in this Stewart collection that are so well done as to call for special praise. It must be remembered that reproductive work permits of less liberty of treatment than is possible in an original etching. It is a question of faithfully copying an original and at the same time attempting to render, in a form of art presenting many trying technical difficulties, the spirit of this original, which in the case of oil painting has been done in a medium capable of much more than can be obtained with the simple line and tone of etching. That the reproductive etchings just mentioned are so successful is a gratifying proof that some of our etchers have reached a high degree of technical excellence. In the same field we find a large etching by Hamilton Hamilton. "The Communicants" (after Jules Breton), No. 75. Mr. Hamilton occupies a well-earned place in the front rank of American etchers. He has done nothing better than this plate. He is not afraid to use frank, vigorous lines, there is no trace of tricks in printing, and his work is an exceptional example of completeness among the large etchings in the exhibition. Mr. Hamilton also exhibits a large etching, "The Hanging of the Crane" (after F. C. Jones), No. 72, which, though it is marked by a fine breadth of effect and well-understood management of large masses of light and shadow, is a coarser kind of work, and does not show in any part of it such delicacy as we find in the treatment of the children's white robes, for instance, in "The Communicants."

"When the Harbor Bar is Moaning," No. 85, by Thomas Hovenden, a large etching showing a fisherman's hut and two figures of women at the doorway, is the same composition as his picture exhibited at an Academy exhibition a year or two ago. It is an important figure work, serious in conception and strong in execution. It is preeminent in work of its class in the exhibition. "Boy with Kettle" (after Murillo), No. 220, and "Portrait of a Man" (after Rembrandt), No. 221, by C. Y. Turner, are of the best figure work here. "The Portrait" is especially successful, and is etched with great vigor and sureness.

"The Fog Whistle," No. 16, and "The Narrows," No. 17, by Reginald Cleveland Coxe, are two original etchings that call for special notice. Mr Coxe has been known in New York for three or four years as a painter of marine subjects, whose pictures, while sometimes impressive for an evident truth of observation, often showed such a hesitating and insufficient execution as to prevent their sincerity of intention being taken for all it was worth. This was notably so in the case of a picture exhibited three years ago by Mr. Coxe, called "Hells Rock," which provoked generally the most adverse criticism, while a few held that if not in itself a completely successful work, it was at least a very original one, and that the artist's future work would prove his quality. Whether Mr. Coxe can be said to have since fulfilled the expectations of his supporters in his pictures in oil or not, he has made his début as an etcher with two of the most interesting things in the present exhibition. "The Fog Whistle" shows a sloop yacht riding over the heavy ocean swell in a thick fog, the bowsprit rising high in the air as the stanch little craft is lifted by the rolling mass of water. The feeling of salt-water atmosphere and the dampness of the fog is exceedingly well rendered. "The Narrows," an ocean steamer slowly ploughing up the bay in the distance, and a small rowboat with two men in it in the foreground, is remarkable for the same quality of atmosphere. Both are deliciously suggestive of the sea. If these etchings do not show such a simplicity of technique as is to be found in what we consider standard work, the execution, though somewhat timid and uncertain, suffices to express the artist's idea. It is refreshing to find something out of the beaten track in art, and Mr. Coxe's etchings are well worth looking at because they are both novel and good.

"Shades of Night," No. 99, is one of a number of good landscapes contributed by W. L. Lathrop, and possesses a charming quality of atmosphere. The sky is simply done and is light and full of air. Charles A. Platt, one of the most productive of American etchers, and one whose works recommend themselves to lovers of the art on account of their genuine feeling for the picturesque and a simple and direct manner of putting down facts, exhibits a characteristic piece called "Goldsmith's Bridge," No. 158. Other new landscapes are "Canal in Holland" (after R. W. Van Boskerck), No. 203, by W. H. Shelton; "Tromsöe, Norway," No. 156, by T. C. Parrish; "Cannes—The Harbor," No. 149, by Stephen Parrish; "A Winter Morning," No. 141, by J. C. Nicoll; "An October Evening," No. 198, by H. Pruett Share; and some picturesque bits by Blanche Dillaye, "Hill and Sky," No. 20, "On the Maas," No. 23, and "A Corner in Dort," No. 21.

The Etching Club publishes a catalogue illustrated with eight etchings by Samuel Colman, F. W. Freer, R. Swain Gifford, W. St. John Harper, J. A. S. Monks, Thomas Moran, W. H. Shelton, and C. Y. Turner. It is neatly got up and is valuable as a record of the club's excellent work.

JUST PUBLISHED.

REMSEN'S ELEMENTARY CHEMISTRY.

A TEXT-BOOK FOR BEGINNERS.

By Ira Remsen, Prof. in Johns Hopkins Univ. 12mo (American Science Series, Elementary Course), pp. 272, $1.00.

In the opinion of the author, a rational course in chemistry, whether for younger or older pupils, is something more than a lot of statements of facts of more or less importance; a lot of experiments of more or less beauty; or a lot of rules devised for the purpose of enabling the pupil to tell what things are made of. If the course does not to some extent help the pupil to think as well as to see, to reason as well as to observe, it does not deserve to be called rational.

The object of the course laid down in this book is not to make chemists, but to help to develop sound minds, and at the same time to awaken interest in a set of natural phenomena of great importance to mankind.

A copy of the above will be sent, post-paid, to a teacher, for examination with a view to introduction, upon receipt of 50 cents and reference to the Nation.

HENRY HOLT & CO.,
29 West 23d St., New York.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL,

to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

French, German, Spanish, Italian.

You can, by ten weeks' study, master either of these languages sufficiently for every-day and business conversation, by Dr. Rich. S. Rosenthal's celebrated Meisterschaft System. Terms, $5.00 for books of each language, with privilege of answers to all questions, and correction of exercises. Sample copy, Part I., 25 cents. Liberal terms to Teachers.

MEISTERSCHAFT PUBLISHING CO.,
Herald Building, Boston, Mass.

New and Cheap Editions
OF Valuable Books,
SELECTED FROM
Frederick Warne & Co.'s List.

THE PERCY ANECDOTES: Collected and Edited by Reuben and Sholto Percy. A verbatim reprint of the original edition, with a preface by John Timbs, F.S.A. 4 volumes, 12mo, half cloth, marble sides and edges, $6.

PEPYS. Memoirs of Samuel Pepys, Esq., F.R.S., comprising his Diary from 1659 to 1669 and a selection from his private correspondence. Edited by Lord Braybrooke. 1 vol., 12mo, half cl., marble sides and edges, $1.50.

LIVES OF THE MOST EMINENT ENGLISH POETS, with critical observations on their works, by Samuel Johnson, LL.D., with a sketch of the author's life by Sir Walter Scott. 1 vol., 12mo, half cl., marble sides, $1.50.

EVELYN. Memoirs of John Evelyn, Esq., F.R.S. Comprising his Diary from 1641 to 1706, and a selection of his familiar letters. Edited from the original MSS. by William Bray, Esq., F.A.S. 1 vol., 12mo, clo., $1.50.

THE KORAN; Commonly called the Alkoran of Mohammed. Translated into English from the original Arabic. With explanatory notes taken from the most approved commentators. To which is prefixed a preliminary discourse. By George Sale. 1 vol., half cloth, marble sides and edges, $1.50.

LORD BACON: The Essays of, including his moral and historical works, Wisdom of the Ancients, New Atlantis, etc. With Memoir, Notes, and Glossary. 1 vol., half clo., marble sides, $1.50.

THOMAS ROSCOE: The Italian Novelists. The Spanish Novelists. The German Novelists. Translated from the originals, with critical and biographical notices, by Thomas Roscoe. 3 vols., 12mo, cloth, $4.50, or sold separately at $1.50 per vol.

THE TALMUD: Selections from the contents of that ancient book, its commentaries, teachings, poetry, and legends. Also, brief sketches of the men who made and commented upon it. Translated from the original by H. Polano. 1 vol., 12mo, clo., $1.50.

FIRDAUSI: The Shâh Nâmeh of the Persian Poet. Translated and abridged in Prose and Verse by Jas. Atkinson, Esq., Edited by his son. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.

 Of all booksellers, or mail free on receipt of price.
20 Lafayette Place, N. Y. City.

Gray's Botanies.

GRAY'S BOTANICAL SERIES.

By Prof. Asa Gray of Harvard University. provide the best and most complete equipment for all classes or for special students.

GRAY'S HOW PLANTS GROW. For Introduction..... $ .80
GRAY'S SCHOOL AND FIELD BOOK. For Introduction..... 1.80
GRAY'S MANUAL. For Introduction.. 1.62
GRAY'S BOTANIST'S MICROSCOPE. Two lenses..... 2.00
GRAY'S BOTANIST'S MICROSCOPE. Three lenses..... 2.50

Write for circulars of other works in the series.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
753 Broadway, New York,
149 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

THE CRIMEAN JOURNEY OF CATHERINE II.

LETTRES DU PRINCE DE LIGNE à la Marquise de Coigny pendant l'année. 1787. Paris Librairie Jouaust, 1886. 12mo, $1.00. (Reviewed in the Nation of January 22, 1887.)

Sent, post free, on receipt of price by DUPRAT & CO., 5 East 17th St., N. Y. Catalogues of JOUAUST and TAUCHNITZ Libraries on application.

WALTER B. SAUNDERS 33 and 35 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.
Fine Art, Illustrated, Rare and Curious
BOOKS.
Priced Catalogues issued and sent upon application.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANguages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1129. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

JUST PUBLISHED:

Life and Works of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, K.G.

By Edwin Hodder, with portrait. 3 Volumes, 8vo, extra cloth. Price, $7.50.

The late Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, was the most famous philanthropist of his time. Before his death, he put all the material for his biography in the hands of a friend, and this assures us that the present work is a complete record of his beautiful life.

The Common Chord.

A Story of the Ninth Ward. By Henry R. Elliot, Author of 'The Bassett Claim.' One volume, 12mo, extra cloth, $1.00.

A well-known critic says of it: "Piquant, very original, and deeply interesting."

The Practical Horsekeeper.

By George Fleming, LL.D., F.R.C.V.S. One volume, extra cloth, $2.00.

Horsemanship has now become one of the necessary accomplishments of fashionable life, and this volume, written by the Veterinary Surgeon of the British Army, is therefore timely and of interest.

Cassell's Public School French Reader.

Grammatically graduated. By Guillaume S. Conrad. One Volume. Price $1.00.

Every student of the French language will acknowledge that this volume fills a long-felt want.

A Plucky One.

By Mrs. Geo. E. Spencer, author of 'Salt Lake Fruit,' 'The Story of May,' etc., etc. 1 volume, 12mo, cloth extra. Price, $1.25.

"Thoroughly American in its character, scenes, incidents, and descriptions; pure in tone, and yet true to life. A vivid picture of mining life in Nevada at the present time, based on personal experience, and mainly on absolute facts."

As Common Mortals.

A Novel. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"A strong story, the scene of which is laid in the city of Brooklyn, and will be read with the greatest interest and feeling."

Send for complete descriptive catalogue of Illustrated and Fine Art Books, Juvenile and Educational Works, which will be sent free to any address on application.

Cassell & Company,

LIMITED,

739 AND 741 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Roberts Brothers'

NEW BOOKS

A Valuable Historical Work.

FRANKLIN IN FRANCE.

From original documents, most of which are now published for the first time. By EDWARD E. HALE and EDWARD E. HALE, Jr. With a steel portrait from a painting by Van Loo, two portraits on wood by Chapman and de Carmontelle, and medallion portrait by J. B. Nini, together with numerous vignette portraits of noted contemporaries. One volume. 8vo. Cloth. Gilt top. Price, $3.00.

When Benjamin Franklin died, in 1790, he left to his grandson, Wm. Temple Franklin, the largest collection of his papers. This collection, which had been supposed to be irrevocably lost, was found a few years since on the top shelf of an old tailor's shop in St. James's, became the property of Mr. Henry Stevens, and finally of the United States. From this collection and from other original documents, this life of 'Franklin in France' has been written.

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR.

By HONORÉ DE BALZAC. Uniform with 'Père Goriot,' 'The Duchesse de Langeais,' 'César Birotteau,' 'Eugénie Grandet,' and 'Cousin Pons.' 12mo. Half morocco. French style. Price, $1.50.

DIANA OF THE CROSSWAYS.

By GEORGE MEREDITH. Uniform with 'Richard Feverel,' 'Evan Harrington,' 'Harry Richmond,' 'Sandra Belloni,' 'Rhoda Fleming,' 'Vittoria,' in our new 12mo edition, bound in English cloth, uncut. Price, $2.00.

MARGARET OF ANGOULEME,

Queen of Navarre. By A. MARY F. ROBINSON, author of 'Emily Brontë.' Being the fourteenth volume in the "Famous Women Series." 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

NEW CONNECTICUT.

An Autobiographical Poem. By A. BRONSON ALCOTT. Edited by F. B. SANBORN. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.25.

After his eightieth year Mr. Alcott conceived the idea of writing an autobiographical poem, and had partly executed it when he was stricken with apoplexy. Three parts of this poem were completed, and are here published. The fourth part is incomplete, and has been edited from material prepared by Mr. Alcott.

THROUGH THE GATES OF GOLD.

A Fragment of Thought. 16mo. Limp cloth. Price, 50 cents.

The book deals with problems of the future life in an unusual manner, and it is believed that it will make as much of a sensation as did 'The Gates Ajar.' Its simultaneous publication in London has been arranged for.

Sold by all booksellers. Mailed postpaid by the publishers,

ROBERTS BROTHERS,

BOSTON.

DAVID SWING

Says of Carpenter's new poem, "LIBER AMORIS" — "It is unique, rich, lofty, and beautiful. Great as is the empire of books, reaching from classic times to the present, and including all languages and races, and all styles of thought and emotion, yet there is a place for this a place which no other work of art can fill."

LIBER AMORIS,

"The most powerful work of creative literature that has come from Boston in years. . . . The author touches the height of dramatic intensity. . . . Fascinating bits of description of the stubborn old Puritan town," says the Star, of Eynner's new romance of Colonial Massachusetts, entitled

AGNES SURRIAGE.

Attracting unprecedented interest and the highest praise of critical authorities. "I think the studies of Forbes, Miriam, and Mrs. Reese, all three, exceptionally true and fine. It is a brave book, a story which searches out the byways of the heart, and is strongly and fearlessly told," says Louise Chandler Moulton of the new novel, published by the Ticknors, by the author of 'The Story of Margaret Kent,' entitled

SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

TICKNOR & CO.,

BOSTON.

BANGS & CO.,

739 and 741 Broadway, New York,

WILL SELL AT AUCTION,

February 23, 24, & 25, at 3 and 7:30 P.M.,

The third part of the valuable collection of Autographs, made by the late Lewis J. Cist of Cincinnati.

 Catalogues mailed upon application to the Auctioneers.*

For One-third of a Century

PARK & TILFORD

and ACKER, MERRALL & CONDIT

HAVE SOLD THE

DIAMOND HAMS

CURED BY

S. DAVIS, JR. & CO., Cincinnati.

GERMAN SIMPLIFIED.

An eminently practical new method for learning the German language. Edition for self-instruction, in 12 numbers (with keys), at 10 cents each; school edition (without keys), bound in cloth, $1.25. For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by Prof. A. Knoflach, 140 Nassau St., New York. Prospectus free.

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 131

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 134

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Veto 136
The Duty of the Assembly Committee 136
The Pope's Interference in Germany 137

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
The Late Lord Iddesleigh 138
Another View of the Daily Press in Italy 139
Dumas's "Francillon" 139

CORRESPONDENCE:
"Influential" 140
Ways and Means 142
A Question for Katheder Socialists 142
"American" Architecture 142
How to Collect a Library 142
The Soldier's Patriotism 142

NOTES 143

REVIEWS:
Dowden's Shelley 146
Recent Novels 147
Walker's Second Army Corps 149
The Mammalia in their Relation to Primeval Times 149
Cannibals and Convicts 150
Sketches from English History 151
The Two Spies 151

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 151

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.

Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

Scale of Agate lines.

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27. — 5

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top. — 10

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding. — 15

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION of THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gillig & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL — A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE. — A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls. MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887. Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI- tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY-HALL SCHOOL (59th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the Institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 231 W. Chester Park, Back Bay Extension.

FRENCH HOME FOR YOUNG LADY Students, 13th year; thorough teaching; French spoken exclusively; number limited. Refers to patrons. MADAME THOMAS.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT AD- mits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

ADAMS ACADEMY. — PREPARA- tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886. For all information address WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE- paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI- tute. Full preparatory, with shorter college course. HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal. Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D.

NEW JERSEY, Princeton.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL, SPECIAL reference, President James McCosh. Prepares thoroughly and quickly for Princeton and all colleges and Scientific Schools. One vacancy for third term. Address J. B. GREENOUGH, Head Master.

NEW YORK, Hempstead, L. I.

HEMPSTEAD INSTITUTE. — ES- tablished 1861.
A thorough English, Classical, and Commercial Boarding School, conducted upon the Military System. Primary, Intermediate, Higher English, College Preparatory, and Commercial Courses. Spring term begins February 14, 1887. For catalogue, giving particulars as to location, terms, conditions of admission, references, etc., address the Principal.

NEW YORK, New Hartford, near Utica.

MRS. COLLIER'S SCHOOL for YOUNG girls from six to sixteen. Open the entire year.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys. WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. CHARLOTTE MAY WILKIN- son's Home School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Beautiful and healthful situation on the hills above Syracuse. School year begins Sept. 14, 1887. Refers to Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, George Wm. Curtis, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Hon. Andrew D. White, Louisa May Alcott, James B. Angell, LL.D., Hon. George V. N. Lothrop.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

OHIO, Cincinnati, Mt. Auburn.

MR. RIX'S HOME and DAY SCHOOL. Prepares for any College or Scientific School. Military Drill. WM. S. RIX, A.M., Prin.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies.
Students prepared for College.
Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise.
Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia.

THE BERLITZ SCHOOL OF LAN- guages.
Philadelphia, 1523 Chestnut Street.
New York, 23 W. 23d Street and 627 Madison Avenue.
Brooklyn, 26 Court Street.
Boston, 154 Tremont Street.
Washington, 723 14th Street, N. W.
Superior native teachers. Conversational lessons a specialty in small classes, $10 per term: also private instruction. Trial lesson free. Terms begin any time.

Teachers.

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER OF Articulation wants a position as governess to a deaf child. Good references. Address H. C. W., care Nation.

AN EXPERIENCED PROFESSOR OF modern languages, music, and drawing desires a summer engagement. Address Mr. HERRENBERG, Trinity School, Tivoli-on-Hudson, N. Y.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

JOHN W. DALZELL, PRIVATE TU- tor, 15 Applan Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

School Agencies.

BARDEEN'S SCHOOL BULLETIN Agency, Syracuse, N. Y., may be depended on to furnish suitable teachers, and to inform no others.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

SCHOOL AGENCY.—Oldest and best known in the United States. Estab'd 1855. J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., 7 East 14th St., New York.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free. E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

UNION TEACHERS' AGENCY, 16 Astor Place, New York City. W. D. KERR, Secretary. Send for circulars, and list of places filled.

Wants.

WANTED.—A PRACTICAL JOUR- nalist as managing editor of a non-literary monthly magazine of established reputation. Must be thoroughly familiar with office work, experienced in preparing MSS. for the press, suggesting illustrations, etc. Address, stating qualifications, past experience, and salary expected, J. S. B., P. O. Box 794, New York.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE
School of Political Science.

This school begins the second session of its seventh year February 10, 1887. Its faculty consists of ten professors and lecturers. It offers (1886-7) eight courses in political and constitutional history, nine in political economy, five in constitutional and administrative law, four in diplomacy and international law, three in Roman law and comparative jurisprudence, two in political philosophy, and one in bibliography—in all 42 hours per week through the academic year. The full course of study covers three years. Regular students (such as have completed the junior year in any college) receive at the end of the first year the degree of A.B.; at end of second, A.M.; at end of third, Ph.D. Graduates of other colleges admitted to advanced standing as candidates for A.M. and Ph.D. Students of the School of Political Science admitted to all courses in the Schools of Arts and Law, without additional tuition fee. There are offered to students four fellowships of $250 and a prize of $150; and to graduates three prize lectureships at $500 each.

SPECIAL STUDENTS admitted to any course without examination, upon payment of proportional fee. Circulars of information sent upon application.

F. A. P. BARNARD, LL.D., President.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars. Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

7 2/3 0/0 CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures. Capital $600,000 Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets. AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

N. Y. INFORMATION CO., 693 B'way, New York.—Books, Indexing and Researches.

JAPANESE FAIRY TALES.

G. P. Putnam's Sons,

27 and 29 West 23d St., New York,

Have just received from Tokio limited editions of the following JAPANESE FAIRY TALES, printed in 16mo, fully illustrated, and selling each at the uniform price of 40 cents:

I. MOMOTARO; or, Little Peachling.

II. SHITAKIRI SUZUME; or, The Tongue-Cut Sparrow.

III. SARU-KANI KASSEA; or, The Monkey and the Crab.

IV. HAUASKI JIJI, or, Blossoms from Dead Trees.

V. KACHI-KACHI YAMA; or, The Farmer and the Badger.

VI. MEDZUMI NO YOME-IRI; or, The Mouse's Wedding.

VII. KOBUTORI; or, The Old Man and the Devils.

VIII. URASHIMA; or, The Fisher Boy.

The above will be sent by mail, paid, on receipt of price.

NEW FRENCH BOOKS.

Good, Pure, Interesting French Reading. Just Published:

LA BELLE-NIVERNAISE. By Alphonse Daudet. 18mo, 25 cents.

This charming little story, with its graphic portrayal of life on the Seine, its delicate character touches, its delightful humor and pure sentiment is likely to render it one of the most popular of the series of CONTES CHOISIS of which it forms the eleventh number. It has just appeared in Paris, where it has been one of the most popular of the holiday books.

L'OMBRA. By A. Gennevraye. 12mo, 60 cents.

This is an interesting romance by an author little known in America, but well and favorably known to French readers abroad. The scene is laid in high life both in Italy and England, and the story is full of incident with strongly drawn characters—the heroine being an Italian Countess who possesses a superb voice, and who is induced to use it in opera on several occasions, under the name of "L'Ombra." It is well written, and will prove an excellent addition to the series of romans Choisis of which it is the seventh number.

LES MALHEURS DE SOPHIE. By Mme. la Comtesse de Segur. 12mo, paper, 60 cents; cloth, $1.00.

This amusing child's story, which has become a classic to French children, comprises the initial number of a series to be known as Bibliothèque Choisie pour la Jeunesse, and which teachers and mothers will find excellently adapted for the entertainment or instruction of their little ones.

Catalogues of both series and full catalogue of imported French books sent free on application by the publisher,

WILLIAM R. JENKINS,

850 Sixth Avenue, New York.

FOREIGN BOOKS.

Book-buyers wishing to receive the Catalogues of dealers in second-hand books in England, France, Germany, Italy, etc., will please apply for them, stating specialties. Orders promptly filled. Rare books procured and Auction Sales attended to, here and abroad.

Not buying for stock ourselves, our patrons are certain to receive what they order through us, however good the bargain.

B. WESTERMANN & CO., New York

838 Broadway. [Established 1848.]

Dorothy Wordsworth.

A Biographical Sketch of the Sister of the Poet.

By Edmund Lee. 12mo, cloth, gilt tops, $1.25.

A writer in "Blackwood's" has described the relation of the sister to the brother in the very expressive terms: "it was not that she visibly or consciously aided or stimulated him, but that she was him—a second pair of eyes to see, a second and more delicate intuition to discern, a second heart to enter into all that came before their mutual observation. This union was so close that it becomes difficult to discern which is the brother and which is the sister. She was part, not only of his life, but of his imagination."

"This charming book is exceedingly graceful in style, abounds in interest from the first page to the last; in fact, it is one of the most delightful biographies written for many a day."—Utica, N. Y., Press.

The Squire of Sandal Side.

By Amelia E. Barr, author of 'Jan Vedder's Wife,' 'A Daughter of Fife,' 'The Bow of Orange Ribbon.' 12mo, cloth, $1.

"Mrs. Barr has given us a pastoral story, charming and many-colored, with delightful pictures of the home life of the Cumberland dalesmen, of their strange superstitions, which have come down to them from the days of the Vikings, of their pastoral occupations, their pride, and their integrity. It is refreshing to fall upon such a book as this. It has an idyllic charm that soothes and subdues, and amid the roar and stir of our restless life we catch, while reaching it, glimpses of the sights and echoes of the sounds of a vanished Arcadia."—Philadelphia Record.

DODD, MEAD & COMPANY,

NEW YORK.

BRENTANO BROTHERS,

5 Union Square, New York.

PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, STATIONERS, NEWS-DEALERS, MUSIC DEALERS AND IMPORTERS.

English, French, German, Spanish, and Italian Books, including not only the latest novelties, but a complete stock of Classics always on hand. Send for catalogues. Full line of foreign magazines and papers. Any book furnished, no matter where published.

LE FRANCAIS,

REVUE MENSUELLE DE GRAMMAIRE ET DE LITTÉRATURE.

JEAN DE PEIFFER, Rédacteur,
Principal Dep. of Languages,

New England Conservatory, Franklin Square,

BOSTON, MASS.

. . . The best French periodical ever founded in this country. . . .—The Nation.

HOMŒOPATHY.—The genuineness of Homœopathic medicines cannot easily be determined by ordinary chemical tests, and the buyer must depend on the good faith of the house preparing them almost entirely. Of the thirty-six houses so engaged, ours is the oldest—established in 1835—the largest, having eight pharmacies, and the only one ever awarded World's Fair medals (we have four first-class, besides diplomas) for the purity and excellence of its preparations. New York pharmacies, 7 W. 42d St. and 145 Grand St., near Broadway. Laboratories, 1011 Arch St., Philadelphia, also branches in Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh, and Chicago. Complete stocks of books and medicines are kept at all our pharmacies. BOERICKE & TAFEL.

NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

THE EPOCH,

THE NEW WEEKLY PAPER.

FIRST NUMBER NOW READY.

PRICE 10 CENTS PER COPY.

CONTENTS:

EDITORIAL COMMENTS.
THREE VIEWS OF THE PARTISAN ACTIVITY OF PUBLIC OFFICERS:
1. A REPUBLICAN'S VIEW.....Elihu Root.
2. AN INDEPENDENT'S VIEW.....Carl Schurz.
3. A DEMOCRAT'S VIEW.....Edward M. Shepard.
WRITTEN IN A COPY OF "UNDER THE OLIVE" (Sonnet).....R. H. Stoddard.
SOME OF MY FAVORITE BOOKS (Part I.)
.....Julian Hawthorne.
AFTERNOON TEAS.....Robert Grant.
AN EXPERIMENT IN TRANSGRESSION (A Story—Part I.).....Prof. H. H. Boyesen.
THE DRAMA.....G. E. Montgomery.
MUSIC.....Henry T. Finck.
FINANCE.
BOOK REVIEWS.
LITERARY NOTES.

PUBLISHED BY THE

Epoch Publishing Co.,

36 Union Square, New York.

The Crimean Journey of Catherine II.

LETTRES DU PRINCE DE LIGNE à la Marquise de Coigny pendant l'année, 1787. Paris, Librairie Jouaust, 1886. 16mo, $1.00. (Reviewed in the Nation of January 22, 1887.)

Sent, post free, on receipt of price by DUPRAT & CO., 5 East 17th St., N. Y. Catalogues of JOUAUST and TAUCHNITZ Libraries on application.

THE MORAVIAN RAG DOLL,

to quote a prominent writer, "is the most Christian-looking and beautifully dressed doll I have ever seen; my children are delighted with it." $3 (night dress 30 cents extra), carefully packed, registered, and post-paid. A most welcome gift at all times. Full description most cheerfully given. "DOLLS," Box 185, Bethlehem, Pa.

F. W. CHRISTERN,

39 West Twenty-third Street, New York,

Importer of Foreign Books, Agent for the leading Paris Publishers, Tauchnitz's British Authors, Teubner's Greek and Latin Classics. Catalogue of stock mailed on demand. A large assortment always on hand, and new books received from Paris and Leipzig as soon as issued.

WALTER B. SAUNDERS 33 and 35 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Fine Art, Illustrated, Rare and Curious

BOOKS.

Priced Catalogues issued and sent upon application.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

BOOK CHAT shows at a glance every article appearing in the current magazines of the world, by subject; also gives digest of all new books. Samples, 10 cents; $1.00 per year.
BRENTANO BROS., 5 Union Square, New York.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANguages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

Back Numbers of "The Nation."

In response to frequent inquiries from subscribers:

An incomplete set of the Nation has little or no market value. Partial sets, bound and unbound, are always obtainable (usually lacking the earliest volumes), and do not command high rates, the bindings generally counting for nothing. Volume I. has readily brought $10 and upward when complete, but will bring very little in proportion if a single number is missing. Volumes II. and III. are also scarce, but not so high-priced as the first.

Complete sets, both bound and unbound, have sold for $100, with tolerably quick bidders, and have an increasing value year by year.

Single numbers not more than a year old can usually be supplied by the publishers at 10 cents each. For numbers more than a year old purchasers are referred to Mr. J. W. Christopher, 47 Dey St., New York, dealer in back numbers of periodicals, who can frequently supply them, having purchased, a few years ago, a large quantity from the publishers. Mr. A. S. Clark, 34 Park Row, also has a stock on hand.

The publishers no longer undertake to buy or sell numbers or volumes more than a year old, and can only recommend sellers or purchasers to negotiate with a dealer, or to advertise in the Nation.

[Publication was begun July 1, 1865. Vol. I. comprising the last half-year. Two volumes per year have since been issued. Vol. XLIII. comprising the last half-year of 1886.]

is offered and described in our

CATALOGUE No. 393, which this year we send out in an illuminated cover. The Catalogue is replete with new engravings of the choicest flowers and vegetables, many of which can only be obtained from us; and contains, besides, 2 beautiful colored plates, and very full instructions on all garden work. Altogether it is the best ever offered by us, and, we believe, is the most complete publication of its kind ever issued. Mailed on receipt of 10 cents (in stamps), which may be deducted from first order. Please be sure to order Catalogue by the number.

PETER HENDERSON & CO. 35 & 37 Cortlandt St., NEW YORK.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

Verdi: An Anecdotic History of His Life and Works.

By ARTHUR POUGIN. With Portrait and Facsimile. Translated from the French by James E. Matthew. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, $2.00.

"We could easily linger over M. Pougin's charming volume, which is so full of matter worth quoting that the difficulty of the reviewer consists in knowing what to select. It is long since a more readable and fascinating book has come under our notice."—London Athenæum.

"This publication is very timely. It comes just when most wanted, and enables musical readers to study every stage of the fortunate career which now is reaching its climax and consummation."—Daily Telegraph.

"This extremely interesting volume will be much appreciated in the musical world."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Studies in Religious History.

By ERNEST RENAN.

Post 8vo, cloth (481 pp.), $2.40.

Contents: Experimental Method Applied to Religion, Paganism, Comparative Mythology, First Works on Buddhism, New Works on Buddhism, The Translations of the Bible, The Teaziehs of Persia, Joachim di Flor and the Eternal Gospel, Francis of Assisi, A Monastic Idyl of the XIIIth Century, Religious Art, The Congregatione "de Auxilis," A Word upon Galileo's Trial, Port Royal, Spinoza.

Handbook to Robert Browning's Works.

By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR. Second edition, revised, foolscap 8vo, cloth, $2.25.

"Taken as a whole, this book—and it is no ordinary undertaking—bears evidence throughout of that courage, patience, knowledge, and research, and, last but not least, that lightness and firmness of hand which are essential in dealing with the work of a master whose art ranges so high, so wide, and so deep."—Academy.

Karma.

A novel by A. P. SINNETT, author of 'The Occult World' and 'Esoteric Buddhism.' 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.40.

PREPARING FOR IMMEDIATE PUBLICATION.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Campan's Marie Antoinette.

The Private Life of Marie Antoinette, Queen of France and Navarre, with Sketches and Anecdotes of the Court of Louis XVI.

By JEANNE LOUISE HENRIETTE CAMPAN, First Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen. New edition, in 1 volume, with 4 Portraits on steel. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.25.

"Despite the stupendous mass of literature which exists in reference to the French Revolution and its antecedents, Madame Campan's 'Memoirs of Marie Antoinette' still supply the most vivid, and, as some writers say, 'matterful' collection of statements about the Queen. Perhaps there is still no single book of anecdotic history which may be read with such advantage."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

CONTAINING

STANDARD WORKS of EUROPEAN LITERATURE in the ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference,

Comprising in all Translations from the French, German, Italian, Spanish, Scandinavian, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, and Greek.

687 Volumes, $1.40 or $2 each, with exceptions.

RECENT ADDITIONS.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE LATIN AND TEUTONIC NATIONS. Translated by P. A. Ashworth, Translator of Dr. Gneist's 'History of the English Constitution.'

HEINE'S TRAVEL-PICTURES: including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School. Translated by Francis Storr. With Appendices and Map.

GOETHE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH ZELTER. Selected, Translated, and Edited by A. D. Coleridge, M.A.

THE STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF HISTORICAL GEOLOGY. By A. J. Jukes-Browne, B.A., F.G.S., of the Geological Survey of England and Wales. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations.

WERNER'S TEMPLARS IN CYPRUS. Translated by E. A. M. Lewis.
"Werner was a Freemason, and his religious notions were, at the date of his writing this poem, of a theosophic order."—Preface.

PAUSANIAS'S DESCRIPTION OF GREECE. Translated into English, with Notes and Index, by A. R. Shilleto, M.A. 2 vols.

HOFFMANN'S TALES. The Serapion Brethren. First Portion, containing Thirteen Tales. Translated from the German by Major A. Ewing.

HAUFF'S TALES. The Caravan—The Sheik of Alexandria—The Inn in the Spessart. Translated by S. Mendel.

GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. A New Edition, containing pieces hitherto uncollected and a Life of the Author, with Notes from Various Sources. By J. W. M. Gibbs. 5 vols.

FOSTER'S ESSAY ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF TIME. Together with Notes of Sermons and other Pieces.

CHRISTIAN ICONOGRAPHY; or, The History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. By the late A. N. Didron. Translated from the French by E. J. Millington, and completed, with Additions and Appendices, by M. Stokes. 2 vols., with numerous Illustrations.

TALFOURD'S LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. With Explanatory Notes. New Edition, Revised and Greatly Enlarged by W. Carew Hazlitt. 2 vols.

HAZLITT'S SPIRIT OF THE AGE; or, Contemporary Portraits. New Edition. By W. C. Hazlitt.

A SELECTION.

ANTONINUS.—THE THOUGHTS OF M. AURELIUS.
BAX'S MANUAL OF THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (Centenary Edition, edited by Napier). 6 vols.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols. Translated.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols.
FAIRHOLT'S COSTUME IN ENGLAND. (Dillon.) 2 vols.
HUGO'S (VICTOR) POEMS. Translated.
MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols.
PEPYS' DIARY. 4 vols.
RICHTER'S LEVANA.
RICHTER'S FLOWER, FRUIT, AND THORN PIECES.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. Translated. 2 vols.
STAUNTON'S CHESS HANDBOOK.

 The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books ready.*

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY:

A NEW BOOK BY

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

GEORGE PARSONS LATHROP: "Mr. Stevenson is a master of language. . . . He rejoices in a train of exciting incidents. . . . His characters appear as real as his incidents."

The Merry Men

AND OTHER TALES AND FABLES.

Cloth, $1. Paper (Yellow Covers), 35 Cents.

"Without question the most important event of the year in historical literature."—The Nation.

The Provinces of the Roman Empire.

From Cæsar to Diocletian. By Theodor Mommsen. Translated, with the Author's Sanction and Additions, by William P. Dickson, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow. With Ten Maps by Prof. Kiepert. 2 vols., 8vo, $6.

Since the completion of Prof. Mommsen's History of the Roman Republic, thirty years ago, the author's researches have made him the master of fresh and valuable facts concerning the subject races of the Empire, and all matters pertaining to the government of the provinces, their internal administration, and their mutual relations. Previous historians have looked at the history of the Empire too exclusively from the point of view of the imperial city and the central authority, forgetting that, while the Empire was Roman in name, it was a world in fact, and that the provinces were as essential a part of it as the city itself.

History of Modern Philosophy.

Descartes and his School.

By Kuno Fischer. Translated from the Third and Revised German Edition by J. P. Gordy, Ph.D., Professor of Pedagogics in Ohio University. Edited by Noah Porter, D.D., LL.D. 1 vol., 8vo, $3.50.

Kuno Fischer has the rare art of combining the French lucidity of exposition with German thoroughness and profundity, and for this reason his work is always readable and spirited, as well as exhaustive. His account of the life and writings of Descartes, and his exposition of Descartes's doctrine and its development by other philosophers, is universally conceded to be the fullest and ablest work on the subject.

Realistic Philosophy.

Defended in a Philosophic Series. By James McCosh, D.D., LL.D., President of Princeton College. 2 vols., 12mo. Vol. 1, Expository; Vol. 2, Historical and Critical. Each $1.50.

"These volumes are not unlikely to prove in the end the most useful popular service which Dr. McCosh has rendered to the cause of right thinking and to sound philosophy of life."—The Independent.

 For sale by all booksellers, or sent, post-paid, on receipt of price, by*

Charles Scribner's Sons,

PUBLISHERS,

743-745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1887.

The Week.

THE reception of President Cleveland's pension veto by the Republican press is an interesting subject of study. The New York Tribune, as the chief Blaine organ in the country, attempted to turn the message off with a sneer, and sought to rally the "soldier vote" against a President who had done his duty at the risk of losing popularity. But the Tribune finds no response from the leading Republican newspapers of the country. "President Cleveland's reasons are sound and sufficient," says the Worcester (Mass.) Spy. "The country is to be congratulated on his act," says the Boston Traveller. "The Democratic President proved a more watchful agent of the people than either the Democratic Representatives or the Republican Senators," says the Buffalo Express. "He deserves credit, and it will be freely extended to him on every hand," says the Troy Times. "Many of the President's criticisms to the bill are well founded," says the Philadelphia Press. The bill "opened the door for vast abuses," and "the way these could come to pass is strongly stated by the President," says the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette. These are a few samples of the comments made upon this act of a Democratic President by thorough-going Republican newspapers in all parts of the country.

The House Committee on Pensions, which originally produced the bill, has reported back the veto message, with a recommendation that the bill pass, notwithstanding the President's objection. This is only human nature, for it would be extremely humiliating for the Committee to confess, "under fire" from the White House, that it advised Congress in the first instance to pass a bill which was utterly devoid of merit. But Representatives generally will not feel equally bound to stand their ground, and enough Democrats who supported the measure without knowing anything about it, will now vote the other way to leave little doubt that the veto will be sustained by Democratic votes, even without any Republican help. The Republican Congressmen generally appear disposed to assume an attitude of blind opposition to the veto, simply because the measure is one which was supported on its original passage by every Republican in each branch, and because the veto is the work of a Democratic President. But clear-sighted Republican newspapers see that it is going to look very badly for the Republican side of the House to sustain a measure which the Republican press of the country is substantially unanimous in condemning as without justification or excuse. The interesting spectacle is thus presented of Republican newspapers warning Republican Congressmen that they cannot afford to do anything else than sustain the veto by a Democratic President of a Republican measure. "Republicans who yield this loosely drawn and dangerous bill demagogic support will need much better reasons than they have yet made public to justify themselves before the people," says the Chicago Tribune in the West; while in the East the Providence Journal concludes a long appeal for Republican support of Mr. Cleveland with these words: "The fewer Republican votes that are cast in favor of passing the bill over the veto, the more correctly will the Republicans in Congress represent the real feelings of their party throughout the country. No desire to make political capital against the President should interfere with the manly amendment of a rash mistake."

The House of Representatives has passed the Trade-Dollar Bill, with an amendment providing that the recoinage of the trade dollars into standard silver dollars shall not count as part of the monthly coinage of silver now prescribed by law, but shall be in addition thereto. The Senate having passed the bill with an express proviso that the bullion resulting from the trade dollars should be reckoned as a part of the monthly coinage, there is reason to hope that the House amendment will not be agreed to. In case, however, the Senate should recede from its amendment, the President will have another opportunity for interposing a righteous veto against a most mischievous piece of legislation. And to this he would be committed much more strongly than he was to the disapproval of the Dependent Pension Bill. The Trade Dollar Bill, as it now stands, is a new Bland bill, just as distinct and vicious as the original measure. Any argument which can be advanced for the House amendment can be advanced for a new Bland bill. If it be said that the Government owes something to the holders of the trade dollars—a point which has never been clearly made out—it does not owe anything to the silver-mine owners, for whose sole benefit the House amendment stands.

The Belmont Retaliation Bill, agreed to by the sub-committee on Foreign Affairs, goes further in the way of interference with trade with Canada than the Senate bill; further, indeed, than the fishing fraternity desire or approve. The latter would be content, apparently, with entire exclusion of Canadian fish from our markets. A monopoly more or less complete of the fish trade is what they have been striving for. As no monopoly could be more complete than prohibition, they appear not to favor the drastic measure proposed by the House Committee, the operation of which would, whenever put in force, produce a vociferous outcry all along the border, from Passamaquoddy Bay to Puget Sound. The sudden stoppage of a traffic amounting to more than $70,000,000 per year in order to secure justice respecting a few codfish, would be like firing a columbiad gun to kill a mosquito. The recoil would be far more destructive than the discharge. Is it possible that we have so far forgotten the lessons of the Alabama claims that we cannot submit this little difficulty to arbitration? But, it is said, we were cheated out of our money by the Halifax award. If that is true, was not England cheated by the Geneva award? What has become of the overplus left from the $15,000,000 after paying the Alabama claims? Was this overplus greater or less than the $5,500,000 paid by us in consequence of the Halifax award? If it was greater, we paid the Halifax award with "British gold," and had something left over to assuage our feelings.

The appointment and confirmation by the Senate of Mr. W. R. Lewis as Consul to Tangier, and the consequent removal of Mr. Mathews, gives the State Department the opportunity to correct the abuses which under Mathews disgraced the American name. We have no trade to speak of with Morocco—not enough to furnish a separate item in our trade reports. Nor are there any Americans resident in that empire except invalids or tourists. Consequently there is no need for the "protections" which Consul Mathews furnished to some say 50, but others say 150, Levantine Jews, Greeks, and what not, so that they might get his assistance in enforcing claims against native Moors, through imprisonment and torture. Mathews had the amazing impudence to declare that as long as the claims were good it was no affair of ours in what manner the Moorish authorities enforced them—a monstrous doctrine, which Mr. Bayard, we are sure, would not sanction for a moment. We have no doubt Mr. Lewis will be instructed to cancel all these "protections," and to protect nobody but bona-fide American citizens, and to enforce no claims through the machinery of Moorish justice. There is no harm in giving notice to American traders that they may trust Moors if they please, but that they must not rely on the American Consul to get their debtors locked up in Moorish dungeons.

The report of the Secretary of State, recently transmitted to the Senate, contains a full statement of the claim of Antonio Pelletier against the Republic of Hayti. It will, perhaps, be remembered that this Pelletier, who, by the way, like others of whom we have lately spoken, declared himself a naturalized American citizen as soon as he saw that something could be gained by it, was arrested in 1861 on a charge of attempting to enslave Haytian citizens in Haytian waters, tried by the Haytian courts, convicted, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Mr. Seward, then Secretary of State, had his attention called to this trial, but, after a prolonged correspondence with our consular officers in Hayti concerning it, positively refused to interfere with the action of Hayti. But Pelletier escaped from imprisonment in 1864, and straightway began with great earnestness to bring his "claims" against Hayti. These were again and again either ignored or rejected by the Department of State and by Congressional committees. But at last a Mr. O'Connor, who was the Examiner of Claims in the Department, decided, after perusing a series of ex-parte statements furnished by Pelletier, that there was ground for a call on Hayti for redress. Thereupon pressure was brought to bear which eventually wrung from Hayti a consent to an arbitration. Ex-Justice Strong of the Supreme Court was selected as arbitrator, and, after an examination of all the evidence, which was very voluminous, he decided that Pelletier was entitled to damages, which he placed at $57,250 for imprisonment and other injuries inflicted by Hayti as a punishment for attempted slave trading.

It is this decision which Mr. Bayard vigorously attacks in the report mentioned. He first reminds the Senate that the agreement for arbitration had never become a law of the land, because it had not been submitted to the Senate for sanction, and that the arbitrator had not, therefore, become vested with any distinctively judicial prerogatives. But, going further than this, he intimates that it would be the duty of the Executive "to refuse to enforce this award, which, notwithstanding the unimpeachable character of the arbitrator, turns out to have been inequitable or unconscionable." Mr. Bayard then maintains, and, we think, proves, that Pelletier visited Hayti in 1861 for the purpose of abducting and enslaving Haytian citizens, and, when in Haytian territorial waters, made such preparations for carrying out this plan as would have ended, had it not been for his arrest, in such abduction and enslavement; that this constituted, both by our common law and by the French law in force in Hayti, a criminal attempt, subject to public prosecution; that this crime was within Haytian jurisdiction, and that Pelletier's trial was fair, and the punishment imposed singularly lenient. He concludes by declaring that if it be conceded that the arbitrator is right in denying Haytian jurisdiction, yet Pelletier's claim should be immediately dropped, because it is so saturated with turpitude and infamy that on it no action, judicial or diplomatic, can be based.

Although the strike is to all intents and purposes at an end, and most of those engaged in it are either back at work or trying to get back, there can be no doubt that there will be strikers for a good while to come. After every large disturbance a considerable number of the strikers remain on strike as long as any money is forthcoming from assessments. That is to say, their "strike" has really no relation to the employment they have quitted. The employer whom they struck against may have filled their places, and may be going on with his business in complete forgetfulness of their existence, but they still continue in what may be called an abstract strike—a strike not against any particular capitalist, but against capital in general. Strikers of this class are apt to be peculiarly obstinate and irreconcilable. They are the Jacobites of the labor movement. Nothing but absolute famine breaks down their courage. As long as the people who are at work are willing to support them, they display the utmost determination in remaining idle. For weeks after the Third Avenue Railroad had filled the places of its strikers last spring, strikers of this class could be found in tenement-houses all along the line, bravely living on the contributions of other poor people, and determined to uphold the cause of labor as long as the money came in.

If the performances of Quinn and "Putnam," in the late strikes, should have the result of reviving, and strengthening, and improving the trades-unions, and putting an end to the preposterous Powderly scheme of making "the injury of one the concern of all"—that is, of disorganizing the whole industry of the country every time one laborer gets into a row with his employers—it will be a great gain for the whole community. Trades-unions managed on business principles, with ordinary respect for the rules of morality and fair dealing, are and have been most useful organizations. Trades-unions, on the other hand, acting in a way which would make an individual infamous, are simply a curse both to employer and employed. To strike without direct cause and without notice, and without full discussion, or to strike at a time chosen with the view of inflicting the greatest possible damage on an employer who has been guilty of no greater wrong than refusing to accept a business offer; to attempt to make the strike effective by injuries to property, or by threats or violence, against other men who are willing to take the strikers' places, or by denunciations and abuse of those who save and thus create a fund for the employment of labor, are all acts which would mark out an individual man as either a scoundrel or a crank. They do not become respectable by being the acts of an organization. Trades-unions will have to imitate the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and become sober-minded, considerate, law-abiding, and rational from the business point of view, in order to become real powers in the State. They will have, moreover, to make some provision in their rules for the encouragement of talent and industry, and for raising the standard of character among their members, before they can claim any legitimate place in modern civilization. At present a large number of them are managed as if they were mobs of barbarians, without any comprehension of the social organization in which they are bred, and for which manual laborers are just as much bound to care as anybody else.

A new National Labor party is getting itself organized for political action at Indianapolis, in opposition to the Henry George fragment in New York. This outcome was inevitable, not so much because the George party had put itself on the platform of land confiscation, as because it allowed "capital" other than landed estate to gorge and pamper itself to its heart's content. Mr. George's philosophy, as committed to writing, is extremely lenient to millionaires, provided they do not own land. His stump speeches have been somewhat erratic upon this point, but it is quite natural that people at a distance should pass judgment upon him and his party by the light of his publications, and not by his fragmentary sayings, which may be misreported by the newspapers. The Indianapolis movement proposes to take contrary ground, affirming the inviolability of land-ownership, and attacking capital as the common enemy of the farmer and the workingman. We venture to predict that the Indianapolis movement will outrun the Henry George movement in the next national election by a large majority.

Section 2 of the Inter-State Commerce Act prohibits every railroad company subject to its provisions from charging any person or persons more or less for passenger or freight service than is charged to any other person or persons. It cannot be doubted that this clause of the act cuts off the "deadhead" system as to all railroads not wholly within the limits of a single State. Mr. Adams, the President of the Union Pacific, has already issued a notice that, when the law goes into effect, free passes will be stopped except to the company's employees travelling on the company's business. If the law puts an end to this disgraceful and pernicious system, it will have served one good purpose at least. We can think of no place for beginning work under the law more suitable than the existing discrimination in charges for passenger service, by virtue of which it has come about that the only persons who pay their fare on the cars are those who can scarcely afford to do so. All very rich people now expect to ride free. All large shippers, and nearly all legislators, editors, directors of railroads and of steamship lines, Government officers, and their near relatives and particular friends, expect to "have their hats chalked" as regularly as the seasons come around. It is a woful showing for a republic of equal rights.

The bill introduced in the Legislature by Senator Vedder to tax "short" sales of stocks, petroleum, etc., by brokers is understood to be intended as a measure for yielding revenue to the State, and not merely to discourage speculation on the bear side of the market. If this is its purpose, we must point out to the supporters of the bill that it will fail to accomplish this object in its present shape. It provides that all brokers' sales shall be taxed one-fiftieth of one per cent. unless, in the case of stocks, a bill of sale is delivered by the seller to the buyer on the day of sale, specifying the date and number of the certificates, and delivery of the same certificates is made on the following day. Brokers' sales of petroleum, cotton, and produce are to be taxed at the same rate unless a bill of sale identifying and conveying the property is made on the day of sale. Omitting for the present the expediency of a tax on brokers' sales by any kind of a law, we can perceive nothing in this bill but an interference with the customs of trade. If a tax of one-fiftieth of one per cent. is sufficient to make it worth while to evade the payment, the "street" will alter its methods accordingly. Short sellers will borrow the stocks they expect to require one day earlier than they do now, or obtain from the lenders the numbers of the certificates they intend to borrow. This would be an annoyance and would involve some extra clerical labor, but would not necessarily bring any revenue to the State.

The dinner of the "Republican Club" at Delmonico's on Saturday evening has very much the appearance of being the initial step in a movement to carry the New York delegation in the next national Republican Convention for Senator Sherman. It is quite certain that some design not exactly avowed was behind the "spread" of that bountiful table. Such costly entertainments are not usually prepared merely to celebrate the history and past exploits of a party. Nor do Governors of States commonly assemble at great distances from their Governorships merely to partake of a good dinner. The birthday of Abraham Lincoln has not become a saint's day in our calendar, although it may well become such. The whole affair has the appearance of being a "boom" for somebody. We are not inclined to make light of it for that reason. On the contrary, it is entitled all the more to serious treatment if it was a "concerted piece" and not a haphazard medley of national airs. We infer that the dinner was not conceived in the interests of Mr. Blaine, because the leading speakers, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Depew, are not Blaine men. Gen. Hawley turned a very cold shoulder upon Mr. Blaine when he spoke of "the Mugwump who boasts of his departure from his old brethren upon a difference concerning one man." Equally pointed is that clause in Senator Sherman's letter where the Republican defeat in the last national election is ascribed to "the division of the Republicans in New York." The Blaine theory is, that there was no division among the Republicans of New York, but only an accidental scattering of votes caused by Dr. Burchard's allusion to Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion.

The only discourse pronounced at the dinner which had the semblance of a political platform was the letter of Senator Sherman himself. If the gathering was designed to promote Mr. Sherman's prospects for a Presidential nomination, it was fitting that the speakers should restrict themselves mainly to the glories of the war and emancipation, and leave platform-making to the candidate. Mr. Sherman's principles are set forth in these words, which we reprint for general information rather than for present criticism:

"Surely the time has arrived when the Republican party should assume again its great mission. The time is opportune. Under the operation of laws placed upon the statute-book by Republican Administrations, taxes are so levied as to produce overflowing revenue without a serious burden upon the people. We are at liberty to choose between reducing our revenues or expending our surplus in great and beneficent objects of natural desire. We can combine the two lines of public policy. We could readily reduce the tax on sugar, while giving encouragement to domestic production in the form of bounty. We could repeal or reduce all taxes that do not tend to encourage and protect domestic production. We could commence and establish a system of coast defences that will guard the great arteries of our commerce. We could place our navy again in a condition to be respected and renew our participation in foreign commerce. We could authorize our citizens to build new routes of communication across the continent and protect them in their rights. We could, with our added strength and wealth, give assistance and encouragement to all the American republics founded upon our example. We could make suitable commercial arrangements with our neighbor, the Dominion of Canada, and thus avoid all future controversies about the rights of our people to fish in American waters, and in this way, by gradual measures, knit and mould the interests and desires of our neighbors with our own."

The principal and leading idea here is, that our flourishing financial condition enables us to launch into expenditures which have not hitherto been admissible. We can spend money freely for a great variety of things—fortifications, navy, inter-oceanic canals, internal improvements, bounties, etc. We can reduce taxes if we like, but Mr. Sherman does not see much advantage in reducing taxes that are not felt. The suggestion is very plain that, having paid off all of our debt that is now payable, we can have a good time with our money—in our view a most sinister and demoralizing thought, captivating to speculators and the "governing classes," no doubt, but socialistic in its tendency, since it points to a use of the taxing power for other purposes than the support of government economically administered.

In his eulogy of Gen. Logan on Wednesday, his colleague, Mr. Cullom, said, according to the Tribune's report: "Wealth could not tempt him to soil his spotless name. He never used the opportunities of his official position as a means of obtaining gold. He died as he lived, a poor man." Mr. Cullom said further, that "in the last Presidential campaign no ghost of dishonor in his past had risen up and stood in his path." The implication of these remarks would seem to be that there is some man who had "used the opportunities of his official position as a means of obtaining gold," and who found "in the last Presidential campaign" that a "ghost of dishonor in his past had risen up and stood in his path."

The fate of one White, who was shot on Sunday in West Virginia by a man whom he was trying to lynch, was very curious. White was summoned from his home to his brother's at some distance by a telegram announcing the death of his mother. When he reached the house, however, he found a lynching party was being organized to lynch a certain Miller for adultery. It does not appear that White knew either Miller or his paramour, but his interest in the maintenance of domestic purity seems to have been so strong that he forgot his grief for his deceased parent, in his desire to punish Miller, and joined the lynchers. Miller had, however, been forewarned and was forearmed, and, when the lynchers appeared at his door, brought a double-barrelled shot-gun to bear on them and requested them to desist. White, however, still suppressing his grief for his mother, gallantly urged them to the charge, and was shot dead in the advance, a martyr, if ever there was one, to the cause of the family. The other lynchers are searching for Miller with the view of hanging him, but he keeps out of the way, while poor White is to be buried beside his mother.

The Prudential Committee of the American Board of Foreign Missions have reached a very curious settlement of their difficulty with Mr. Hume, the missionary whom they did not wish to employ again because he believed there would be a future state of probation for the heathen. They have decided to send him back to his work, on the understanding "that he avoid the preaching or teaching of any speculation in favor of future probation." That is to say, Mr. Hume may hold this doctrine if he pleases, but he is not to let the heathen know about it. Now, we would ask in all seriousness, is this religion or is it "politics"? What will a heathen convert think, both of Mr. Hume and the Prudential Committee, if he should ever discover that they had entered into an agreement to conceal from him a doctrine which, if true, would be to him of stupendous importance? Is it possible that Mr. Hume will undertake, in virtue of "a deal," to let the heathen suppose that he believes that final judgment will be passed on them at their death, when in reality he believes, or is strongly of opinion, that final judgment will not be passed on them until long after their death, and that in the interval they will have a chance of atoning for past sins by good behavior, or be fitted for a higher state of existence by a process of purgation?

Mr. Hume has published a "Memorandum," in which he denies that he has given any pledge not to teach the doctrine of future probation. He simply admits that he has no "certain knowledge" on this subject, but holds himself free to consider as legitimate "such opinions about it not contrary to Scripture as are entertained among evangelical ministers." As we understand the situation, however, the Committee does not now object to his holding these opinions, but seems to rely on his "loyalty" to the Board to prevent his communicating them to the heathen. What gave these opinions their value to Mr. Hume in the first instance was, however, their comforting influence on the heathen, who were greatly disturbed by the probable fate of their savage ancestors under the doctrine of final judgment at death. Mr. Hume can hardly intend now, after fighting his fight, to cut off such converts as he may make hereafter from this consolation. If he thinks, as he evidently does, that there is a fair probability of a period of probation after this life, he is bound in good faith to let the heathen know his views. In fact, if he were to restrict his teaching to matters of which he had "certain knowledge," he would put them on very short allowance. But there is a curious want of candor about the whole affair on all sides.

The Parnell amendment to the usual address to the Queen has been defeated by the expected majority, that is, 106, of which the greater part is contributed by the Liberal-Unionists. The debate was most uninteresting, being simply a dreary repetition of the old commonplaces, charges, and counter-charges about Ireland. The prospect, as opened up by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's speech on behalf of the Ministry, is most hopeless, consisting mainly of legislation of very doubtful value, which there is but little chance of carrying. Lord Hartington's was the gloomiest speech of all, for he had nothing to propose except the buying out of the landlords and a large exportation of the tenants to the colonies.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, February 9, to TUESDAY, February 15, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND on Friday afternoon vetoed the Dependent Pension Bill in a vigorous document, which is summarized elsewhere in this issue. Inasmuch as a change of only ten votes would deprive the bill of a two-thirds majority in the House, there is no reasonable doubt that the veto will be sustained. The vote on the passage of the measure was 180 yeas to 76 nays, the affirmatives consisting of 115 Republicans and 65 Democrats, while the negative votes were all those of Democrats, and, with three exceptions, of Southern Democrats. Several Southern Democrats voted for the bill who may now be counted upon the other side, and the same is true of a number of Northern Democrats, while, in view of the condemnation of the scheme by so many Republican newspapers, it is by no means certain that the Republican vote would be solid for it upon a reconsideration. Even if, by any possibility, the bill should get through the House over the veto, the Senate would unquestionably sustain the veto. There was no division in the upper branch on the passage of the bill, and nothing was said in support of the bill by any Democrat, so that all the Democratic Senators could vote to sustain the veto without the slightest inconsistency, and such a vote would leave the bill far short of the requisite two-thirds. The veto has been generally approved by the intelligent sentiment of the country.

The President has allowed the act appropriating $400,000 a year to provide arms and equipments for the militia to become a law without his signature.

The President is carefully considering the eligibility of the persons who have been named as Inter-State Commerce Commissioners. It is believed that the position of the President of the Commission has been tendered to Allen G. Thurman of Ohio, and doubts are expressed as to the accuracy of the rumor which represents Mr. Thurman as having declined.

The Senate on Wednesday agreed to the House substitute for the Chinese Indemnity Bill. The bill prohibiting off-shore mackerel fishing during spawning season was passed, 34 to 11.

The Senate has entered upon the consideration of the Naval Bill reported by Senator Cameron, and following that will be submitted the bill of Mr. Hale. The aggregate amounts which it is proposed to take from the Treasury by naval bills now pending are large. The following is a summary of the leading propositions: The Hawley bill, with the Dolph amendment, $21,000,000; Senator Cameron's ten-cruiser bill, $21,800,000; Senator Hale's heavy-armored vessel bill, $10,400,000; Senator Stanford's big guns and mortars bill, $40,000,000; total, $98,200,000. Of these bills the one of Senator Cameron and the one of Senator Hale have both received the unanimous support of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and are considered as a part of a general plan for the building of a new navy. They together call for $37,200,000, which the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, without distinction of party, has agreed to recommend.

An effort was made in the House of Representatives on Wednesday to secure immediate consideration of the coast-defence bills, but Mr. Holman objected. No day was set for their consideration. It is feared that the House will kill the bills.

The conferees on the Anti-Polygamy Bill reached an agreement on Friday on the points of difference between the two houses. The section of the Senate bill which provides for the appointment of a board of trustees to administer on the property of the Mormon Church, is omitted. The provisions of the House bill authorizing the administration of an oath to the legal wife to sustain charges of polygamy is included, as is the provision eliminating polygamists from the registration lists.

The Senate Trade-Dollar Bill came before the House on Saturday with the amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has been rejected by the Senate Committee, the House voting 142 to 101 to take it up.

Secretary Manning handed his resignation to President Cleveland on Monday, to take effect not later than March 4.

Commander-in-Chief Fairchild of the Grand Army of the Republic has issued an address to posts and members of this organization, requesting them immediately to inform members of Congress of their approval or disapproval of the principles involved in the vetoed Dependent Pension Bill.

Both branches of the Legislature of Tennessee have adopted a resolution to submit to popular vote an amendment to the State Constitution prohibiting the making or selling of intoxicants.

The big 'longshore strike in this city, as well as the coal-handlers' strike, was on Friday night declared off by the Executive Board of District Assembly 49. This confession of defeat is set forth by the Executive Board as the announcement of a victory. They alleged that President Corbin of the Reading Road had made some important concessions to them. The men were ordered back to work. This did not, however, affect the condition of the men to any great extent. Their places have been filled, and the orders of the Union will not be respected by the former employers of the strikers. The coal companies unite in saying that they have all the men they want, and certainly will not discharge the new men they have hired. There is, however, a probability that the companies will, as vacancies occur, fill them with the best men they can get, whether they are union men or not. It is the universal opinion among the coal men that the Knights have used the agreement of Mr. Corbin as a loophole for them to crawl out of, after having suffered an ignominious defeat.

The Prudential Committee of the American Board have agreed to the return of the Rev. Mr. Hume to his mission in India. They have published a statement in which they say: "The Committee understands that, under the action of the Board at its last annual meeting, it has no option but to decline to send out as a missionary any person who has committed himself to the acceptance of the hypothesis of a probation after death. That action was in the following terms: 'The Board is constrained to look with grave apprehension upon certain tendencies of the doctrine of a probation after death, which has been recently broached and diligently propagated, that seem divisive and perversive and dangerous to the churches at home and abroad. In view of those tendencies they do heartily approve of the action of the Prudential Committee in carefully guarding the Board from any committal to the approval of that doctrine, and advise a continuance of that caution in time to come.' In the case of Rev. R. A. Hume, embarrassment and consequent delay have arisen from doubt as to his exact position on the subject. After several interviews and much correspondence, it appears that Mr. Hume regards the hypothesis in question as not forbidden by the Scriptures, and that some considerations favor it, while on the other hand he affirms that he has not in his past utterances committed himself, and that he does not now commit himself, to the acceptance of the hypothesis. It has been a question with the Committee how far sympathy with this hypothesis, even where it is not accepted, would control one's thought and action; but it has not been unmindful of the fact that Mr. Hume is not a new applicant for missionary appointment. He has for eleven years rendered good service in the mission field, and the record of that service as well as his recent statements give reasonable assurance that he will work, in the future as in the past, as a loyal representative of the American Board, and in harmony with the wishes of his mission as expressed in their letter of October 28, 1886, 'that he avoid the preaching or teaching of any speculation in favor of a future probation.' The Committee therefore assents to the return of Mr. Hume to his cherished work in the Maratha Mission."

The average of the temperature about Fort Keogh, M. T., has recently been lower than for fifteen years, and the loss of cattle on the ranches is very great.

Ex-Alderman John O'Neil was on Friday sentenced to Sing Sing for four years and six months, and ordered to pay a fine of $2,000, for bribery in the Broadway Railroad case. This is lighter than the sentence of Jaehne or McQuade. The Judge said: "The Court finds some grounds for clemency in your case, among which may be cited your hitherto blameless life, which was testified to on the trial."

Herr Anton Seidl, of the Metropolitan Opera-house in this city, has accepted a call to the position of conductor at the Royal Opera at Berlin. He will remain here to the end of the opera season.

The Right Rev. William Mercer Green, for forty-eight years Bishop of the Diocese of Mississippi, is dead.

George M. Weston, Librarian for the Senate, aged seventy-four, died in Washington on Thursday night after a brief illness. He was an original anti-slavery leader, and long an editor in Maine. For many years he has been a writer on the silver question.

FOREIGN.

The text of Cardinal Jacobini's letter to the Nuncio at Munich is published. The Cardinal says that in view of the impending revision of the Church Laws, the Pope desires the Centre to support the Septennate Bill in every possible way, and concludes: "It is well known that the Government attaches the greatest importance to the passage of the bill. If by its adoption it should be found possible to avert the danger of war in the near future, the Centre would render a great service to the fatherland and to the cause of humanity in Europe by supporting the bill. In the contrary case, the hostile attitude of the Centre would be considered unpatriotic, and the dissolution of the Reichstag would cause embarrassments and uncertainties to the Centre party." Cardinal Jacobini instructs the Nuncio to urge the leaders of the Centre to influence their colleagues in favor of the Septennate, and to assure them that such a course would greatly satisfy the Holy Father.

Cardinal Jacobini's letter seems to have even less influence than was at first expected, for all the leading Catholic journals in Berlin again advocate the reëlection of the former Deputies.

It is expected that Cardinal Jacobini's letter to the Nuncio at Munich will lead to a lively debate in the Italian Chamber of Deputies. The letter is thought to cover a hope of the Vatican that Germany will exert pressure on Italy to yield to the Vatican's wishes.

The Cologne Gazette says: "It is nonsense to suppose that Germany would lift a finger to restore the temporal power of the Pope. Cardinal Jacobini only meant to intimate that a reconciliation between the Pope and King Humbert might be effected by the mediation of Germany."

The Government of Greece has given to France, through the French Minister at Athens, permission to excavate at Delphi for remains of the Temple.

The Prussian Ministerial Council has decided to postpone the submission of the Church Bill to the Landtag until after the Reichstag elections. The extent of the revision of the May laws depends upon the pliability of the Centre.

The lower house of the Prussian Diet was quietly adjourned on Saturday until after the elections for the Reichstag. This proves the rumor that Bismarck would again make a strong speech against the Liberals in that body to have been a Conservative election manœuvre.

In answer to an inquiry made by a member of the Landtag on Monday, whether or not war was probable, Prince Bismarck is reported to have said: "You know quite as much as I do. We live in a state of peace. But look at the French preparations—at the building of barracks, at the position of Gen. Boulanger, at the constant outcry of the French Patriotic League during sixteen years—and then consider what we have to fear from France." On the same day a despatch from St. Petersburg declared that the German Ambassador to Russia recently sounded the Czar as to whether he would remain neutral in the event of war between Germany and France, and that the Czar refused to commit himself.

The Berliner Nachrichten says it has authentic information that Gen. Boulanger, the French Minister of War, is preparing a movement of troops to the eastern frontier. Four battalions in Algiers have been ordered to France. Gen. Boulanger has instructed the Military Railway Committee to remain in permanent session.

Ominous fears of a European war prevail in St. Petersburg. It is announced that German colonists in the Caucasus have been notified to hold themselves in readiness to return to Germany and join the reserves.

A Nihilistic conspiracy was discovered last week in St. Petersburg which extended through the whole of Russia. Accomplices have been found in Kiev, Kharkov, and Odessa.

The Belgian Ministry will probably make the adoption of obligatory military service a Cabinet question. It is announced that all the forts in Belgium along the frontier of France have received a complete war armament. The preparations have been even carried to the extent of mobilizing the troops. King Leopold will be Commander-in-Chief of the Belgian forces, with Gen. Brialmont as Chief of Staff.

The French Chamber of Deputies on Thursday, by a vote of 286 to 238, adopted a motion requesting the Government to introduce a bill imposing an income tax. The adjectives "uniform progressive" were stricken out of the original resolution.

Charles Wehlé, the distinguished composer and pianist, is dead. He was born at Prague in 1825, and in early life made a commercial tour to Paris. There Thalberg discovered his musical gifts and gave him a letter of introduction, with which he went to Leipzig and studied under Moscheles and Richter. Returning to Paris he soon became known as virtuoso and composer. Then he undertook a musical tour which included America, Australia, Egypt, and Asia, and was rich in curious adventures.

François Laurent, the Belgian historian and publicist, is dead. He was seventy-six years old. He was born at Luxembourg and studied law at Liége, where he was graduated in 1832. Five years later he became professor of civil law at the University of Ghent. The Clerical party detested him on account of the anti-papal tendency of his writings. He was author of a vast work in eighteen volumes, called 'Études sur l'histoire de l'humanite'; of the 'Principes de droit civil français,' in thirty-two volumes, for which he received a prize from the Royal Academy of Belgium; 'Passion des Catholiques pour la liberté,' etc.

Ferdinand von Miller, the celebrated Bavarian founder, is dead. He was born in 1813, studied in Munich and Paris, and subsequently became Director of the Royal Foundry Works at the Bavarian capital, where he has cast over 200 statues. He was also a member of the Reichstag, and in 1876 he arranged the great international art exhibition in Munich.

Mrs. Henry Wood, the British novelist, is dead. She was about sixty-seven years of age. Her father was Thomas Price, a leading glove manufacturer of Worcester. She began her literary career as a contributor to the magazines. 'Danebury House,' her first complete novel, was published in 1860. It was followed the next year by 'East Lynne,' which achieved a remarkable success. Among her other works are 'Roland Yorke' (1869), 'Dene Hollow' (1871), 'Johnny Ludlow' (1880). She was editor of the Argosy.

Philip Bourke Marston, the English poet and essayist, died in London on Monday in his thirty-sixth year. His father, Dr. Westland Marston, was a man of considerable literary activity, and the son was very early in life thrown into the companionship of literary people. He became more widely known by his critical and poetical contributions to the British and American magazines than by his books. By an accident in his childhood his eyesight was impaired, and during the latter years of his life he was blind and epileptic.

The fourth Duke of Leinster is dead at the age of sixty-eight. He was Colonel of the Kildare militia, and a Commissioner of National Education in Ireland. His family has been in Ireland for 700 years.

In outlining the Irish party's policy for this session, Mr. Parnell says that there will be no obstruction this year, that is, no deliberate organized obstructive measures. In general it is the intention of the Irish party to discuss the procedure fully and fairly, as they have done the questions already introduced; but nothing more.

Mr. Parnell is drafting a bill to extend the benefits of the Land Act to glebe tenants and holders in town parks as well as leaseholders.

In the House of Commons on Thursday night, in the debate on Mr. Parnell's amendment, the Marquis of Hartington made a speech in which he substantially said: "Admitting that the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland were far from satisfactory, it was no remedy to suspend, or reduce, or abolish the payment of rent. Such a plan would be found to be no boon to the poor tenants. The real remedies for the agrarian crisis were to be found in providing larger productive employment for the people, or involuntary emigration conducted and supported by the local authorities. Still, where landlords existed the land laws must be enforced. It would never be possible to get rid of the ultimate resort of eviction. The course of the Government in prosecuting the authors of the plan of campaign was right and straightforward. It was the duty of the Government to attack men engaged in an illegal conspiracy and prevent their leading astray tenants who were their dupes. Mr. Gladstone had declared that the plan of campaign resulted from the policy of the Government in refusing to adopt the Suspension of Evictions Bill. Could Parliament hold that, as a legitimate consequence, the rejection of any measure left the people morally entitled to take the law into their own hands and do what Parliament had refused to do? If the plan of campaign was not illegal, if its enforcement was not stopped, there would be an end to all relations between landlord and tenant. It would cause an internecine war, and result in the total destruction of the power of the landlord to obtain any rent excepting what the tenant chose to pay. The suppression of the plan was a necessity if order was to be preserved. Mr. Parnell had referred to the probable recurrence of dynamite outrages. He admitted that Mr. Parnell was not in a position to control dynamite crimes, but he was in a position to disown them. They were not disowned. Mr. Parnell contented himself with warning Parliament that if a certain course were pursued the dynamiters might resume operations. As to home rule, there remained a steadfast, solid barrier of 100 votes against Mr. Gladstone's scheme. It was idle and useless for the Home-Rulers to present a vague resolution to the House on the ground that they had the confidence of the Irish people, knowing that they must secure the approval of the British nation."

Mr. John Morley, speaking at Newcastle on Wednesday night, said the Conservative-Liberal union was crumbling away. There had been no recoil of popular opinion on the Irish question; the home-rule tide was flowing slowly but steadily. Lord Hartington's latest speech, he continued, revealed complete impotence in the face of a difficult problem. The question was, "What are we waiting for?" Ireland was admittedly orderly in many parts, and surely the time was opportune to satisfy her wants. Even if Parliament adopted the Canadian scheme for Ireland, such a course would not be less liberal than that of Mr. Gladstone.

Mr. Parnell's amendment to the address in reply to the Queen's speech was rejected on Friday by a vote of 352 to 246. The majority against the amendment is an accurate index of the prospects of Irish legislation in the present Parliament. Although no whip had been issued for the Liberals, only six were unaccounted for. All the leading Unionists voted with the Government.

Mr. Gladstone has written a letter which apparently frankly concedes the point of the retention of the Irish members at Westminster.

The Tories among the students have torn up by the roots and destroyed the tree planted at Cambridge University a fortnight ago by Mr. Gladstone. The Liberal students threaten reprisals.

Mr. G. J. Goschen, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was on Wednesday returned to Parliament from St. George's, Hanover Square. The Liberals made little opposition.

The British blue book on the affairs of Bulgaria and Eastern Rumelia shows Salisbury's Government during last autumn in a very bad light. It confirms the statements that have been made about intrigues on behalf of Prince Alexander, in which the Queen herself has taken part. Indeed, the British agent at Sofia telegraphed that at last the Prince "expressed in the strongest terms his gratitude to the Queen and her Majesty's Government for the kindness they had invariably shown him, and hoped they would not add to the difficulty of his very painful position by urging him to remain in Bulgaria." Salisbury applied in turn to most of the European cabinets for assistance in supporting Prince Alexander, but was snubbed all round. It was practically the English Government which brought the Prince back, but he abdicated at the moment Salisbury believed him most firmly reëstablished.

It was reported from Rome on Monday that Signor Depretis had undertaken to form a Cabinet conjointly with Count di Robilant.

The volcano of Mauna Loa, in Hawaii Island, is again active. The eruption began on January 15th, the lava flowing down the south slope. Earthquake shocks have been frequent, without serious consequences, however.

Great distress is reported to prevail among the people in the northern part of Newfoundland. The Government has already sent thousands of barrels of flour to keep them from starving, but the supply is inadequate. The ports are now frozen in, and it is impossible to send supplies there in time to save many of the sufferers.

THE VETO.

THE President's action in returning to the House without his approval the Dependent Pension Bill is the most striking event of his Administration. His message has undoubtedly killed the measure, and the measure was the most important, the most far-reaching, and the most demoralizing which Congress has sent to the White House since Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated. The veto thus presents him in the character of a careful, wise, and courageous Executive, who, by the exercise of a great constitutional prerogative, has defeated an outrageous scheme which was hastily passed by Congress in a characteristic fit of carelessness, folly, and cowardice.

The message itself is a merciless exposure of what, according to that veteran Republican correspondent, Gen. Boynton, "most of those who supported it are now convinced is a scheme engineered in the main by pension attorneys." Mr. Cleveland shows with the utmost clearness that the bill is so loosely drawn as to put a premium upon fraud on the part of new applicants, and to tempt pensioners receiving less than $12 a month, who are now partially supporting themselves, to stop working and claim the larger allowance. He points out that the advocates of the bill in the two houses differed widely as to its meaning and consequences. He says that he "cannot believe that the vast peaceful army of Union soldiers who, having contentedly resumed their places in the ordinary avocations of life, cherish as sacred the memory of patriotic service, or who, having been disabled by the casualties of war, justly regard the present pension roll, on which appear their names, as a roll of honor, desire at this time and in the present exigency to be confounded with those who, through such a bill as this, are willing to be objects of simple charity, and to gain a place upon the pension roll through alleged dependence." He enforces the consideration, "sad but nevertheless true," with which the examination of private pension bills has impressed him, "that already in the matter of procuring pensions there exists a widespread disregard of truth and good faith, stimulated by those who, as agents, undertake to establish claims for pensions, heedlessly entered upon by the expectant beneficiary, and encouraged, or at least not condemned, by those unwilling to obstruct a neighbor's plans." He declares that "the race after the pensions offered by this bill would not only stimulate weakness and pretended incapacity for labor, but would be a further premium on dishonesty and mendacity." He shows, by a reference to the consequences of the Arrears Act, how startling is the effect of new invitations to apply for pensions; and, by a reference to the history of the Dependent Pension Bill for Revolutionary soldiers, how ridiculously far below the actual expenditure all Congressional estimates have inevitably fallen. Finally, he refers to the fact that while it has been a cause of pride and congratulation to the American citizen that his country is not put to the charge of maintaining a large standing army in time of peace, yet we are still living under a system of war taxation, which ought to be reduced, but which cannot be reduced if this bill becomes a law, "with its tremendous addition to our previous obligations."

There has seldom been a more signal illustration of the wisdom of the fathers in investing the President with the veto power. Here is a bill which was whisked through Congress almost without consideration, on the pretence that it involved only the trifling expenditure of less than $5,000,000 a year, and in the belief on the part of its supporters that favoring it would insure them the "soldier vote' without offending any other class of voters. If the passage of a measure through each branch of Congress made it a law, there would have been no escape from the demoralizing and long-continued consequences of this piece of demagogism. But the Constitution gives the President ten days to consider every act sent to him by Congress, and makes his veto of a bill effectual unless overruled by a two-thirds vote in each branch. Ten days sufficed for so thorough an overhauling of this measure by the press as conclusively demonstrated that it never ought to have been passed, and for so unanimous a condemnation of its Congressional supporters by public sentiment as to insure the defeat of the scheme upon a reconsideration. The possession of the veto power by a President who is not afraid to use it, thus rescues the nation from the otherwise inevitable consequences of a piece of hasty legislation.

From the standpoint of current politics the veto is hardly less noteworthy than from that of political economy. The Pauper Pension Bill went through both branches of Congress without a word of protest, or even a single negative vote, from all the representatives of the Republican party. Everybody in the country knows that, if the Republican candidate in the last Presidential campaign had been elected, a bill thus supported by the Republican party in Congress would have been signed without a moment's hesitation. But for the last ten days Republican newspapers in all parts of the country have been denouncing the measure in the most scathing terms, and appealing to a Democratic President to save the country from this "extravagant, foolish, and demagogical" measure (to use the words of the Chicago Tribune), which went to him with the endorsement of every Republican Senator and Representative. When we remember that only a little over two years ago these Republican newspapers were charging that the election of a Democratic President would ruin the country, the spectacle which has been presented for the past ten days of these same Republican newspapers beseeching this Democratic President to veto a Republican measure, is at once most amusing and instructive.

As to the personal consequences of the President's action, there can be no question in the mind of any candid man. He has been warned that a veto would lose him the "soldier vote," and the organ of the Washington claim agents has made frantic appeals for his signature that were hardly disguised threats of political revenge in case of a veto. Everybody in the country knows that such arguments would have availed with the Republican candidate in the campaign of 1884, as they availed with so many Congressmen who knew that they ought to vote against the bill. Sundry Republican organs have emphasized the courage required in Mr. Cleveland's action, by saying that his course in this matter would be a test of his mettle; that while it was easy enough to veto a private pension bill which had but few friends, it would be quite another thing to block a scheme pushed by such powerful influences as were behind this measure. The concluding sentence of the message is the President's reply, and it is such an appeal to the patriotism and justice of the American people as cannot fail to elevate its author in the estimation of every right-thinking person:

> "The evil threatened by this bill is in my opinion such that, charged with a great responsibility in behalf of the people, I cannot do otherwise than to bring to the consideration of this measure my best efforts of thought and judgment, and perform my constitutional duty in relation thereto, regardless of all consequences, except such as appear to me to be related to the best and highest interests of the country."

THE DUTY OF THE ASSEMBLY COMMITTEE.

WE trust the Assembly Committee now investigating the strikes in this city will not fail to examine Quinn and other leaders as to the machinery by which the strikes are supported. This is really the most important branch of the investigation. The other matters to which the Committee have been addressing themselves—such as the cost of mining and transporting coal, and the rate of wages paid by the companies, and the disputes between the workmen and the corporations out of which the late strikes have arisen—are comparatively unimportant, because the facts lie so near the surface. Any newspaper reporter can get at them. What most seriously calls for legislative inquiry is the internal machinery by which the strikes are carried on, because this is both a novelty and a mystery. Formerly a strike was simply the refusal of the men working under a particular employer, or in a particular trade, to work any longer unless certain specific and published demands on the employer were complied with. The strike, too, was almost always preceded by negotiations which gave it the character of a business transaction, and it was managed by men in the trade and familiar with its needs and possibilities.

Under the new system which the Knights of Labor are seeking to establish, this is all changed. A secret and irresponsible body has been set up in this city, which exercises the power of ordering sympathetic strikes—that is, of "calling out" the workers in any trade it pleases, whether they have a grievance or not, with the view of producing widespread social disorganization, and thus coercing the whole community, as it were, into helping to make effective the decrees of this hidden despotism. One result of this system is, of course, to make strikes when ordered extremely large. Thousands are thrown out of employment in order to aggravate a dispute in which only hundreds are directly interested, and great misery is indirectly inflicted on thousands of others by enhancing the price of commodities and causing general business depression, postponing investments and driving capital away. Another serious feature of sympathetic strikes—and to this we would especially call the attention of the Committee—is the fact that they are training large bodies of American citizens in the habit of blind obedience, in the performance of the most important acts of their lives, to unknown persons. One of our morning contemporaries the other day, while condemning the strikes as foolish, lauded this blind obedience of those who were "called out" as a splendid example of devotion and discipline on the part of poor men. In reality, however, it is a very alarming political phenomenon. It makes the organization known as the Knights of Labor distinctly hostile to American institutions. Any organization, whether ecclesiastical or civil, whether church or order or brotherhood, which teaches men to regulate their lives under commands for which no reason is given them, or, in other words, to lead the lives of soldiers in the midst of peace, under authority unknown to the law of the land, is undoubtedly dangerous to the state. It is absurd to perorate against the Catholic Church or the Mormon Church while such an organization as the Knights of Labor is in active operation among us. To encourage such an organization in teaching large bodies of men to obey without reasoning, without discussion, without knowing or asking the reason why, is to contribute in a greater or less degree to the overthrow of our present system of government. For they delude themselves grossly who suppose that if the Knights or any similar organization became strong enough to put society in peril, society would surrender at discretion and let itself be reorganized by the Powderlys and Quinns. On the contrary, as the history of civilization everywhere shows, society would defend itself with the special weapons which the danger seemed to call for. It would modify its government to suit the occasion. It would meet a little despotism with a big despotism, and would pursue Master Workmen with colonels and generals, and, when it caught the Walking Delegate "calling out" anybody, it would lock him up in jail, without benefit of clergy or privilege of habeas corpus. In short, it would sacrifice its liberty in order to secure peace and tranquillity.

Though last not least, the sympathetic strikes call for money contributions on a scale never known in strikes before. The number of people they make dependent on assessments levied on workingmen who are not "called out," is unprecedentedly large. The beneficiaries and contributors of this fund in such strikes as this last one of the 'longshoremen and coal-handlers are in the main ignorant and simple men. Probably the large majority of them are either unable to read or write, or only do so with difficulty. They have no familiarity with accounts or with the usages of the business world in the matter of receiving and disbursing other people's money. It is needless to point out to the Committee, therefore, the immense opportunities for frauds on a great scale which every one of these strikes offers. In all of them large sums of money are received in small amounts by persons themselves impecunious and without credit, who publish no receipts, and render no accounts, and disburse it in such manner and at such times as they think proper. If a man were to start a savings bank or a charitable association on this plan, no matter who he was, he would soon be called to an account, especially if, like "Putnam," or Quinn, the great strike leader, he was a hackman in winter and drove an ice-cart in summer, or, like the other Quinn, he was a bookbinder, who had abandoned his trade in order to reorganize modern society.

The Assembly Committee, we trust, will see in this last consideration, if not in the others, good reason for getting the managers of District Assembly 49 before them, and asking them such questions about the receipt and distribution of the money raised in aid of the late strike as will satisfy the public on the point whether these sympathetic strikes are not instruments of fraud on a great scale, of which manual laborers, or, in other words, a very poor class of the community, are the sole victims, and enable the Committee to report in favor of some remedial legislation. What this legislation should be, seems obvious enough. The daily publication of the assessments received, with the names of the donors, and of the amounts disbursed, with the names and residences of the recipients, should be made compulsory, and the Board of Arbitration should be charged with the duty of auditing the accounts. There is so little arbitration going on that it would have plenty of time for this purpose. If the Legislature fails to take this matter up, it will be guilty of a great wrong towards a very helpless class.

THE POPE'S INTERFERENCE IN GERMANY.

NOTHING more singular has occurred in European politics within the present century than the direct interference of the Pope in the German elections on behalf of the Government. In the first place, we can recall no case in which orders have been openly sent from Rome to the Catholics of a parliamentary country, directing them how to vote on a certain occasion. In all previous occasions of real or suspected Papal interference in domestic politics, the influence has been exerted privately, or at all events indirectly. The word would be passed to the clergy to get the faithful to support this or that candidate, or this or that measure, on the ground that spiritual interests required it; and the clergy would give advice to this effect either from the pulpit or through their parochial visits, abstaining carefully, however, from any mention of higher authority. In fact, in all countries in which parliamentary institutions have been set up or have existed during the present century, either the Protestant feeling or the radical feeling has been so strong that no party could afford to have it known that it enjoyed Papal support. Ireland was long the one exception to this rule, but of late the Pope would not venture even in Ireland openly to call on good Catholics to support a bill in which the Church had no direct interest.

In the second place, the bill which the Pope has chosen to recommend for Catholic support is a very extraordinary one for a foreign ecclesiastic to take under his protection. No measure could well be more secular and domestic in its nature than the army bill which Bismarck is trying to push through the Reichstag. The majority in the Reichstag have not refused him the number of men he asks for. They have simply refused to allow the control of the army to pass out of their hands for more than three years, while he asks them to surrender it for seven. In surrendering it for even three years, they would be going beyond constitutional usage. In other parliamentary countries the army is voted every year for one year and no longer. The concession of the German Parliament is, therefore, really very great, and it is made out of deference to the wishes of the three old men who have founded the German empire. But whether this concession is sufficient for the safety of the empire, or whether it is too great for the interests of constitutional government, are questions on which only Germans are qualified to pass; and any German who passes on them under the influence of any but German considerations—that is, who thinks, in voting on them, of anything but the safety, honor, and welfare of the German nation—is, of course, a bad citizen.

Cardinal Jacobini, however, in advising Catholics to support the Septennate, does not pretend that either the Pope or he knows anything about the matter, except that the adoption of the Septennate would please Bismarck, and render him more disposed to make concessions to the Church in the legislation touching Church property and discipline. More extraordinary still, the Cardinal proposes, as the means of softening Bismarck towards the Church, that Catholics should largely increase his powers as a fighting man. What Bismarck complains of is, that the facilities at his disposal at present for killing French Catholics are not sufficient, and must be improved, and his control of them made more absolute. In asking for this, too, he enlarged on the difficulties of killing Frenchmen, on the vigor with which they resisted attempts to kill them, and on their sensitiveness about preparations made for that purpose. Nevertheless, in the teeth of his account of French pride and valor, he declared that the increase of the army as a threat against Frenchmen would increase the chances of peace. There is probably not a man in Germany who agrees with him in this, or who does not feel that these vast military preparations in Germany are gradually overcoming French reluctance to fight, and throwing France into the hands of a new military dictator. But the Pope and Cardinal Jacobini and the German Catholic bishops affect to believe that by enabling Bismarck to make an immense display of bullying, the French will be cowed into peaceableness, or, as the Cardinal says, "the danger of war will be averted in the near future."

It would be difficult to conceive of odder work for ministers of peace, or an odder way of hastening the establishment of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth. Of all sorrowful sights of the modern world, the French and German armaments are the most sorrowful. When one thinks of the purposes for which these vast hosts are intended, and of the scenes we shall witness when they are brought into collision and their deadly science set to work, one naturally expects them to fill the soul of a successor of the Apostles with inextinguishable horror, and make him feel that the first and best work of the Church in our time would be to rid humanity of this great curse — to persuade kings and rulers to turn their thoughts to the things which make for peace. One can hardly wonder that the masses are breaking away from the Church, and turning a deaf ear to the Christian Gospel, when we find the heads of the Church encouraging preparations for bloodshed, and advising voters that the maintenance of immense armies is a means of averting strife.

THE LATE LORD IDDESLEIGH.

LONDON, January 21.

THE death of Lord Iddesleigh, whom Americans as well as Englishmen doubtless know better under the name of Sir Stafford Northcote, has caused deep and general regret in this country. He was probably the only eminent statesman whom both parties equally respected. He had filled a conspicuous place for many years, and filled it with integrity and dignity. The suddenness of his death, coming at a moment when public sentiment had already condemned the slight deemed to have been put upon him in the reconstruction of the present Ministry, evoked a burst of sympathy such as has hardly been seen since Peel perished by an accident more than thirty years ago. The question as to his treatment by his colleagues is of only a transient interest; but your American readers may like to hear some personal impressions of a man with whose name they were familiar, and who, as one of the Commissioners who negotiated the Alabama Claims Treaty of Washington in 1871, had been himself concerned in American affairs.

He belonged to a type of politician less common among us than formerly, and likely to become still more rare as England grows more democratic—the county gentleman of old family and good estate, who is naturally returned to Parliament in respect of his social position in his county, who has leisure to cultivate himself for statesmanship, and has no need to supplement his private means by public office. Devonshire, from which he came, has preserved more of the old features of English country life than the central and northern parts of England, where manufactures and the growth of population have swept away the venerable remains of feudalism. In Devonshire the old families are still deeply respected by the people. They are nearly all allied to one another by marriage. Few rich parvenus have intruded among them; aristocratic society is therefore exceptionally easy, simple, and unostentatious. There is still a strong local patriotism, which makes every Devonshire man, whatever his religious or political prepossessions, proud of other Devonshire men who rise to eminence, and which exerts a wholesome influence on the tone of manners and social intercourse. Sir Stafford was a thorough Devonshire man, who loved his county and knew its dialect: his Devonshire stories, told with the strong accent he could assume, were the delight of any company that could tempt him to repeat them. He had the regular education of the good old English type, was a schoolboy at Eton, then went to Oxford, won the highest distinctions as a scholar, and laid the foundations of a remarkably wide knowledge of modern as well as ancient literature. He served his apprenticeship to statesmanship as private secretary to Mr. Gladstone, who was then (1843) a member of Sir Robert Peel's Government. When the great schism in the Tory party took place over the question of free trade in corn, he was not yet in Parliament, and therefore had not to choose between Peel and the protectionists. In 1855, when he first entered the House of Commons, that question was settled and gone, so there was no inconsistency in his ranging himself with the Tory party, although himself a decided free-trader. His ability speedily brought him to the top. He became a Minister in 1859, entered the Cabinet in 1866, when a new Tory Ministry was formed under Lord Derby, and in 1876, when Mr. Disraeli retired to the House of Lords, he became leader of the Ministerial majority in the House of Commons.

As a Parliamentarian he had two great and eminent merits—immense knowledge and admirable readiness. He was all his life a keen observer and a diligent student; and as his memory was unusually retentive, all that he had observed or read stood constantly at his command. In questions of trade and finance—questions which, owing, perhaps, to their increasing intricacy, seem to be less and less mastered by practical politicians—he was especially strong. He was, indeed, the only man on his own side in politics whose authority on such matters was generally acknowledged, and the brunt of the battle fell on him alone when they came up for discussion. As he now had his old master for his chief antagonist, the conflict was no easy one; but he never shrank from it. Not less remarkable was his quickness in debate. His manner was somewhat ineffective, for it wanted variety. Sentence followed sentence in a smooth and easy stream, always clear, always grammatically correct, but the stream was perhaps too equable. There were few impressive phrases, few brilliant figures, few of those appeals to passion with which it is necessary to warm and rouse a large assembly. When the House grew excited at the close of a long party debate, and Sir Stafford rose in the small hours of the morning to wind it up in behalf of his party, men felt that the ripple of his sweet voice, the softness of his gentle manner, were not what the occasion called for. But what he had to say was always to the point and well worth hearing. No facts or arguments suddenly thrown at him by opponents seemed to disconcert him; there was sure to be an answer ready. However weak his own case might seem, his ingenuity could always strengthen it; however powerfully the hostile case had been presented, he never failed to find weak places in it and to break it down by a succession of well-planted criticisms, each apparently small, but damaging when taken all together.

It was interesting to watch him as he sat on the front bench, with his hat set so low on his brow that it hid all the upper part of his face, while the lower part was covered by a thick beard—perfectly motionless, rarely taking a note of what was said, and, to all appearance, the most indifferent figure in the House. But when he rose, one perceived that nothing had escaped him. Every point which an antagonist had made was taken up and dealt with; no point that could aid his own contention was neglected, and the fluent grace with which his discourse swept along was not more surprising than the unfailing skill with which he shunned dangerous ground, and put his propositions in a form which made it difficult to contradict them. I remember to have heard an eminent chief of the opposite party remark, that nothing was more difficult than to defend your argument from Northcote, because he had the art of nibbling it away, admitting a little in order to evade or overthrow the rest.

With these intellectual gifts, he possessed the still rarer merit of unfailing courtesy and a temper almost too unruffled. Not only did he never seek to give pain, even where pain might have been a wholesome discipline for pushing selfishness—he seemed incapable of irritation, and bore with vexatious obstruction from some members of the House and mutinous attacks from others who belonged to his own party, when a spirit less kindly and forgiving might have better secured his own authority and the dignity of the assembly. He seemed to proceed on the assumption that every one else was a gentleman like himself, penetrated by the old traditions of the House of Commons. It is an assumption which, as his own career proved, can no longer be safely made.

His tactics in leading the Opposition against Mr. Gladstone's Ministry from 1880 till 1885 have been often censured by his own party. That party was then furious at its unexpected defeat at the election of 1880; it was full of fight, burning for revenge, eager to denounce every trifling error of the Ministry, and give battle on small as well as great occasions. Hence it resented the calm and cautiously critical attitude which Sir Stafford Northcote took up. He saw, as impartial observers saw, that little was to be gained by worrying an enemy so superior in force and flushed with victory, and that it was wiser to wait till the Ministry should begin to make mistakes and incur misfortunes in the natural course of events, before resuming the offensive against them. There is always a tendency to reaction in English popular opinion, and a tendency to murmur against whichever party may be in power. This tendency would before long have told in favor of the Tories, with little effort on their own part; and when it was already manifest, a Parliamentary attack could have been delivered with effect. Sir Stafford was probably right, but, being too prone to yield to pressure, he allowed himself to be drawn by the clamor of his followers into aggressive operations which, nevertheless, not quite himself approving them, he conducted in what seemed a half-hearted way.

Not only was his own temper pacific, but he was too reasonable a man, too large-minded, too dispassionate, to be a successful party leader. He was superior to the ordinary prejudices of old-fashioned Toryism, while yet he was too cautious and conscientious to lend himself to the demagogism of Tory democracy. In fact, so far as political opinions went, he might, had fortune sent him into the world as the son of a Whig family, have made an excellent Whig, removed as far from high Toryism on the one hand as from Radicalism on the other. There was, therefore, a certain incompatibility between the man and the position. The average partisan felt that his leader was not in perfect sympathy with his own sentiments. The militant partisans, whatever their sentiments, desired a pugnacious chief. Had he possessed a more imperious will, he might have overcome these difficulties, because his abilities and experience were so great that the party could not do without him, and his character stood so high that the mass of sensible Tories all over the country would have rallied to him, if he had appealed to them against the intriguers and malcontents who sought to supplant him. Lord Salisbury has been blamed for not having given him a vigorous support against these intriguers; but till more is known of the secret history of the last three years, it would be unfair to take the charge as proved.

As an administrator, Sir Stafford Northcote was diligent, judicious, and singularly free from any taint of jobbery. He sought for nothing for himself; he never abused his patronage; he never forgot the interests of the country; he never grudged labor, although there might be no prospect of winning credit by it. It was remarked of him that even in great party meetings, where invective against political opponents is apt to be expected and relished, he never condescended to abuse, and always argued fairly. Few statesmen of our times have been so generally popular. The fire of his opponents was hardly ever directed against him, even when controversy was hottest. In private life he had the charm of perfectly simple and unpretending manners, coupled with a rich fund of humor, an immense store of anecdote, and a geniality which came straight from the heart. Three years ago, when the University of Edinburgh celebrated its tercentenary, he happened to be Lord Rector, and in that capacity had to preside over the festivities. Although a total stranger to Scotland, and far removed (for he was a strong High Churchman) from sympathy with Scottish Presbyterianism, he won golden opinions from the Scotch, as well as from the crowd of foreign visitors, by the tact and grace with which he discharged all his duties, and the skill with which, putting off the politician, he entered into the spirit of the occasion as a lover of letters and learning. Though it was in respect of his political eminence that he had been elected to the office, every one felt that it would not have been easy to have found in the ranks of literature and science any one fitter to preside over such a gathering.

He leaves behind few or none in his own party in whom the capacities of the practical statesman are so happily blended with a philosophic judgment and a wide culture. It is a combination which was inadequately appreciated in his own person, and is likely to be less and less appreciated in the stormy epoch on which England seems to be entering. Vehemence in controversy, domineering audacity of purpose, the power of moving crowds by incisive and stirring harangues, are the qualities which the new generation seems disposed to cultivate. They are qualities apt to be valued in a time of strife, a time when men are less concerned to develop and advance their principles than to consolidate the organization of their party and dazzle the nation by large promises or bold strokes.

O. D.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE DAILY PRESS IN ITALY.

ROME, January 21.

As against "J. W. M." in No. 1123 of the Nation, I am not disposed to claim a very high position for the Italian press as compared with the leading English and American papers; but what your correspondent says of the principal papers is most unjust. The Perseveranza is one of the best dailies on the Continent, and as able as ever it was; the Nazione of Florence is a high-toned, honest, admirably written paper, and one of the most influential in the kingdom. Its articles on the Papal question and the chief topics of Continental politics are cast in the largest type of patriotism, and it never bends to local prejudices, lends itself to personalities, or fears to be locally unpopular. I "read the Opinione of Rome," and find it very clear-headed and fair, though I do not know its editor or one of its writers. The Tribuna, me judice, is far from being the best Roman paper, though I should hardly be prepared to say which is. I should, six months ago, have named the Rassegna, but that was stopped in November, as "J. W. M.," says, not without some inaccuracy. The Rassegna was owned by Sonnino and Toraca. They differed on the course to be taken at the last crisis, and, both being deputies, one voted with, and the other against, the Ministry; and as they saw no prospect of working together, and neither cared to carry on the paper at his sole expense, they agreed to stop it lest it fall below the old standard in some other hands. It was as good a paper as any on the Continent, much of the character of the Temps of Paris, the best French daily.

The Opinione, the Stampa, and the Riforma are all better papers, in my opinion, than the Tribuna; and the Popolo Romano, a small paper, contains (as it well may, being the official paper) little besides concise and well-written short articles expressing the views of the Ministry, and few papers in Italy give much space to anything but the news and internal correspondence, general Italian information. Fanfulla and Capitan Fracassa are very bright, witty papers, and the Corriere di Roma is a capital daily, if a little too abundant in sparkling articles, admirably written, however. Besides these, there are scores of papers not noteworthy by name, but, as local organs, creditable and always in good Italian, though, like American country newspapers, devoted to local interests.

Italian journalism is unexciting, it is true, because it has no cause to be savage or trenchant; but it is as clever intellectually as ever. The difficulty is that, as journalism lives on the suggestions of the day, it is dull on dull days. "J. W. M." misses the entire character of Italian public life, which has changed with the changed state of the country. Italians are too sensible to form parties on fictions, and, there being no parties and no party organs, and nobody being excited about topics of general publicity, the journals are for the time poorly supported. This makes them poorly paid, and throws them into the hands of men of political aspirations, and (inevitable consequence in all countries), instead of being party organs, they become personal organs. Very few of them pay expenses, and they are therefore mostly kept alive by subventions as was always the case. If the Popolo Romano is the organ of the Ministry as a whole, the Stampa of the Department of the Interior, etc., etc., in what is that better or worse than that the Riforma should be the organ of Crispi, the Roma del Popolo of Mazzini, the Diritto of Doda, or the Tribuna of Cairoli, etc., etc.? "Of the Popolo Romano and its editor, the less said the better." I do not know the editor, and have never heard him spoken of for ill or good; but I have the paper on my breakfast table every morning, and find it, if concise and reserved when I wish it would speak out, a respectable and dignified journal, able, always to the point, and with plenty of backbone. It is (and I speak from a position outside of the circle of Roman journalists, of whom I know not half-a-dozen) a paper to be well spoken of and read with profit.

Plenty of papers are dead in Italy and plenty more will die, because, though Italy is an old country and its people a mature one, their state is in a metamorphosis, and the relation of parts is new, so that changes are continually taking place, new commercial interests developing, new institutions being formed. But the life intellectual of the nation is as vigorous as ever it was, and if the absorbing or exciting topic does not offer, the subtlety and intellectual grasp are as great as ever. Italians as a nation do not read much, it is true, because education is still very limited; they lose little, considering what those nations generally read that do read much. They do not print many books, but we know nations that print too many. I cannot say, though I have every interest to wish it otherwise, that journalism is largely patronized in Italy; but I can conscientiously say that it is not falling off in ability, and if it does not govern the nation as in exciting days, it does all that the existing conditions demand. It is true that in Italy journalism is mostly ill paid, and occupies young men of talent who are forming their views and creating their positions, so that necessarily there is a great deal of immature work to be found in the journals. But one must be a dreary doctrinaire not to find in the Nazione, the Italia, the Fungolo, Perseveranza, Opinione, Riforma, and many others the proof that the Italian mind is as alert, active and subtle as ever it was if the theme offers. Why, even the old Osservatore Romano, organ of the Vatican, is ten times the paper it used to be when the Pope reigned over Rome. The views of "J. W. M." are those of one out of all present connection with politics and out of touch with the actual condition of Italy, forgetful that the entire Italian life has changed between 1870 and 1886, and surprised not to find midi à quatre heures.

W.

DUMAS'S "FRANCILLON."

PARIS, January 28, 1887.

I MUST confess having been disappointed in "Francillon," the new drama by Alexandre Dumas which is being played at the Théâtre-Français, and, I will say at once, admirably played. I have no fault to find with the actors, but the actors disappear, in this case, before the author; their perfection seemed to me even rather irritating, and I could at times not help asking myself if they were not doing too much for the author, and concealing too completely the imperfections of the piece. It is impossible not to feel great sympathy for Alexandre Dumas; there is in all his literary work a constant and at times an almost painful effort towards a better social ideal, towards a higher standard of morality. He is a singular sort of moralist, but he is a moralist. He has discovered virtue, as a traveller discovers some new land, and he has liked it after having discovered it. He began life with the free-and-easy "Dame aux Camélias," and he surrounded her with a poetical halo. He afterwards found his way out of the "demi-monde," and took the mask off the face of the dangerous adventuress who means to rise from the "demi-monde" into the real "monde." He learned to distinguish between the good and the bad peaches, as handsome as the good ones, but with a little black spot, the only sign of decay and corruption. He afterwards fought many a battle for the rights of the natural son, for the rights of woman, for divorce. He may be considered one of the authors of the law which has recently been passed, and which has reëstablished divorce in France, under certain conditions.

Under the various expressions of his intense curiosity and of his moralizing tendencies, under all his bitter expressions of contempt, of anger, at the sight of all the sufferings caused by the present arrangement of society, you can discover a fundamental idea, a Calvinistic idea, an innate belief in the iniquity of man and of woman. Dumas believes in what the Puritans called the total depravity of man; and though he proposes today one cure, to-morrow another, for the evils of society, he really believes in none. It cannot be said of him, "Castigat ridendo mores." There is something sinister in his laugh; his pleasantries are cutting, he has no geniality. He is an artist, however, he can at times give us a poetical and fresh outline of youth, of pure love, of the pleasures of maternity; but he seems ashamed of himself when he has dwelt too long in the azure of fine and pure sentiments, and he throws himself back immediately, as with a sudden jerk, into the dark abyss of vice, of hypocrisy, of corruption. He takes a dark view of life, of his own time, and of all times; and, in this respect, he may be called a representative man. He is the true image of a generation which has no definite principles, no clear view of duty, which is working its way towards an unknown future with fear, with effort, without hope, in a sort of pathological despair.

All these tendencies, all these preoccupations, are found in a high degree in "Francillon." Dumas has set before himself, as usual, a high and moral object: he wished to prove that conjugal fidelity is as imperative a duty for a man as it is for a woman; that a contract is bilateral, and that it cannot give rights without duties. So far, so good; but how has he worked out this idea? He has been obliged to invent very repulsive characters, and to show a husband, Lucien de Riverolles, who neglects his wife after two years of marriage, and who returns to his old associates, among whom is a certain Rosalie Michon, well known of all Paris. The first act throws us in the society of Lucien. We see him reading his newspaper with the air of a man who is tired of his home; we see his friends, who have been dining with him—frivolous clubmen, companions of his youth, who speak before his wife as if she were not there. She has been accustomed from childhood to this freedom in her own circle and her own family. She never has felt any restraint; her mother died when she was young, her father is a clubman himself, a selfish old child. Her name is Francine, but she allows her husband's friends to call her by her nickname of Francillon. With the experience she acquired in her earliest days why did she marry Lucien de Riverolles? and, what is more, why does she love him?—for she loves him with an intense and hungry passion, she loves him only, she has hardly any love for her young child, though she has nursed the child herself. A married friend, a Mrs. Smith, who belongs to her intimate circle, and who is a sort of repoussoir, as the French painters say, has in vain tried to persuade her that, as soon as a woman is married, the wife must disappear in the mother. Francillon is less a mother than a wife, and less a wife than a lover; she is passionate, eccentric, in many senses unreasonable; she has the modern malady, the névrose. The actress who plays the part, Mlle. Bartet, is very high-strung, and she prepares us at once for the extraordinary behavior of Francillon.

Everybody is gone: one after the other the friends have taken their leave; the husband and the wife remain alone. Francillon is enervated, she is sentimental, she is angry. During the evening all these men have spoken of this Rosalie Michon, whom her husband once knew, whom he perhaps still sees; she is instinctively jealous, and she shows it, like a child of nature. The husband wants to go out, though it is late; she tries to keep him—no, he must go, he has promised some friends at the club to go with them to the Opéra ball; he must keep his promise. You see the scene: the man in haste, scornful, treating his wife like a child; the wife, struck at heart, humble first, then proud, finally angry and vengeful. She says to him in the end: "Mark my words, if you ever deceive me, it will be eye for eye, tooth for tooth." He laughs and goes. He goes, and then we see a terrible change come over Francillon. She must follow him. She dresses rapidly, and, to the astonishment of the servants, leaves her house at one o'clock in the morning, alone, on foot. She goes, she is gone; the lamps are put out, and the curtain falls.

This first act is the best; it is extremely clever, and, in the end, very impressive. The second and third acts are not so good. One night has made a great revolution. Francillon has taken a cab and gone to the door of her husband's club; she has watched him, followed him to the Opéra. She has shown the cleverness of a detective, has procured rapidly a domino, has seen her husband in a box with Rosalie Michon, seen him go away with her; she has asked an unknown man to take her to the restaurant of the Maison d'Or, where he has gone himself. She has had supper in a room close to his room. She has had the same supper—she shows him the next morning the menu, shows him the number of her cab, gives him all the possible proofs of the vengeance she has taken. He will not believe her at first; she accumulates the proofs. He has deceived her, and did she not say to him: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth"?

I have heard that Alexandre Dumas was extremely afraid of the effect of this scene. There was indeed something very monstrous in the action of this young and so far pure and innocent Francillon. The public feel instinctively that a human being cannot jump so desperately from a state of innocence and virtue into an abyss of vulgar and ignoble corruption. We say to ourselves what the poet says:

"Quelque crime toujours précède les grands crimes."

The scene is, however, conducted with so much skill that the public accepted it; we were all surprised at Francillon's folly, but we did not exactly know how far she had gone. She left us in the dark; she spoke of herself as a woman who had made the sacrifice of her honor, but we did not know whether she was really guilty or not. Her husband did not know either. She bids him kill her: "Tue-moi donc"—and he does not kill her. He assembles a sort of family council, and asks advice of everybody. This family council is one of the most extraordinary things I have ever seen on the stage. The father of Lucien, consulted by his son, seizes the opportunity and tells us, in old-fashioned French, a conte de Brantôme; he treats the whole matter very lightly, insists upon having cards brought, and plays a game of piquet with Mrs. Smith, to whom he says confidentially that really his son is "un serin." This familiar expression is not easy to translate: "serin" is the name of a bird—it is equivalent to a fool, an idiot, a light-headed, silly creature; and the word is not too severe for Lucien de Riverolles, who thinks himself dishonored as a husband, and who takes everybody into his confidence. Every one of his friends gives his advice, they all discuss his situation before him. One of these friends, called Stanislas, and familiarly called Stan, is the type of those men whom a modern dramatist has called the "inutiles": he is a man of leisure and of fashion, and is disgusted with everything and everybody, and especially with himself. He makes his outpourings of disgust and of ennui in the family council, and, finally, lights a cigar, and exclaims, "Il n'y a même plus de bons cigares."

I was reminded of a recent and scandalous trial which has for weeks occupied all England, by the behavior of M. Lucien de Riverolles, who, in this second act, cross-examines all his servants on the subject of their mistress's behavior during this unfortunate night spent at the Opéra and at the Maison d'Or. One of them, a footman, had followed his mistress to the door of the club, from there to the Opéra, from the Opéra to the Maison d'Or. There are some comical details in his cross-examination, and here the comedy becomes a mere vaudeville. I am sorry to say that it remains so to the end. The dénouement would not be out of harmony with the plays of the Palais-Royal. What we all want to know is this: Is Francillon guilty or not? Has she really been as bad as she would have her husband think? In his anger, he declares that she and he must separate—that they must separate their fortunes first; and he sends for his notary (by telephone, for we now have telephones on the stage). The notary is absent, and who comes in his place? His first clerk, a tall, handsome young man, who goes, when his work is finished, to the balls of the Opéra, and who, at the last ball, offered his arm to Francillon. There he is in the flesh, the bel inconnu, and the question now arises, Will he tell the whole truth, since she would not? He is rather ashamed of himself, as he did not play the beau rôle; he did not even pay for the supper at the Maison d'Or—Francillon had paid for it herself. The truth finally comes out: the young clerk is not a dangerous Lovelace; Francillon has only made an escapade, and she is virtuous, as pure as the morning dew. Lucien de Riverolles also is virtuous: he only saw his Rosalie Michon because she wanted to have his advice on a marriage which she meditated making with one of her numerous friends. "Embrassons-nous et que ça finisse," as the French often say. This is pure vaudeville, and—

"Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne."

Dumas has proved nothing. If we reflect a moment, we cannot take a very hopeful view of the ménage Riverolles; we can anticipate new troubles in the union of this "serin" and of this neuropathic Francillon. There are some charming, some eloquent and pathetic parts in this play, which on the whole is very unsatisfactory. What must be chiefly regretted is the disregard of common decency which is shown at times, and quite unnecessarily; there are some details, some words, which are truly painful in this respect. The play cannot be said to be immoral, for it even intends to be moral; but the author often forgets what modesty means.

Correspondence.

"INFLUENTIAL."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Having procured a copy of the Forum for last October, I find that I have something to say, in continuation of my letter of the 20th instant, regarding Bishop Coxe's "Americanisms in England." To what extent this is a misnomer for his article, shall be made out before I have done with it.

Influential is a term the imagined misuse of which sorely disquiets him. In treating of it, however, he has betrayed that his conversance with literature, no less than his philological proficiency, must be characterized as exceedingly pupillary. This is to be regretted.

"As a person," he writes, "cannot be conceived of as poured out or infused, though his language may be flowing and operative like wine, I doubt whether an 'influential man' would be acceped [sic] usage even in Scotland." There is allusion, in this, to the somewhat rare adjective influent, a word which occurs, in its strictly etymological sense, in Cowper's "Thames with influent tide." In passing, the Bishop refers, for influent, only to a quotation in Richardson's Dictionary; and this quotation he fathers on "Bishop Montague, a writer of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries." Here, as almost everywhere, he is deplorably uncritical. He gets the name wrong, he episcopizes his "Montague," and he antedates his time. The author in question is Walter Mountagu, second son of the first Earl of Manchester, born in 1604. Leaving the Church of England, he joined that of Rome, and became Abbot of the Monastery of Nanteuil, and also of the abbey of St. Martin, near Pontoise. Richardson's quotation is from his 'Miscellanea Spiritualia,' of which the first part and the second were originally published in 1648 and 1653, respectively.

A much older authority than Walter Mountagu for influent, with one a few years later, deserves notice; for I pass by the doubtful Chaucerian substantive influents for influences. Lydgate, in the "Lenvoye" to the last Book of his 'Bochas,' written about 1430, has: "An heavenly signe by influent purveyaunce Sent from above to shew Edwardes right." And Dr. Thomas Fuller, in his 'Church-history,' published in 1655, says, in Book viii, Sect. iii, §6, relatively to Bishop Richard Cox, that he "was vertually influent upon all, and most active . . . in the prudential part of Church-government." In these passages influent signifies "exerting power"; and so it does, obviously, in Mountagu's "Humilitie . . . is more operative and influent upon others, then any other vertue," which Bishop Coxe misquotes and misunderstands.

The French have had, for some hundred years, as an intransitive verb, influer, "to be of influence," "to act by a secret virtue"; and they now, further, use it causatively, in the sense of "to make to enter," "to infuse." They likewise have, as a recent creation, the related adjective influent, "possessing influence." In like manner our old influent owed its existence, in all probability, directly to influere, as employed by astrologers. Otherwise, it was suggested by the substantive influence; in which case it has an analogue in experient, "having experience," an unusual equivalent of experienced. I am not aware that we ever had a verb to influe, matching to imbue, though Joshua Sylvester presupposes it in his "pleasant Influing of Pleiades." See "Job Triumphant," in his 'Works' (ed. 1621), p. 944. Gaule, in his 'Magastromancer' (1652), p. 93, uses to inflow, "to exert influence," of the stars; and other writers on astrology have, presumably, done the same. Evidently enough, Bishop Coxe is of opinion that influential ought to have, exclusively, the same meaning as influent—taken as one with inflowing—of which he appears to regard it as no better than an elongation, and as a depravation to boot. If not, why does he say that "Dr. Johnson seems to allow it, in the sense of 'exerting influence'; but, probably, physical influence is intended"; implying that the lexicographer, when he constructed his definition, was nodding, or else it would have been something different? And why does he introduce the criticism of a brother bishop, that, as between influent and influential, the former "is the better word"; while he himself calls it "the more orthodox word"? For the rest, mistranscribing, from Richardson's Dictionary, Thomson's "Thy influential vigour reinspires This feeble frame," he dogmatizes that its influential is "used for influent." Of this we can hardly be sure. As my subjoined quotations, especially those from Gaule, bear witness, influential has been made to bear a variety of significations; but "inflowing," which Bishop Coxe identifies with the old influent, is not among those which I have chanced on. It cannot, indeed, be pronounced peremptorily that, like Cowper with his influent, Thomson does not, in his influential, indulge in a literal Latinism, and would better have put penetrative. Still, the notion that he intends, by it, "actuating," "controlling," "efficacious," or, archaically, "prevalent," is not to be dismissed as altogether unworthy of consideration.

Substantial is from the genuine Latin substantialis; and we have, or have had, a good number of adjectives from factitious Latin vocables with the same termination as that of substantialis, based on rhematic substantives, real or assumed. Anomalously, reverential is, as sometimes employed, one with reverent. But confidential, differential, evidential, penitential, and providential, to go no further, differ, in import, from confident, etc. Yet, according to the Bishop's reasoning, the pairs should be synonymous, and the shorter members of them should be held to be "the more orthodox." When philosophers wanted a technical term opposed to actual, they did not satisfy themselves with potent, burdening it with a new sense, but Anglicized the mediæval potentialis. Similarly, to obtain an adjective importing not only "possessed of influence," but "exerting influence," "pertaining to influence," and so on, discarding the old influent, they built influential on influence, or they may have had influentialis ready to their hands for adaptation, developed from the Low Latin influentia.

Quite unexceptionable, for the French, with their verb influer, "to be of influence," is influent, "having influence" the application of which they confine to persons. "An influential man" they render by "un homme influent"; and their adjective is greatly inferior to ours, in not being analogically susceptible, according to circumstances, of a multiplicity of significations. But our old influent, particularly in the absence of a verb to influe, was naturally superseded by influential. Except to the learned, it must have had a strange air; and it did not immediately remind any but them, as influential did, of influence. Improvement on obscurity gave us influential, as it gave us influence to, and then influence on—which displaced the Latinistic influence into—with ingredient of, in place of ingredient into.

Bishop Coxe must excuse me if I cannot help thinking that, even if he had pondered his Bible more heedfully, he might have been led to take a more tenable view of the word influential. The idea, authorized by the Holy Ghost, which transpires in the phrase "the sweet influences of Pleiades," points, unmistakably, in spite of John Gaule and other rationalizing expositors, to a belief in the effect of the stars on human destiny and terrestrial matters generally. Here we have the term influence used in what is ascertained to have been its original acceptation; it having been coined, like ascendant, disaster, etc., as an astrological technicality. By influence, "influx," our more or less distant forefathers, in their wisdom, understood, primarily, the action by which a mysterious ether, astral or lunar, comparable to the fluid with which the lodestone has been speculatively invested, reached our planet, and then, by a common figure of speech, that ether itself, regarded as an embodiment of occult energy. Of course there was frequent occasion to speak of the stars both as putting forth their power and as simply endowed with power; and their possession of power, or exertion of it, or relation to it, whereas it was not unequivocally denoted by influent, was sufficiently well denoted (contexts favoring) by its successor, influential. While still current in astrology, however, influential, soon after its rise, was engrafted on the popular speech. As far as I have discovered, it began to find favor, in ordinary discourse, in the dark days when English religionists, whether Laudian or otherwise, not only were familiar with the terminology of star-gazing, but were numerously wedded to that and kindred futilities and fatuities. But, much as I reluctantly leave unsaid, I must pass on to my quotations. "The late learned Bishop of Chester"—that is to say, Dr. Jacobson—gave it as his judgment, Bishop Coxe alleges, that "he doubted whether influential could be found in any writer before the present century, in a moral sense." The American magnate eulogizes his old-country peer as being "a specialist in English words." From what has preceded and what is to follow, it may be inferred how far he justified the compliment:

"The more full and sweet influentiall manifestations of his [God's] presence among them." Rev. Thomas Case (1643), Three Sermons (1644), p. 32.

"In like manner, Jesus Christ . . . hath a very strong and influentiall vertue upon the Heart of a Christian." Rev. Obadiah Sedgwick, Christ the Life (1650), p. 5.

"This is Jacobs Ladder: without this there is no Ascent or Descent, either Influentiall or Personall." Rev. Thomas Vaughan, Anthroposophia Theomagica (1650), p. 23.

"These influentiall Channels [of the stars] were broken" "The Starres and their influentiall Constellations." "Influentiall vertues" [of the stars]. "The influentiall motion of the Stars." "Consisting of an influentiall and elementary mixtion." "Potentiall influxes, influentiall proclivities, seminall dispositions." Rev. John Gaule, Magastromancer (1652), pp. 3, 49, 63, 77, 136, 147.

"Their influentiall beneficiall fellowship ceaseth." "The whole City, unto which he was profitably influentiall." Rev. Simeon Ashe, Funeral Sermon, June 18 (1655), pp. 10, 28.

"Hurtful errours, influential on practice." Rev. Dr. Isaac Barrow (died 1677), Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy (ed. 1687), p. 140. "This [God's doing] I put in the first place, as previous in nature, and influentiall upon the rest." "The consideration that God doth uphold all things . . . may, upon several good accounts, be influential upon our practice." "Our Saviour's example is especially influential upon practice." "Meek and gentle ways, directly influential upon mind and conscience." "Their deportment being of higher consequence, and most influential on the world." Barrow, Works (ed. 1686, 1687), vol. i, p. 143; vol. ii, p, 168; vol. iii, pp. 35, 289, 425.

"History should do Justice to all Persons extraordinarily quahfied, and influential on Affairs of the Public." "So influential are Faction and Prejudice, in Matters of Justice." "He was of such an over-ruling Genius . . . as enabled him to be very influential among the Citisens." Roger North (died 1734), Examen (1740), pp. 221, 518, 550.

"You must needs think—but I will say no more; so flatly denied, and your example so influential." Samuel Richardson (1754), Correspondence (1804), vol. iii, p. 216.

"More ceremony, and a greater regard for forms, . . . are, I will venture to assert, influential principles in every other kingdom of Europe." "All the qualities . . . should be blended together in our minds and hearts, and made influential of [i. e., on] our opinions and practices." "From the want of successors to his crown, in influential degrees." "The influential honour of an able and steady administration of power." "But the goodness of his troops is to be attributed to the discipline he has established, the incitements he has made happily influential." Anon., The Herald (1757 8), vol. i, p. 131; vol. ii, pp. 97, 125, 140, 201 (ed. 1758).

"Perhaps thou art a leading man, and the Esteem of thy wisdom is influential on the conduct of others." "Both these societies are influential on those who belong to them." Rev. William Jones, of Nayland (some time before 1800), Theological and Miscellaneous Works (1810), Vol. i. p. 145; vol. ii, p. 11.

The Rev. Joseph Glanvill, who died in 1680, has influential six times, and uninfluential twice.

Only Sir Thomas Browne is cited, by the dictionaries, for influentially. Here are three other oldish quotations for it:

"Why the starres should be more notable for influentially operating." Gaule (as above), p. 97.

"Christ is influentially operative in the soul where he resideth." Rev. Simeon Ashe, Funeral Sermon, March 10 (1654), p. 27.

"Though they were few men comparatively, yet influentially they were many." Bishop Gauden, Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Suspiria (1659), p. 325.

At a period when influential was seldom used, we occasionally find, in its stead, influencing:

"The house was not contaminated with the more influencing example of the Perdita." The New Spectator (1784), No. viii, p. 7.

In my 'Modern English' there are particulars touching influential and influencive which I shall not here repeat. Since I printed that work, in 1873, supposing that I had satisfactorily proved influential to have been of good repute in former times, I have not, I am convinced, made a note of one instance of its occurrence in ten that I have met with in authors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The array of citations produced above is, consequently, most meagre, as compared with what it might have been.

"'An influential person,' even now," says Bishop Coxe, "is an expression hardly tolerable." I have lived upwards of forty years on British soil; and I feel that I run no risk whatever of being thought to labor under hallucination in asserting that not one Englishman out of 10,000 would hesitate to say that so and so is "an influential man in his county." If Fuller, as has been seen, qualified Dr. Cox as influent, surely we may be permitted to qualify Dr. Coxe, at least in his ecclesiastical capacity, as influential, unlikely as he may be, without long-continued and independent research, to win that epithet in the department of our vernacular philology.

Your obedient servant,
F. Hall.
Marlesford, Wickham Market, Jan. 23, 1887.

WAYS AND MEANS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: There is one thing which it seems as if the people of the United States were entitled to know, and that is the condition of their national accounts, the facts as to the national income and expenditure. But they evidently cannot do this if half-a-dozen authorities, officially of precisely equal weight, each tell them a different story. According to your statement, Senator Morrill says there is a deficit of 24 millions, Senator Allison says there is a surplus of 15 millions (or, allowing for the suspension of the Sinking Fund, if it is suspended, of 63 millions), while Senator Beck undertakes to show that this is 27 millions too small, and that there is a real surplus of 90 millions. Considering that upon a correct estimate depends the necessity of a reduction of revenue or the possibility of increased expenditure, and, what is more important, whether the Treasury, by drawing in its surplus in cash, shall seriously endanger the money market, it is plain that this is not the way in which the finances of a nation should be managed. It is stated that all these jarring calculations are based upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. One might suppose that this report was an ancient manuscript discovered in some Eastern monastery, over which scholars might wrangle for centuries without coming to any conclusion. In fact, there is one man whose proper function and whose duty it is to make the whole matter clear to a cent, and without the possibility of a doubt, under cross-examination by all of these critics. For that purpose it is only needed that the Secretary of the Treasury should be admitted to a share in the financial debates of the two houses.

There is a growing consciousness throughout the country that the Speaker of the House has the most extensive and the most irresponsible power of any man in the Government. By his entire control of the make-up of the committees, subject only to the partisan influences which have elected him, and his option of "recognizing" or giving the floor to whom he pleases, he can suppress, or, to a certain extent, promote, any legislation at his discretion. It appears that Mr. Morrison and Mr. Randall are the heads of two factions, though that is not what they call themselves, which take different views as to the methods for the necessary reduction of the revenue. Mr. Morrison's scheme, which was supported by the Speaker, Mr. Carlisle, was refused consideration by the House, and Mr. Randall and his friends asked for a consideration of theirs; whereupon, according to a correspondent,

"After consultation with Mr. Morrison, the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee and other leading Democrats, the Speaker has decided not to grant this request, nor to recognize any one for the purpose indicated. The Speaker and his friends do not think it is either fair or just, under the circumstances, that Mr. Randall and his friends should be recognized for this purpose."

But Mr. Randall, also, can play his little game. The Naval Defence Bill is referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and Mr. Randall, probably "not thinking it fair or just under the circumstances" that it should be considered, decides to put it in his pocket and button it up for the short remainder of the session.

These are interesting methods of carrying on a great Government. Does it not "jump to the eyes" that the executive branch, which is responsible for the administration of the finances as well as of the navy, should have the right to bring its proposals before the houses, and publicly demand consideration of them in the face of the country? G. B.

Boston, February 14, 1887.

A QUESTION FOR KATHEDER SOCIALISTS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Dr. Richard T. Ely, writing in the February number of the North American on American Economists, insists that in a science there must be no "orthodoxy," that, on the contrary, its votaries can become useful to the world only so far as they dissent from received opinions. In the science of political economy, he says, progress works altogether in a circle. Nothing has been accomplished. No truth has been established by the labors of a century—not even the one simple proposition that the less lawmakers interfere with the course of industry, the better it is for all concerned. In the eighteenth century, he tells us, economists were right in saying, Don't; but now they properly say to the State, Do!

I have one little question to ask "heretical" economists who trust in the power of legislation (navigation acts, tariffs, inter-State commerce bills, eight-hour laws, etc.) to make men happy and rich. Does all interference by the lawmaker increase human happiness and wealth, or must it be wise and well-considered interference?

The reason I ask the question is this. Living now for thirty-five years in one district, which, in the average intelligence of its people, compares well with that of the United States in general, and having watched no less than eighteen elections for Congress, I do not recollect a single one at which the successful candidate was chosen with any view to his supposed superior wisdom or learning in political science. Generally it was some lawyer, who had made a reputation by mere gift of gab in criminal or "damage" cases. Sometimes he was selected for his friendliness to foreigners or for his Know-nothing hatred of that class of the community, for his love of the Union or his sympathy with the suppressed rebellion; at times he owed his seat to the liberal and skilful employment of money at the polls or in a Democratic primary. But not a single man has, from this district, in thirty-five years, been sent to Congress because the people, or even because his friends, believed in his particular fitness to grapple with the grave political questions which might come up at Washington. Moreover, after they all got there, they learned very little. Our present member, the best we ever had, spent all his time at the Capitol in acting as gratuitous claim-agent for his constituents, regardless of party. Of his predecessors, one spent his waking hours mainly at the poker table, and another in drinking whiskey. Yet we have never sent a prize-fighter to Congress, as a New York district did once, nor a Fenian blatherskite, as a section of Chicago did twice; and I feel quite confident that the Louisville members of Congress are a fair sample of the wisdom and ability of the nation's lawmakers.

Now, if political economy is a science in which no solid ground has ever been reached, is it not somewhat chimerical to expect wise measures, benefiting society, based upon the still to be discovered new and true principles of that science, to be enacted by such a Congress as represents the American people?—Respectfully, L. N. D.

Louisville, Ky., February 7, 1887.

"AMERICAN" ARCHITECTURE.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The following words of the Government Supervising Architect, taken from an interview published in the Detroit Evening Journal of February 5, 1887, may be of general interest. He is describing the new Government building to be erected at Detroit, and says:

"The style of architecture is cosmopolitan, or American, if you please. I have endeavored to combine the serene dignity of Greek architecture with the Gothic, at the same time applying the vigorous lines of the English, the artistic feeling and grace of the French, the refinement of the Italian, and the systematic adaptation of the German schools. I am pleased of the results so far."

When a private man indulges in such preposterous talk as this, we smile at his ignorance. Considered as the utterance of a public official, charged with the duty of selecting plans for the important public buildings which the Government is every day erecting, it is of sadder significance. Does it mean that the dull but harmless conventionalism of the past is about to be superseded by this new "American"—but no, spare us!—this "cosmopolitan," type of public building, of which the Supervising Architect is the patentee? The "results" of which Mr. Bell is so enamored may be best described in the words of a local architect, to whom the plan was submitted:

"It is certainly very cosmopolitan. The main dome is a copy from the Louvre. The corner domes are after the Grand Opera House, Paris. The cornice work is too heavy—some seven or eight feet across its surface. I see weak attempts at Corinthian architecture surmounted by arches of the Romanesque. The cupola on the Shelby St. front is Queen Anne; and, in a word, the whole lacks strength and symmetry."

The President could not render a service of more lasting benefit than a thoroughgoing reformation of the Supervising Architect's office.

Wm. W. Hudson.

Detroit, Mich., February 7, 1887.

HOW TO COLLECT A LIBRARY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Russian book-beggar whose ways were exposed by one of his victims in your issue of February 10, is still at work; and as letters from him addressed to authors in this country are likely to arrive for some time to come, an added word of warning may perhaps be timely. On the 1st of February I received the following letter:

"Chemins de fer
du Süd-ouest
de la Russie.
—
Direction Centrale.
—

"Kiew, January 15, 1887.

"My Dear Sir: I am informed that you are a author of the work on Biology for university students which has great success in America. If it is permitted for a stranger, may I ask as a great favour that you will be good enough as to send for me, as to your collega, a copy of the book. I am forced to solicit this favour by impossibility to obtain the book in this country.

"I am,
"Dear Sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"Roman Plastounoff, M. D."

Pleased to find the book wanted so far from home, I was about to forward a copy when a friend interposed. It is clear from his appeal for a work on natural science as well as for one on political economy, that this fellow—unlike our highway tramps—is omnivorous. It will be noticed, also, that in this letter he signs himself "M. D.," in order the better to urge his request.

Yours truly,
Wm. T. Sedgwick.

Mass. Inst. of Technology, Boston,
February 12, 1887.

THE SOLDIER'S PATRIOTISM.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In the public discussions of the Pension Bill now before Congress, no politican seems to have had the courage to present one phase of the subject, which, to my mind, is of the utmost significance. No man with any regard for the honor of his country or the reputation of its citizens, can fail to view with alarm and disgust the growing rapacity of a class of persons who, while posing as patriots, inspired to fight the battles of the commonwealth by a decent and manly ambition to maintain its integrity, are yet eager to barter an honorable reputation for such stuff as hirelings, the world over, will fight for. Honor is prostituted to very base uses when soldiers accept alms for having done what every man of proper spirit thought it his duty to do. I do not allude to those who have been crippled in war. It is the privilege of the country to provide for them. But I do protest that the republic is disgraced by the greed of its soldiers. They should be the first to resent such an imputation as is contained in the Pension Bill. The country is come to a pretty pass when men are content to receive pensions rather than the good opinions and gratitude of their fellow-citizens.

I. H. L.

St. Louis, February 8, 1887.

Notes.

A new edition of W. W. Story's 'Roba di Roma,' enlarged by the author and brought down to date, is about to be published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. from entirely new plates.

Roberts Bros. have in preparation 'Some Chinese Ghosts,' by Lafcadio Hearn; 'Dante,' a sketch of the poet's life and works, by May Alden Ward; 'Cathedral Days: a Tour through Southern England,' by Anna Bowman Dodd; 'Sonnets in Shadow,' by Arlo Bates; 'Between Whiles,' a volume of short stories by the late Helen Jackson; 'A Week away from Time'—on Cape Cod, namely, "by a number of Bostonians"; and 'A Short History of Philadelphia,' by Susan Coolidge.

Ticknor & Co. publish next week 'Forced Acquaintances,' a story by Edith Robinson; and 'The Life and Works of Giordano Bruno,' the new volume in the English and Foreign Philosophical Library.

A complete translation of Mme. Spyri's 'Kurze Geschichten' is promised by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

The Rand Avery Co., Boston, are to publish Mr. Joseph Cook's Monday Lectures for the season of 1887.

Index-making has delayed the appearance of Karl Kron's 'Ten Thousand Miles on a Bicycle,' so that April is the date now fixed upon. The author-publisher's address is Station D, New York.

For five years (1873–1878) the late lamented Prof. É. J. Belot, of the Lyons Faculty of Letters, author of the classic 'Histoire des chevaliers romains,' devoted himself in his lectures to the history of the United States. His intention was to make a work of them in several volumes, but nothing has yet seen the light except a study of the peculiar landholding in common established on the island of Nantucket (printed in the Lyons Annuaire for 1884). Since his death, however, by the gift of his children, his manuscripts have passed to the Faculty—among them his lectures on our country, "entièrement rédigés." These it is hoped to publish, as we learn from Prof. Bayet's very sympathetic and appreciative notice of his colleague in the Revue Internationale de l'Enseignement for January 15. M. Belot was an ardent advocate of the important movement which has resulted in founding the University of Lyons—the beginning of provincial independence upon the University of France.

To put the 'Nation in a Nutshell,' as Mr. Geo. M. Towle professes to do in "a rapid outline of American history" (Boston: Lee & Shepard), one must have more than a nutshell full of knowledge of his subject to begin with. We will test Mr. Towle's equipment by a single passage (p. 93): "It was early in General Jackson's Presidency that the small but determined 'Liberty party' of the North began to attract attention by what was considered the extravagance of its utterances and the absurdities of its proposals. The Quaker Lundy published his Genius of Universal Emancipation; Garrison put forth the Liberator," etc.

Mr. Towle is not alone in this confusion of dates, names, and circumstances. Here is Mr. Ben. Perley Poore, in his 'Reminiscences' (Philadelphia: Hubbard Bros.), recording that—"It was during the Administration of Mr. Van Buren that the English abolitionists first began to propagate their doctrines in the Northern States, where the nucleus of an anti-slavery party was soon formed" (vol. i, p. 210). In this statement there is not a word of truth. There is positive chronological inaccuracy and a false implication of cause and consequence in this extract from the late Hugh J. Hastings's 'Ancient American Politics' (Harpers), page 120: "It was during the Administration of President Jackson that England (1834) passed her first act emancipating the slaves of her West India possessions. The abolition of slavery by England was a great event, and had immense power upon the minds of Americans. The subject of emancipation in many of the free States was opened with energy and activity. Abolition societies were formed," etc.

The pleasant announcement comes across the Atlantic that Mr. Robert W. Lowe's theatrical bibliography is at last in press, and that Mr. Lowe is also at work on an edition of Dr. Doran's 'Their Majesties' Servants,' one of the best books about the stage ever written. Mr. Lowe will add notes, and his publishers will add many illustrations. Among the other books of theatrical interest soon to appear are Mr. James Anderson's 'Seven Decades of an Actor's Life,' and 'Yesterdays with Actors,' by Mrs. Winslow, formerly Miss Kate Reynolds. The latter will be published by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston.

The latest volume of the "Book-Lover's Library" is Mr. H. Trueman Wood's 'Modern Methods of Illustrating Books,' a most interesting subject, already ably treated by M. A. de Lostalot in the volume on 'Les Procédés de la Gravure,' in the "Bibliothèque de l'Enseignement des Beaux-Arts." Mr. Wood's book suffers by comparison with M. de Lostalot's because the English writer has a verbose and lumbering style, an insularity of taste not uncommon among English art critics, and a limited appreciation of what is really good in engraving; but its chief defect is the absence of illustrations, which are an absolute necessity in any discussion of such a subject. M. de Lostalot gave examples of almost every kind of engraving, and Mr. Wood gives none at all. Although the latter rebukes English publishers for their lack of enterprise, he seems to be quite unaware of the great inferiority of English processes of mechanical engraving to the French or the American. The value of Mr. Wood's little book lies in his elaborate statement of the principles of the various mechanical processes.

Of all the cheap "libraries," quite the cheapest is the "Nouvelle Bibliothèque Populaire," just started in France (Paris: Henri Gautier; New York: F. W. Christern), of which the successive volumes are to cost ten centimes (two cents) each. The volumes are thirty-two pages long, and each is to contain a complete work. Among the volumes already published are Hoffmann's tales, 'Hamlet,' Chateaubriand's 'Dernier des Abencérages,' the speeches and proclamations of Napoleon I., the letters of Louis XIV., Goethe's 'Hermann and Dorothea.' Among the volumes published or promised are four translations from American authors—'Histoires Mystérieuses,' by Edgar Poe; Longfellow's 'Evangeline'; 'Récits californiens,' by Bret Harte; and 'L'Héritage du More,' by Washington Irving.

G. P. Putnam's Sons have for sale a variety of little paper books bound with silken thread, constituting a "Japanese Fairy Tale Series." Their place of publication is Tokio, but they are made available for the Anglo-Saxon nursery by idiomatic translations—No. 8, for example, "Urashima," having been turned into English by B. H. Chamberlain. They are uniform in respect of size and in being copiously illustrated, from cover to cover. The stories vary in character from a pointless narrative like "The Mouse's Wedding," to the miraculous legend of "The Old Man Who Made the Dead Trees Blossom," or to Rip Van Winkle in the garb of "The Fisher-Boy Urashima," or to the variant of Mercury and the Woodchopper (or, in the fairy tale, of Toads and Diamonds), called here "The Old Man and the Devils," and again "The Tongue-Cut Sparrow." The art of these little books is not the highest of the Mikado's kingdom, but it is thoroughly characteristic, and clever to an extent which will strike even the youngsters who read these simple tales. One that we have not mentioned, a "Brer Rabbit" story, is rather cruel in its meting out of poetic justice; and to one or two others similar objection might be made. But the humor often covers up the barbarity.

In the Harvard University Bulletin for January are to be found a continuation of the catalogue of the Dante collection, by Wm. Coolidge Lane; a new (supplementary) index of reference lists and special bibliographies included in periodical and other publications of recent date, by the same assistant; a calendar of the Sparks MSS. in the college library, by Justin Winsor; and notes on this library's subject-catalogue.

A question now agitating literary circles in England is whether or not the practice of lending books and manuscripts from the Bodleian Library should be continued. The London Times of January 25, calls attention to a recent pamphlet on the subject by Prof. H. W. Chandler, one of the curators of the library. The original statute of the founder, Sir Thomas Bodley, expressly and peremptorily forbade the loan of any books deposited in the library on any condition whatever. For a time this was observed so rigidly that Laud was refused a manuscript which he had himself given, and both Charles I. and Cromwell were unsuccessful applicants for the loan of books. Of late years, however, an exceedingly lax practice has crept in, and now valuable books and manuscripts are sent freely to all parts of England and the Continent. There is even what is known as the "borrowers' list," on which are the names of 111 persons, including two ladies. This, the Times contends, is contrary not only to the spirit, but to the letter of even the somewhat modified statutes. It insists that the Bodleian had become the depository of valuable collections mainly because of its supposed inviolability as a reference library, and that Cambridge, which has made the University library a lending library, has suffered in consequence. It closes with a vigorous appeal to Convocation to put a speedy end to a practice "which is contrary to the true interests of letters and of study."

It is announced that the manuscript of Shelley's "Mask of Anarchy," of which we mentioned the late discovery, is immediately to be reproduced for the Shelley Society's Extra Series, and will be ready at once. In connection with it Mr. Forman has pointed out that the sketch which Mrs. Shelley mentions in her accompanying letter as drawn after her husband, is the character of Adrian, Earl of Windsor, in her novel 'The Last Man.' The identity of Adrian with Shelley has been before suspected, but the authority for it is now so direct that Shelley students will be obliged to pay special attention to this book, which it would seem contains Lord Byron and Mrs. Shelley also. Dowden has shown how closely in other novels Mrs. Shelley drew from her own experience.

Much curious information about the Sandwich Islands is conveyed in the Hawaiian Almanac and Annual for 1887 (Honolulu: Thomas G. Thrum). The first paper is on the land shells of the archipelago, so much prized—their distribution, probable variety, enemies (rats and mice in particular), etc. In another, the gradly renewed activity of Kilauea is described. A third treats of Portuguese immigration to the islands and its desirability, though the Government favor is extended to the Japanese. Of the former it is estimated there are at least 12,000, of the latter 2,000, and of the Chinese more than 20,000, and an effort is making to introduce more laborers from the South Sea Islands. It is obvious that some extraordinary race mixtures will ere long diversify the population. The Orientals have, for their own consumption, diminished the exports of rice. The Government has licensed the sale and use of opium, despite all opposition.

The contents of the January number of the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography have a very even and solid excellence, with here an itinerary and there a biographical sketch, copies from letter books, etc., etc. Mr. A. D. Mellick, jr., concludes his useful summary view of German emigration to the American colonies, and Dr. R. P. Robins returns (perhaps a little less confidently than before) to his thesis of the identity of the Thomas Whaley of Bacon's rebellion in Virginia with Theophilus Whale of Narragansett, and Edward Whalley, the regicide. His paper throws a little more light on the Virginia Whalev.

The January number of Les Lettres et les Arts (Paris: Boussod, Valadon et Cie.; New York: Scribners) opens with an article by M. Jules Simon, "Un Crime," which has the simplicity and the charm of a personal experience, and the literary perfection of a work of art. Whether it is read as fact or fiction, however, it is certainly a lesson in the highest literary morality, a lesson which there never was greater need than at the present time of impressing upon all, readers as well as writers. A fine and expressive portrait of M. Jules Simon is at the beginning of the article, in which, to be sure, we see rather the Minister and Deputy fallen from public favor than the gentler philosopher and moralist who has succeeded him. Among the more interesting of the other papers is one by M. Antony Valabrègue, "Les Femmes artistes du XIXe siècle—Mme. Haudebourt-Lescot," which accompanies the frontispiece of the number, the portrait by Ingres of the artist while she was still Mlle. Lescot; and another by M. Henri Bouchot, "Marie Antoinette et ses peintres," which is illustrated by a number of the famous pictures of the Queen, concluding with the sketch by David made as she passed in the tumbril, with her hands tied behind her, on her way to the guillotine.

A Turin correspondent of L'Art (January 15) remarks on the enviable good fortune of the Italian sculptors in respect to the steady demand upon them for funereal monuments. That their French brethren have not the same felicity arises, we presume, from the different spirit in which cemeteries are regarded and cared for in the two countries. This contrast is pointed out in connection with a notice of Angelo Cugliérero, a sculptor of Turin, who has executed many important works, but, says M. Willems, none more striking than the monument to the son of Count Arnaud di San Salvatore, of which a very attractive drawing is given in this number of L'Art.

Some months ago the Illustrazione Italiana of Milan gave a double-page engraving of a remarkable painting by Domenico Morelli, "The Twelve Apostles," representing the preaching of the evangel on the shores of Galilee. Anything more unlike the conventional treatment of this scene by the old masters it would be impossible to find. Morelli's realism gave us twelve Orientals, in the garb of the East, squatting about the Teacher in the dry grass which half concealed them. Another canvas, by the same Neapolitan artist, is engraved in the Illustrazione for January 23, 1887, and is called "The Magdalen." Jesus stands in the doorway of a synagogue, preaching to a group just without. Mary stands, with uncovered face, a little apart, with her sister Martha, turning towards the spoken word as if arrested by it. This picture doubtless suffers in effectiveness by the reduction.

Petermann's Mitteilungen for January contains an article, by Prof. Th. Fischer, on the changes in portions of the coasts of Tunis and Algiers. This is followed by a notice of an accompanying elaborate map of German Austria, showing the distribution of languages in it according to the returns of the census of 1880. It reveals the fact that the German language has made comparatively little progress in the districts where other tongues are spoken. Bohemia and Moravia are completely surrounded by a narrow strip in which German only is used, and there is a large German "Sprachinsel" on the borders of Croatia, and another smaller one in the heart of the Italian Alps, not far from Trient. Of course the educated and the commercial classes in all these countries use the German, but their native tongue still holds its own with the common people.

The Belgian Company for developing the resources of the Congo have just organized two expeditions, the one of engineers for the survey of a route for a railway to Leopoldville, the other of agriculturists, geologists, and traders' agents to explore the river and its tributaries above Stanley Pool.

Now and then we hear sad stories of the accumulation of cases before the Supreme Court of the United States. Let our judges follow the example of the seven Chambers of the Court of Appeal at Paris, which cleared off their docket last December, pronouncing on the 13th of that month 330 divorces!

MM. Lucien Perey and Gaston Maugras, whose 'Vie intime de Voltaire aux Délices et à Ferney' has recently been reviewed at length in the Nation, had published previously two volumes upon the Abbé Galiani and two upon Mme. d'Épinay, all drawn from letters and documents of the periods from which the editors quote liberally. After publishing these five volumes, the two members of this literary partnership seem to have entered upon a new phase of their very successful career. In May last M. Gaston Maugras published a volume, signed with his own name only, 'Voltaire et J.-J. Rousseau,' with a general title, as it would seem to a series, "Querelles de Philosophes" (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof). In October another volume from the same publishers appeared: 'Trois mois à la cour de Frédéric: Lettres inédites de D'Alembert, annotées par Gaston Maugras,'

M. Lucien Perey has now published, in his turn, a new volume upon the eighteenth century, which promises to be even more interesting than those upon the same period which have preceded it, written in collaboration with M. Gaston Maugras. It is entitled 'Histoire d'une grande dame aux dix-huitième siècle: La princesse Hélène de Ligne' (Paris: Calmann Lévy). The princess was the wife of that Prince de Ligne whose delightful letters to the Marquise de Coigny, written when he was fifty, just one hundred years ago, have been extracted from his voluminous correspondence, and published in a charming little volume by M. de Lescure (Boston: Schoenhof), noticed at length in the Nation of January 20.

M. Alidor Delzaut devotes a whole volume to the biography of Paul de Saint-Victor (Paris: Calmann Levy; Boston: Schoenhof). In the course of his narrative he meets many of the most important literary celebrities of the generation that is just passing away. Théophile Gautier, Barbey d'Aurevilly, Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, and especially Victor Hugo were in frequent contact with the brilliant critic. The numerous letters addressed to him, many of which are here published for the first time, make of this biography a valuable contribution to the literary history of the middle of the century. The various works of Paul de Saint-Victor are all analyzed with frequent quotations. The volume closes with a chapter on the posthumous publications—volumes 2 and 3 of 'Les Deux Masques,' 'Victor Hugo,' 'Anciens et Modernes.'

The London Hachette firm, of which Carl Schoenhof, Boston, is the American agent, continue very actively the publication of their series of annotated modern French authors. Among the latest are 'Le Chien du capitaine,' a pretty little story by Louis Énault, edited with notes by M. Henri Bué; 'Jeanne d'Arc,' by Lamartine, annotated by M. V. Oger: and "François 1er," by M. Jules Zeller, with notes by M. Petilleau. The last especially is a valuable addition to the series, which now, in addition to the same author's biographies of Richelieu, Henry IV., and Marie de Médicis, contains a great number of valuable historical works as well as excellent works of fiction. Two late additions in this direction are About's 'Le Roi des Montagnes' and André Theuriet's 'Les Enchantements de la forêt.' Unlike the preceding school publications of the same firm, Theuriet's charming volume is presented in its French form, making a fine octavo volume with numerous illustrations, to which are added thirty pages of English notes by M. H. Lallemand.

—In England, as well as in America, the need seems to be felt of some simple elementary instruction for school children in the principles of the government and the laws of society under which they live, and we have received three little books prepared for this purpose. 'The Citizen Reader,' by H. O. Arnold-Forster (Cassell), is, as its name indicates, designed for a school reader; for which purpose it is admirably fitted by reason of its simplicity and clearness of style and the attractive way in which the subject is presented. We should say that it could be read with interest and profit by children of twelve. There are a number of woodcuts, most of them representing real persons and objects; and the subject is constantly illustrated by a number of anecdotes—among which we are surprised to find that of Henry V. and Judge Gascoigne, which we supposed to be universally conceded to be apocryphal. A short preface is supplied by the late Hon. W. E. Forster, father of the author. The second book on our list is 'Our National Institutions,' by Anna Buckland (Macmillan). This is a text-book adapted to older pupils, more formal in style and arrangement than Mr. Forster's, but, like that, made more interesting and graphic by illustrative matter. It is an excellent short sketch of the actual workings of the British Government, touching lightly upon the early history, but showing with great fulness the important changes in all departments in the last fifty years. 'Elementary Politics,' by Thomas Raleigh (London: Frowde), is of an older grade still, being in the main a history of society and analysis of the principles of government, adapted to the comprehension, we should say, of the oldest classes in our high schools. The discussion is exceedingly good, and presents the subject with great clearness and sufficient fulness. It lacks, however, the illustrative matter which characterizes the other two books. The description of primitive society, for instance, would be far more intelligible to young people if actual illustrations of the different phases had been taken from the Australians, the Arabs, the Zunis, or any other now-existing peoples. All three of the books possess high merit; and, crowded though our school courses are, we must regard this effort to add to them the treatment of the principles of government and public economy as an excellent sign of the times.

—The Missourians owe more thanks than, as we fear, they will pay to the oldest inhabitant of St. Louis, Fred L. Billon, for his just-published 'Early Annals' of that city. Their Historical Society has little more than a name to live, and few of the natives know the scantiness of the sources from which Mr. Billon was forced to compile his 500 pages. The Spanish officers when they yielded the country to the United States carried off with them all the Government archives to Cuba, as they did the bones of Columbus when they gave up San Domingo. Whether these documents remain in that island or were transferred to old Spain, will not perhaps be ascertained till Missouri, following the example of New York, shall send abroad a man like Brodhead to investigate its documentary history. But Mr. Billon has done what he could, partly by gleanings from those who were among the oldest inhabitants when he was himself among the youngest. His material was, however, more largely derived from the account-books and inventories of early traders, or an occasional letter or church record. First occupied in 1764 by Laclède as a trading-post, St. Louis was for some years called "Laclède's Village." It grew with unexpected rapidity, so that in 1770 its houses were already 115. The settlers were religious and political refugees as really as the Puritans in Massachusetts. When the peace of 1763 gave the English the left bank of the Mississippi, the French settled there made haste to remove to the other bank of that river, beyond the reach of conquering heretics. The name St. Louis, already given to La Salle's rock castle on the Illinois, they seem to have transferred to their new home. It was a vexation to them when, in 1770, the Spaniards took possession of the trans-Missouri region, which had long before been ceded to them in a secret treaty. During thirty-four years of Spanish rule the increase in houses was only sixty-six. Yet the Spanish Governors were not tyrannical. They called popular assemblies—a sort of town meetings—where political questions "were decided by the majority." Church matters were managed in the same democratic way. On the very day of the Concord fight in 1775 the seventy-eight householders met and signed the contract for building a church, about thirty with their names and the rest with marks. The only schoolmaster mentioned in Spanish days came from Canada as early as 1774. No school-house is mentioned. His teaching was in the church or in his own house. Up to 1780 no books but pocket-books are mentioned. At that time "several books of history, sold for 13½ Livres," formed one item in an auction sale. Such sales were held at the church after Sunday service, and often included slaves. The common currency was skins, as of deer and beaver. When the Virginians conquered Illinois in 1778 some Missourians furnished them supplies, accepting in payment orders on the treasurer of Virginia. Gratiot, who held some of these orders, in 1783 forced his way on horseback—first of all known travellers overland—to Richmond, and demanded payment. He was offered about 12 per cent. or certain wild Western lands when they should be surveyed. His journey consumed more than a year, but he collected nothing. His experience ought to have been known to modern creditors of Virginia before they bought her bonds. But Billon's book must be read by him who would understand a unique phase of our dawning history.

—The 'Official History of the Great Strike of 1886 on the Southwestern Railway System' has been compiled by Mr. O. Kochtitsky, the Missouri Commissioner of Labor Statistics (Jefferson City, Mo., 1886). In it are printed in full all the letters, agreements, memoranda, appeals to the public, proclamations to the workingmen of the world, manifestoes to Jay Gould, "secret" circulars and "official" statements of the Knights of Labor—all the extraordinary literature brought out by the strike. Those who are interested in the curiosities of rhetoric will be rewarded by a perusal of the pamphlet. We quote this gem from a proclamation of District Assemblies 101, 93, and 17: "Gould, the giant fiend; Gould, the money monarch, is dancing, as he claims, over the grave of our order, over the ruin of our homes and the blight of our lives. Before him the world has smiled in beauty, but his wake is a graveyard of hopes, a cyclone's path of devastation and death"! Those who are following the history of our labor agitations will have a more serious interest in Mr. Kochtitsky's compilation, and will find it an excellent supplement to the account of the strike which appeared in the recent issue of the Quarterly Journal of Economics. The narrative which connects the documentary matter does not add much to our knowledge of the true course of events; but we notice one new point, and that an interesting one. It seems that, during the height of the strike, the Governors of Missouri and Kansas had a conference at Kansas City, and, at the request of the Knights, met Irons and the other committeemen who were managing the strike. The Knights, by the way, afterwards said that the Governors had interposed of their own accord, and had sought the interview; but this was a pure fabrication. Powderly was in Kansas City at the time, and took part in the meeting. The upshot of it was, that the Governors refused to approach the railroad officers at all on behalf of the strikers, unless the committee put the matter entirely in their hands and agreed to abide by any settlement they might arrange. The Knights finally acceded to this. The Governors then wrote their open letter to Mr. Hoxie, asking him to take back the old men—which Mr. Hoxie, it will be remembered, agreed to do, so far as their places had not been filled by new men. But, behold! the Knights now came out with a flaming statement to the public, repudiating the action of the Governors, alleging that they had interposed of their own motion, and insisting that the Knights "refused them the privilege of adjusting our differences," and would have nothing to do with their terms and settlements. So the strike went on, and the Governors gave up attempts at mediation. The episode is an illustration, not only of the extraordinary folly and mendacity of the leaders in the Southwestern strike, but of the insuperable difficulties in the way of settling by public "arbitration" the demands of an ignorant and irresponsible body of laborers.

—At one of the recent meetings of the "Groupe de Paris," whose proceedings are regularly chronicled by La Réforme Sociale, M. de Boucherville from Mauritius gave an interesting account of the peculiar social conditions prevailing in that island. Colonized originally by Frenchmen, Mauritius, though since 1810 in the possession of England, has retained the impress of France in its language, religion, and civilization. The French population, moreover, is still the leading one socially, fills the professions and the higher branches of commerce, and holds most of the public offices. The English, though highly important, in spite of their small numbers in both official and financial circles, form a society apart, and live only temporarily in the colony. Besides these ruling classes of French and English, there are great numbers of Africans and Asiatics. The negroes, brought to the island in the days of the slave-trade, refused after their emancipation to perform any longer the field-work to which the stigma of slavery had been so long attached, and preferred to become mechanics. The half-breed population, arising from the mixture of the French and African races, has made a place for itself in the trades and even the professions, and forms the most important part of the middle class. As the work refused by the negroes had to be done by some one, coolies were imported from India, who, after their term of engagement was up, would remain as free laborers, and in turn proprietors, so that they now form numerically the principal part of the population, and hold a large portion of the landed property of the islands. The coolies were followed by Indians of higher standing, chiefly Arab merchants from Bombay, and the rice and sugar trade between Mauritius and India has fallen entirely into their hands. Finally, there are the Chinese, who are wholly engaged in trade, and who live in associations, under tribunals of their own. Not only are there these six grand divisions named, but not one of them is homogeneous, and among both Asiatics and Europeans there are different languages, manners, and religions. Under the influence, however, of French civilization and English energy and capital, out of this heterogeneous mass a Mauritian people is gradually being formed.

—M. de Boucherville gave his opinion as to the best mode of reviving the failing prosperity of the sugar industry, on which the whole island depends. He believes that the present unfortunate condition of things has arisen from too much centralization in the agricultural department of the industry, and too little in the mechanical. He would have the cane grown on small plantations by proprietors, who will give to the cultivation more interest and labor than can be expected of hired overseers; and the great capital which is now employed in absorbing the plantations he would have devoted to the perfection, with all the modern improvements, of large sugar factories, which should serve as central depots for all the small growers around. The only other remedy he can suggest is that of emigration to the shores of Madagascar, where the same conditions of soil and climate prevail as in Mauritius. The chief difficulties in the way of this scheme lie in the barbaric condition of the country, where not only is the land held by the crown, so that it cannot be bought, or even leased, without great difficulty, but the laborers one has engaged may at any time be summarily called off by the Queen of the Hovas on service of her own. Since the war between the Hovas and the French, however, the right to give and take long leases has been established, and M. de Boucherville is anxious that France should extend to emigrants from her former colony the same protection and advantages which she gives to her own subjects sojourning in Madagascar. M. Poitou-Duplessy, who followed him, expressed his surprise that the coolies should so willingly have settled down and become an integral part of the Mauritian population, while in the French sugar-raising colonies of the Antilles and Réunion the complaint has always been that, their term of service expired, they returned home with the money they had made, and, according to an agreement with the English masters of India, at the expense of the colony which had hired them. To this M. de Boucherville replied that this difference was due to the different laws prevailing in the English and French colonies. In the Antilles the coolie, having finished his term of service, is free either to go back or to enter another engagement; but in Mauritius he is free of all engagements, and may become a citizen of the country on the same footing as any other man. The more just and liberal colony thus profits by its better laws.

DOWDEN'S SHELLEY.

The Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley. By Edward Dowden, LL.D. 2 vols. London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.; Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. 1887.

BESIDES the many volumes of biography and reminiscence that have been put forth by Shelley's friends and acquaintances, there has been gathered in the last twenty-five years a large amount of minor information to serve as materials for his life; and it was quite time that this great work of Dr. Dowden's should be written, to gather these various narratives, memoirs, and essays into one, to test their validity, and to establish a full, connected, and final story. He has condensed the old Shelley papers by Hogg, Peacock, Trelawney, Medwin, Hunt, Lady Shelley, Stockdale, and other lesser writers, the correspondence and diaries of Godwin, and the modern investigations by Garnett, Rossetti, Forman, and Shelley students of less note; and he has amplified the biography constructed from these sources by manuscript papers of the Shelley family and others, which have been put into his hands with a generosity and freedom of an extraordinary kind. Shelley's and Mary's diary, Miss Clairmont's diary, the Shelley correspondence, uncollected letters, and the family papers of Shelley's acquaintances, make the largest part of what is wholly new. The work is necessarily henceforth the authority for the facts of Shelley's career. It is in a strict sense a biography. It deals with the events of his life, and touches only incidentally and briefly his works and genius, his contemporaries, and the history of his times. Shelley, the man—not the poet—is its subject. It is a full investigation.

But the main course and leading incidents of Shelley's career were already in print; his temperament, opinions, and ruling motives were known; and to the student of Shelley the volumes bring further illustration of his nature, ampler information of his affairs, rather than any new enlightenment in respect to his character. To the public their great value consists in massing all that is known in a single and convenient work, and in authenticating the narrative that is given. Some additions to our knowledge, however, there are, and these are not trivial. The most important of these relate to Shelley's first marriage. The contents of the chapters dealing with this affair have been long looked for, but the substance of them has been anticipated. It was said by the Shelley family through Mr. Garnett, in his reply to Peacock twenty-five years ago, that when the papers in their possession should be published, Shelley would be acquitted of blame; and those who believed in Shelley have been contented to take this assurance in place of the documents until these should be forthcoming. It may be presumed that Dr. Dowden has now told all that it is meant to tell; and as the point is of capital consequence to Shelley's moral reputation, and is the most considerable one raised by these volumes, we shall review the subject in detail.

Shelley became acquainted with Harriet Westbrook about New Year's, 1811, as a schoolmate of his sister's. In March he was expelled from Oxford; in May he was permitted to return to his home; and by July he was visiting in Wales. At this period he was an ardent proselytizer, and he had begun a correspondence with Harriet with a view to making a convert of her; but in August he found that his polemics had got him into a love affair, and he went to London to determine what should be done. It is perfectly plain that he was not in love and had no thought of it, until Harriet confessed her attachment, and that she, a girl of seventeen, sought him with the privity of her sister, a woman of thirty, who was in complete control of her. He was a solitary, dispirited, and wilful youth, just nineteen, whose first love-match had been broken off the previous Christmas, himself expelled from college, and his family alienated soon after, all because of his opinions in religion. Harriet seemed to him ill, dejected, and in trouble, and he believed that friendship for him had been the source of her difficulties and that love for him was the cause of her bad health; but he doubted whether the sympathy aroused in him was true affection, and his decision to take the final step was hastened by fresh urgency upon her part. He had adopted from radical sources the theoretic view against the marriage bond; but he acted with a practical mind, and was wedded to her in Edinburgh, on the 28th of August. In October they were settled in York, the residence of Shelley's friend Hogg, who had joined them in Edinburgh; and after a brief time Shelley left his wife in Hogg's care, while he went south to endeavor to make some arrangement with his father, who had cut off his allowance. His stay was short, and on his return to York he found that Hogg had attempted to seduce his wife. The evidence of this is Shelley's account written at the time in successive letters to Miss Hitchener. He had the story from Harriet, and sought an explanation from Hogg in an interview of which he gives an account. He left York at once, with his wife and her sister Eliza, who had joined them, for the Lakes.

If any one is disposed not to accept Shelley as a witness to matters of fact, and hence to set aside the charge, he must meet the series of letters, which, however much they may have been tampered with, have a real basis, written to Hogg from the Lakes and published by him. These yield no meaning except on the theory that Shelley had been greatly shocked, and when to them is added the piece, published by Hogg with changed names as a fragment of a novel by Shelley, but really, as Rossetti pointed out some time ago, a letter, the difficulty of rejecting Shelley's independent, explicit, and contemporary charge becomes insuperable. Not only is the peculiar character of these last letters to Hogg thus explained, but also the cessation of correspondence with him, and those changed conditions of intercourse between them when they met in London which, by depriving Hogg of Shelley's confidence and intimacy, seriously impair the value of that writer's 'Life of Shelley' for the period after this incident. Shelley forgave the offender, and, while he stated plainly that he had fallen in his esteem, his friendship for him, he said, had not lessened, but rather grown. It was a complex mood; but if one sees in Shelley's words now and his subsequent reception of Hogg in London only a defect of honor, and a weakness of moral feeling, he misapprehends him. It cannot be questioned that Shelley received a severe blow in this experience of Hogg's infidelity. He had idealized him, and had taken him for a bosom friend. He seems never after to have put his trust in any man.

Shelley and Harriet, with Eliza her sister, flitted about between Wales, Ireland, and Devon, engaged in study, political agitation, composition, and philanthropy in many forms, and a true affection grew up on Shelley's part for his wife. In 1813 they settled in London, and in June their first child, Ianthe, was born. Shelley's first expression of doubt as to his married happiness occurs, in a faint form, in a sonnet to Harriet, dated July 31. Within less than a year he regarded that happiness as altogether wrecked, and, in consonance with his convictions in respect to marriage, he united himself with Mary Godwin. In his declaration in Chancery he assigned a reason for separating from Harriet in these words: "Delicacy forbids me to say more than that we were disunited by incurable dissensions." What was the general character of these dissensions is sufficiently plain. We learn from Hogg, who reports his own impressions, that after the birth of Ianthe the intellectual union between Harriet and Shelley ceased, their readings together and Harriet's studies coming to an end; and we learn from Peacock that her refusal to nurse the babe was the source of great dissatisfaction to Shelley, and in general domestic matters tried him. New feminine tastes seem to have replaced the old ones; in the earlier part of the year Shelley had obtained a carriage and made a considerable purchase of plate, though he could not afford it; and Hogg's burlesque of Harriet's interest in millinery will be remembered. One recalls, too, that Fanny Godwin had already written of her to Shelley as "a fine lady" some months before, though he repelled the charge. Furthermore, on August 4 of this year, Shelley reached his majority, and expected to make better arrangements with his father in regard to money, as he could now raise funds on post-obits, and would be obliged to do so, as his debts were a constant anxiety to him. It would seem from all that can be learned that Harriet was amiable but weak, completely under the direction of her elder sister, Eliza, who ruled the house; and that she had tired of the intellectual enthusiasm, the fruitless Quixotism, and the lack of funds which had been the main features of the two past years. She desired the substantial benefits of a genteel and wealthy marriage. Harriet's inferiority of mind was made the more evident by Shelley's association at this time with the Boinvilles, who, with all their sentimentality, had cultivated tastes; Eliza's dictation in his own household was brought sharply home to him by the episode of the child's nursing; and he must have begun to see that his own yielding temper in his home was not understood, but used to induce further neglect.

To return to the narrative of events, Shelley took the family to Edinburgh in the fall, and wrote saying that he would return alone. He did come back in December, but with his companions, and took a house near the Boinvilles. In March he wrote a letter from which it appears that he was staying with the Boinvilles by himself, and had been for a month; a few days later, Harriet joined him, and they were remarried on March 24, a ceremony which seems to have been gone through with in connection with certain Chancery proceedings, and to have had only a business meaning. In April he was again alone, and there is no trace that Harriet ever lived with him thereafter. He had written with affection of her in a sonnet to Ianthe in the previous September, and now in May he addressed stanzas to her, imploring her to be reconciled with him, and expressing his love for her. He was evidently very wretched during this whole spring, and he refers in his letters to his domestic troubles. Of Eliza he wrote, "I certainly hate her with all my heart and soul"; and Peacock reports words to the same effect. The various causes of his unhappiness had now had full play, and affairs had come to a head; Eliza and Harriet were apparently trying in some way to subdue him to their will, and his wife had lived apart from him, except for the time when she joined him for the purpose of remarriage, since the middle of February. Thornton Hunt said that Harriet left Shelley of her own free will, and this statement may be referred to this time; but she did not leave him with the idea of such a separation as finally occurred.

The affair was now to take a dangerous turn, on which Eliza and Harriet had not counted. At the end of May or the beginning of June, Shelley first met Mary Godwin, then seventeen years old; in the course of the month he addressed to her some stanzas which contain the story of their quick and passionate sympathy and acknowledge their love. On July 7, Harriet, taking alarm at an interruption of four days in Shelley's letters to her, wrote to a common friend a note which exhibits her anxiety lest he had become ill or done some desperate action, and later in the same month Mary wrote in her copy of 'Queen Mab' a confession of her love for Shelley and a statement that they were kept apart. On July 14 Shelley had an interview with Harriet, and told her that all was over between them. She was shocked by the disclosure of the state of affairs; but Shelley directed a settlement to be made in her behalf by his lawyers, and on the 28th of the month he crossed the Channel with Mary.

This is the story of the "incurable dissensions" and their issue. They were no figment of Shelley's mind. Was there anything more? Miss Clairmont says it was not merely by the story of his troubles that Shelley prevailed on Mary to unite with him; but he added the definite accusation that she had been unfaithful to his bed, and that the child she was about to bear was none of his. Miss Clairmont is very dubious authority. She says Mary told her of this; if so, she told no one else. But whether Shelley actually urged this in his suit, or not, there is evidence independent of Miss Clairmont's assertion to the fact of his belief in his wife's infidelity. Six years after these events he wrote to Southey, in 1820: "You select a single passage out of a life otherwise not only spotless, but spent in an impassioned pursuit of virtue, which looks like a blot merely because I regulated my domestic arrangements without deferring to the notions of the vulgar, although I might have done so quite as conveniently had I descended to their base thoughts." This means he had grounds for divorce. Godwin is reported by Shelley in January, 1817, as saying that "he has evidence that Harriet was unfaithful to me four months before I left England"; and on May 12, 1817, Godwin wrote to Baxter as follows: "The late Mrs. Shelley has turned out to have been a woman of great levity. I know from unquestionable authority, wholly unconnected with Shelley, that she had proved herself unfaithful to her husband before her separation." After her separation there is no doubt, says Dr. Dowden, that Harriet "wandered from the ways of upright living," and the words bear only one meaning. As to her conduct before that time, neither her guilt nor her innocence is proved. Shelley believed her guilty, and the fact that Peacock and the rest of his London circle, who had no special opportunity to observe her, had heard nothing of it, shows rather Shelley's reticence than anything else. Whether Shelley's conviction dates from before the separation, however, is a matter of inference, except for Miss Clairmont's assertion. But in this instance the facts taken together give probability to her statement.

Shelley, when he went away, did not, in the ordinary sense, desert Harriet. He provided for her credit at his banker's, and she drew out all the money. He wrote to her during his short journey to the Continent, and when he came back he kept up his direct acquaintance and correspondence with her. When she bore him a son, in November, he owned the child; if he ever had doubts of its paternity, he withdrew them. He left the children in her care, as he declared in Chancery, upon her urgent entreaty, but with no idea of yielding his right over them except in their early years; and when his father at last came to terms, he gave her money to pay her debts, and set apart to her credit £200 a year, a fifth part of his allowance. On his return from his second visit to the Continent he lost sight of her, and was seeking her out when she was found drowned. She had, unknown to Shelley, parted from her two children, who were in a stranger's care, and, when she came to visit her father, who was ill, she had been refused admittance by that sister who had been her director in her life with Shelley. She was not in any sense destitute, as she enjoyed her allowance from Shelley's banker, and in the previous May at least had an equal amount from her father, and had, besides, the power to raise money on her settlement, as Whitton, the lawyer, had pointed out to her. From the time she comes before us suicide was a favorite topic with her, and in the end she resorted to it; but the special circumstances leading to her death have not been discovered. Shelley was, of course, affected by this tragic close of his imprudent marriage; but evidently not so much as by Fanny Godwin's suicide, a short time before. He never altered his judgment of Harriet's character, as he had formed it in those last months of their life together; in a cancelled passage of 'The Revolt of Islam' he still says that she had a "heart of stone." He immediately married Mary, and took steps for the recovery of his children from the Westbrooks, who sought to retain them, apparently in the belief that the guardianship would involve the custody of some of Shelley's fortune. As is well known, Lord Eldon refused Shelley the possession of them, but he accepted the family named by Shelley to take charge of them.

This is the story of the events in substance. Judgment upon Shelley will be rendered according as people weigh the evidence and estimate its relative elements. For the view that Shelley fell in love with Mary and consequently deserted his wife and children, whose misfortunes followed from his acts, there is no longer any ground whatever. His own wretchedness, and the dissensions and incompatibilities in his family, before he ever saw Mary, are too clear to allow any one to look on her as the cause; she was in fact his refuge. His nature was already suffering violent strain in his solitude, and the sweetness of Mary's sympathy for him turned at once to a true passion of love, such as he had never known. He felt justified, and said in that same letter to Southey, already quoted, in the most solemn language, and calling God to witness—"You accuse me wrongfully. I am innocent of ill either done or intended; the consequences you allude to flowed in no respect from me."

We have no space, nor is there any call for a new characterization of Shelley. He appears in this work as a man wholly solitary, and apart in nature from all whom he knew or met, and visited with misfortunes. There are new passages of great interest, and the whole story is lighted up by gleams of that quality in him which earned for him peculiarly the epithet "divine"; but nevertheless it is a prolonged narrative of an ill-starred life. Shelley was not altogether happy with Mary either; his love became largely a tender solicitude for her, and was faithful; but he did not find in her what he sought, and her own bitter self-reproaches were not all undeserved. One is not sorry when the day of his death comes, but rather feels it as the relief to Shelley which it was. There is no life in the whole history of letters which is so thoroughly known as Shelley's now is—none on which the light has so beat; it is, too, in great part, the life of a youth. At first it seems to need apology; but, with more intimate knowledge and closer scrutiny, the sense of that need passes away.

RECENT NOVELS.

In the Clouds. By Charles Egbert Craddock. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Teresa Itasca, and Other Stories. By Avery MacAlpine. London: Chatto & Windus; New York: Funk & Wagnalls.

The Silent Workman. A Story. By Clinton Ross. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Towards the Gulf. A Romance of Louisiana. Harper & Bros.

Count Xavier. By Henry Gréville. Boston: Ticknor & Co.

The Martyr of Golgotha. By Enrique Perez Escrich. From the Spanish by Adèle Josephine Godoy. William S. Gottsberger.

Frau Wilhelmine. (Der Familie Buchholz letzter Theil.) Berlin: Freund & Jechel; New York: B. Westermann & Co. 1886.

It is not probable that many who have followed the interesting fortunes of Alethea Sayles through the pages of the Atlantic will care to again give their time to her story. Miss Murfree has not yet broken away from the peculiar charms of the Tennessee mountains, nor abandoned the possibilities afforded for fiction by the isolated, narrow life of the mountaineers. 'In the Clouds' introduces the reader anew to the novel scenes which—to risk a paradox—Miss Murfree has made familiar to so many. But, after making due allowance for the value of her material, recognizing its freshness, its adaptability to new and unique combinations, it still remains true that the chief interest in her stories is a narrative interest. The reader's desire is to reach the end and "see how it comes out." In the present story this fact is very noticeable. One is often tempted to skip the mountain scenery and the explanations, so absorbing is the action. And then the surprises are so admirably planned that they really surprise even the habitual novel-reader. When, for instance, it turns out that Kinsard has not after all been shot by his crafty opponent, the reader is taken completely unawares. And so with the death of the lovable Mink, who makes one more example of the worthless but potentially noble hero. One has all along a faint suspicion that his homely career will end in tragedy, but the precise method of his taking off is unforeseen until the last moment. The poetic justice of the incident, however, is obscured by one's sympathy; for though Mink's mischievous pranks brought about all his troubles, including the final catastrophe of his death, yet one loses sight of justice in ruthfully contemplating the noble mission which carried him to his fate.

These bucolic people that serve Miss Murfree for characters are very odd, it is true, and are not without a certain picturesqueness. But it is their human elements, nevertheless, the traits that they have in common with men and women of all times and all places, which give them their true value. Their life is too harsh and narrow, their interests too few and petty, to awaken much more than a philosophical curiosity. And it is because the feeling that one has in reading the book is one of curiosity—both concerning the habits and surroundings of the characters and concerning the outcome of the story which the author has woven with their lives—that but few will care for a second reading. Miss Murfree's attitude towards these simple characters is acutely observant, conscientiously realistic, but not highly sympathetic or imaginative. On more than one occasion she has shown a predisposition to attach to some simple act of justice or moral fortitude a higher meaning than ethics would allow. It is not true that nature, even at her best, can outdo cultivation, and one will not find a Colonel Esmond or a Romola among the mountaineers of Tennessee.

The three short tales which Mr. MacAlpine has brought together in an elegant volume are cosmopolitan enough. The scene of one is laid in California, of another in France, and of the third on the shores of the North Sea. But cosmopolitanism is not enough to make one's stories worth the telling. These sketches seem seriously enough meant, yet lack definiteness, simplicity, and character. The writing is too fine for the matter, and the matter is too slight and colorless even for sketches.

Mr. Ross's tale of 'The Silent Workman' is another short story, though it has been given a volume to itself. It embodies in a somewhat strained and melodramatic form the old principle that sin brings its own punishment. The principle is true, however, in the manner in which Mr. Ross exemplifies it, for certain natures only. Hawthorne has drawn such natures, and has shown them suffering under the lash of conscience. But they must be natures of exceptionally fine fibre and sensitiveness, and essentially weak—if one accepts Balzac's theory of strength of character. Anything of this sort Mr. Ross has failed to bring out in the picture of Eb Randall, whose erratic actions after his half-hearted attempt at murder sometimes approach dangerously near the ludicrous. One fancies Balzac's terrible Vautrin, with his score or more of crimes behind him, sneering at the story of Eb Randall, and denying in his arrogant way that a crime which is not found out is ever punished.

'Towards the Gulf' is a weak novel of Southern life, which futilely tries to catch something of the romance and picturesque color that certain phases of life in Louisiana undoubtedly possess. The hero, who belongs to an old aristocratic family, marries a beautiful girl whom he believes to be of English descent, but who—as eventually transpires—has the taint of negro blood. The story, which ends tragically, is not a pleasant nor an elevating one, nor is it told with the dramatic power and insight which alone could make it of any lasting worth.

Ill luck seems to attend the steps of Henry Gréville. When she has something to say, her translator disguises her meaning in curious English and strange idioms, which might be more nearly rendered by the French word "idiotismes." When she has nothing to say, she is well represented, as in the case of her latest story, 'Count Xavier.' It is intended for a tale of Little-Russian life, but there is nothing distinctively Little-Russian, or even Russian, about it. The poverty-stricken young Count, who suddenly comes into possession of his uncle's great fortune, seems to be more of a Pole than anything else, and there is a general vagueness of outline which does not contribute to the effect of the very slight chain of facts which serves as the foundation for the sketch. One of the peasant girls of the Count's aunt falls in love with the young man during his frequent visits to his relative, while she is acting as his nurse after he has broken his leg. Nothing comes of it, but a certain amount of space has been filled, more or less successfully. The Count next falls a victim to the charms of his uncle's daughter, the child of the latter's nominal housekeeper, who strongly suggests the suspicion that she is not so much a study from life as a copy of Turgeneff's Assya. The girl and her mother flee, because a marriage seems impossible; the young man takes to his bed and comes near dying in the good old hackneyed way. Matters are finally arranged, on condition that he shall travel abroad for a period before the marriage takes place. He contrives to get himself recalled by his terrified aunt, before the expiration of the period, by a wonderful tale of his connection with Italian dynamite plots, which the reader suspects to be pure inventions. The wedding takes place, the love-lorn peasant maid before mentioned is appointed nurse to the first-born of the young couple, and the book ends with a statement that "these things happened long ago." One would like to inquire, How long ago? in view of the mention of dynamite. The author has given us several very pretty stories of Russian life, but though this volume also deserves that adjective in a mild way, it is not to be compared with most of her previous work. To put it plainly, it seems to have been written mechanically, with a good deal of effort, by a person who has exhausted her ideas on the subject and has only odds and ends left to work with. As a whole, it may be said that Henry Gréville's "Russian novels" bear about the same resemblance to the genuine article that water does to wine, and perhaps no one of her stories bears out this comparison more fully than the present one, unless an exception be made which will place 'Dosia's Daughter' in the same category.

"A Picture of Oriental Tradition" is the subtitle which the author gives to his historical novel of the time of Christ, called 'The Martyr of Golgotha.' It is a very uneven piece of work, and bears but too evident traces of the difficulty attendant upon the task of rounding out the Gospel narrative with the scraps of legend and Talmudic tradition which refer to the lives of every actor in the story of Christ's life. The two chief faults into which the author is constantly betrayed by the necessity of supplying the missing links of the story are abruptness, which he mistakes for force, and a peculiar fondness for unsavory details, wherever it is possible to introduce them. In connection with the abruptness, he takes the opportunity to do a vast amount of padding, by making a paragraph out of each abrupt phrase; and the manner in which he dwells on all that can be made to approach the theme of the modern realistic novel, greatly detracts from the grand and solemn impression which the simple narrative of Scripture produces. We see a great deal more of the subordinate characters, like the repentant thief, whose history is evolved in detail from his early youth, and of Mary Magdalen, than we do of the divine sufferer. In view of the way in which the rest is handled, the reader breathes a sigh of relief when he finds that the audacious author has not dared to reconstitute the childhood and manhood of Christ. It is impossible to refrain from comparing the picture of the times as here given with that offered in 'Ben Hur,' and the result is not in favor of the former. The visit of the three Wise Men to the infant Saviour is one of the pictures which occur in both books, and makes the comparison of method easy. From the dedication, we judge 'The Martyr of Golgotha' to have been originally written some twenty-five years ago.

The fourth "and last" series of the adventures of the Buchholz Family resembles the previous volumes, and is well worth reading by all who enjoy a book whose humor is, so to say, only incidentally revealed, but which, like perfume in a dress, exhales with every motion of the wearer. But perfumes are sometimes offensive, and, without being unduly sensitive, a person with a nose less robust than that of Bismarck might well find too strong the scent of some of the suggestions in these volumes. There is little that is "improper" in the allusions—nothing, indeed, to recall the typical French novel, in which vice is supposed to lose half its evil by losing all its grossness. On the contrary, references to vice are of the most distant kind, and are of such a nature as to imply that it is non-existent in the Landsberger-Strasse. But there is plenty of "grossness"—that is, allusions to accidents of life which persons of refinement ignore or keep in the background, and for the use of which, as material for exciting a smile, one would have to go back, in English literature, a hundred and fifty years. Hence the comparison of this book, sometimes made, with 'Cranford' is most misleading. The atmosphere of 'Cranford' is of the most delicate and fastidious refinement; the air of 'The Buchholz Family' is that breathed by people who are good-natured and well-meaning, but thoroughly coarse in grain. Frau Buchholz, in fact, in spite of her veneer of book-culture, belongs to the social level of Mr. Howells's 'Manda Greer. The laboring class, as represented in novels, however unfavorable thereto their life may be, possess a certain innate refinement, as does also the grisette of the pre-Zola era. It is only the middle middle class in Germany and England, and the lower middle in this country, who appear to be entirely destitute of it.

But whatever we may think of his characters, the art of their creator is undeniable. Many novelists overload their story with dull detail; a few enrich their pages with discursions so charming that the reader forgets the narrative. Mr. Stinde belongs to neither class; with him not a word is wasted—indeed, whole scenes, including the feelings of the actors, are vividly brought before the reader merely by the description of an (at first glance) irrelevant incident. Whether such scenes are worth reading about is another question.

While the book, as literature, hardly deserves its extraordinary success, it is well worthy of it as a social study—none the less so because nothing, probably, was further from the author's intentions. We cannot recall another work, fictitious or other, in which the middle class is viewed from the inside. The author does not as an outsider satirize the class he describes; he merely laughs at such follies or absurdities of individual members of it as, in life, their friends would see and smile over. There is nothing in English of which the work so much reminds us as it does of 'Salem Chapel' and other volumes of Mrs. Oliphant's "Chronicles." Mrs. Oliphant, however, not only shows in every line that her point of view is outside that of the life of the Tozers and their friends, but the whole gist of the story consists in placing her dull and narrow middle-class figures against the relatively radiant background of a more enlightened social order. On the other hand, the dwellers in the Landsberger Strasse are not only untroubled by contact with classes higher or lower than themselves, they are, one might almost say, ignorant of their existence. Whatever weaknesses they may have, snobbishness is not one of them, so that one is inclined to ask whether something good may not be said even of that objectionable characteristic. Like hypocrisy and vice, is it not sometimes the tribute which the consciousness of social and intellectual inferiority (as contrasted with smug content with commonplace surroundings) pays to a higher life? The Buchholz coterie have, it may be said, but one general idea, and that is the immensity, not of the universe, but of Berlin. Berlin is light, all without is darkness; yet, oddly enough, unless Mr. Stinde is slyer than would at first appear, the only refined woman in his story is a rosebud transplanted from a little town to bloom, if fate permits, among the peonies of the Landsberger Strasse.

WALKER'S SECOND ARMY CORPS.

History of the Second Army Corps, Army of the Potomac. By Francis A. Walker. New York: Chas. Scribner's Sons.

THE Second Army Corps has been fortunate in its historian. Of the many well-written books on the civil war which have issued from the press of recent years, we have seen none more interesting than this excellent piece of work by Gen. Walker. The narrative is clear, the style vivid, the account of military movements simple, straightforward, and free from the dulness that too often makes narratives of campaigns but a wearisome labor to the general reader. The book is one that could have been written by no other than an accomplished soldier, such familiarity does it show with all that belongs to army life and organization, and such comprehension does it everywhere manifest of strategy and tactics. There may be things omitted that ought to have been included, there may be some errors, but there is not an obscure page, there is not a tiresome chapter, in the book. Gen. Walker writes, too, con amore. He takes a just pride in the achievements of his comrades; the high record which his corps carved for itself through toil and danger and blood he evidently considers a priceless possession, to be carefully and jealously guarded. He is always glad to tell of the victories of his corps, and saddened to recall its defeats. He dilates upon the fact that it was late in the war before it lost a gun or a flag, while the story of Cold Harbor and the fights around Petersburg are evidently a sorrowing tribute to historical truth. Yet the warmth of coloring which this pride of country, of cause, of fellowship with those beside whom he marched, and bivouacked, and fought, does not make him ungenerous to his comrades of other corps or unfair towards the enemies he confront d.

The Second Army Corps was organized March 13, 1862, when McClellan was about to enter upon his Peninsula campaign. It contained at first the divisions of Richardson, Sedgwick, and Blenker, but the latter division was soon detached and became the nucleus of Sigel's and then of Howard's corps. It was the two former divisions (to which French's division and other troops were subsequently added) that became the heart of that famous body of troops which saved McClellan's left at Seven Pines; which did much and suffered much at Sharpsburg; which marched bravely to useless slaughter at Fredericksburg; which stood so unavailingly in its place at Chancellorsville; which bore the brunt of the third day at Gettysburg and turned the tide of Federal defeat to victory; which, on May 12, 1864, struck Lee the hardest blow he met with in that campaign, and which at Cold Harbor fared as it had served Pickett the year before on Cemetery Hill.

The commanders of this corps constitute a roll of able and distinguished soldiers, who, if none of them of the first rank, were yet such in the aggregate as few corps in the Federal army could match. The first of them—the gallant old Sumner—was probably unfit for the command of so many troops, and his appointment, made as it was by the President without McClellan's approval, should have produced the immediate resignation of the latter. But Gen. Walker well shows the good that Sumner effected, and that, in spite of his age and his errors, he impressed his character for courage and soldiership indelibly upon his command. Of the others—Couch, Warren, Hancock, Humphreys, all noted for brilliant feats—the last was the ablest in the management of troops.

One of Sumner's most creditable achievements was his staying the tide of Johnston's success at Fair Oaks, May 31, 1862. The strategy of this campaign is admirably described by Gen. Walker—the exposed position of McClellan's two corps on the south side of the Chickahominy, the concentration of the Confederates against them, the storm which impeded Johnston's movements while the swollen river cut the Federal army completely in two, Johnston's fatal error in not throwing G. W. Smith forward promptly to cooperate with Longstreet and D. H Hill, Sumner's quickness and determination in crossing on the already floating bridges, and his vigor in reaching the field and paralyzing Smith, as, late in the day, he was moving to complete the overthrow of Keyes and Heintzelman. The next day's operations showed great lack of a directing mind on both sides. Johnston had fallen, and McClellan left all to Sumner. The result was a great deal of desultory fighting and the death of many brave men, all to no purpose.

Gen. Walker errs when he speaks, in his account of the seven days' battles, of Jackson's crossing to the north side of the Chickahominy on the first day. Jackson, coming from the valley, was on the north side of that stream, and remained there until after the battle of Gaines's Mill. It was one of A. P. Hill's brigades that crossed high up the stream and moved down the north side. Again, his criticism is misdirected when he speaks of the attack at Beaver Dam Creek as "useless, since Jackson's turning movement would soon inevitably compel its abandonment; but the Confederate troops and Confederate commander were full of ardor, and a vehement assault was delivered, which was repulsed with great slaughter." It was not the "ardor" of the Confederate leader and his troops that led to this assault, but the fact that, having revealed his purpose to McClellan of concentrating the larger part of his army against the Federal right wing north of the Chickahominy, he feared to give his adversary time to checkmate his design by a movement against Richmond. Lee had left the defence of that city to one-third of his army, and, when he confronted the Federal right on Beaver Dam Creek, Jackson was half a day behind. A delay of even a few hours might induce McClellan to throw the mass of his troops against Magruder with crushing force. The Confederate commander therefore felt it necessary to keep the initiative, to give his adversary no breathing space, but occupy him so fully in looking after his right wing that he would have no opportunity to use his left to advantage.

On no field did the Second Army Corps win such laurels as at Gettysburg. Hancock's energy and decision more than anything else caused the battles of the second and third days to be fought there rather than on Pipe Creek or at some other place in the rear; and the splendid courage of both the corps and its commander on the third day have for ever associated their names with the greatest victory the Army of the Potomac ever gained. Gen. Walker thus describes Pickett's charge:

"Up the slope the Confederates rush with magnificent courage. At two or three hundred yards the Union infantry opens its deadly fire, but still the assailants push forward, undaunted, though Garnett falls dead in the van. And here appears the first serious consequence of Wilcox's failure to come up on the right. This has left open Pickett's flank on that side, and Hancock, easily the best tactician of the Potomac Army, and always on the front line of battle, eagle-eyed, sees and seizes his opportunity. Galloping to Stannard's brigade, he directs him to move his regiments to the front and attack the flank of the assaulting force. And now the collision—for which these thousands of Confederates have crossed the bloody plain, and for which those soldiers of the Union have waited through all that anxious time—comes with a crash and clamor that might well appall the stoutest heart. Upon the Sixty-ninth and Seventy-first Pennsylvania, of Webb's brigade, posted on the low stone wall, falls the full force of Longstreet's mighty blow.

"Like leaves in autumn gales the Philadelphians drop along the line. Now the position of the Seventy-first is carried, and the right of the Sixty-ninth is thrown over upon its centre; now the Confederate flags wave over the stone wall; the men of Kemper and Armistead, of Garnett and Archer, pour in through the gap, led by Armistead in person, and beat down Cushing's gunners over their pieces. The gallant and accomplished young commander of the battery gives one last shot for honor and for country, and falls dead among his men. For the moment that great and long-prepared charge is successful. Meade's line is broken. In the very centre of the Union position, crowning Cemetery Ridge, wave the flags of Virginia and the Confederacy. . . .

"It must be evident, even to one who knows nothing of war, that such a strain as this could not be long continued. Something must give way under such a pressure. If one side will not, the other must; if not at one point, then at another. The Union infantry has come up somewhat tumultuously, it is true, but courageously, nay, enthusiastically, and has formed around the head of Longstreet's column four ranks deep. Armistead is down. Every field officer in Pickett's division, except Pickett and one lieutenant-colonel, has fallen.

"The time has come to advance the standards of the Second Corps. With loud cries and a sudden forward surge, in which every semblance of formation is lost, the Union troops move upon the now faltering foe. One moment more and all is over. The most of the surviving Confederates throw themselves on the ground; others seek to escape capture, and retreat hurriedly down the hill and across the plain, which is once more shrieking with the fire of the artillery."

No part of this book is more interesting than that which describes the campaign of Grant in 1864 and the terrible conflicts from May 5 to June 3. Never was the courage and tenacity of the Army of the Potomac put to so severe a test, and Gen. Morgan's statement, quoted by Gen. Walker, in regard to the Second Corps at the end of this frightful struggle, was true of other parts of the Federal Army, too. Gen. Morgan says in regard to Cold Harbor: "The Second Corps here received a mortal blow, and never again was the same body of men." Grant's campaign up to this time and for months longer was a failure, and his final success in the spring of 1865 was the result of the exhaustion of the Confederacy itself as well as of its principal army.

Gen. Walker gives but glimpses of the Confederate side in his narrative, but his tone and temper are fair. He is too liberal now and then in assigning numbers to them, as, for instance, when he credits Jackson with thirty-five thousand men at White Oak Swamp; but he is usually not so far out of the way. It is often his silence more than anything else that shows his failure to realize the odds against which Lee fought, and the exigencies to which he was frequently reduced by disparity of men and resources. The reader who shall learn from this book and from that of Gen. Humphreys on the campaign of 1864 in Virginia, of the struggles, the toils, the sacrifices, the prodigious slaughter endured by the Army of the Potomac, will wonder at the ability which directed and the courage that sustained the opposing army, which, with half the numbers and far less than half the resources, battled so splendidly for its cause to the very end.

A few of the maps in Gen. Walker's book are good, but the majority are poor. They are in many cases unworthy of the narrative, and vexatious to the reader, who must constantly refer to other sources for information they should contain. Not one of them, we believe, has a scale.

The Mammalia in their Relation to Primeval Times. By Oscar Schmidt. D. Appleton & Co. 1886. 8vo. Ill. Pp. xii, 308.

THIS is a discussion of the mammalia, fossil and recent, with the purpose of presenting the evidences of evolution, within the group, in a concise and comprehensive manner. It has been before the public for some time, and has met with a deservedly favorable reception. The ma terials for consideration have been exhaustively handled, and, representing slow accumulations of geology from its beginning, it is unlikely that sufficient additions will soon be gathered to necessitate revision. New discoveries will eventually call for reconsideration, but in all probability the result will, through multiplication of species and complication of affinities, resemble that in hand much as a systema of to-day would resemble that of Linnæus. Comparative poverty in materials favors the production of a work like the present. Less prejudice in favor of Selection might have been better for the book. The use of the word Evolution is carefully avoided. On every page the bias toward Darwinism—as the author defines it, "finding a proof for the theory of descent in the hypothesis of natural selection in the struggle for existence"—is prominent. This, to any one who considers the forces that build the species of crystals in the rocks, or the species and genera of plants, as all-powerful in forming the species of animals, and who treat the idiosyncrasies of an animal as minor considerations, is something of a defect.

Prof. Schmidt's opinion of his own work is shown by the following extract from the preface, in which, as in other passages, the responsibility for the confusion of ideas must be shared by the translator:

"It will be found to contain proofs of the necessity, the truth, and the value of Darwinism as the foundation for the theory of descent, within a limited field, and is brought down to the most recent times. Within these limits the work is complete in itself; for although the student of natural history may have become acquainted with interesting fragments of the actual science, still the subject has not before been presented in so comprehensive a manner or in so convenient a form."

There is little in the author's treatment of the position of the mammalia that is not generally accepted, except, perhaps in incidental statements. A perfectly satisfactory explanation of the occurrence of the same genera, partly of the same species, of fishes and mussels in rivers situated very far apart, he finds in the assumption that the progenitors of all purely fresh-water species could also at one time live in either kind of water. Yet many of these may date their origin near the time of the emergence of the land, when there was no difference in the waters. More weight than is usual, or than was to have been expected, is given to phenomena of convergence; whether these and those of reversion, degradation, etc., have been fully estimated, the future will determine. Among distinctive characteristics it is said of the placenta that it came into existence only with the actual mammals, and is an acquisition towards a higher degree of progress. In view of the placental attachment obtaining in Carcharias and other genera of sharks, this should have been modified. Palæontology since Cuvier is well brought forward. Gaudry, Filhol, Owen, Rutimeyer, Burmeister, and, in this country, Leidy and Marsh, are favored authorities. In a number of instances Cope is cited only to be discredited.

The second section of the book is devoted to special comparisons of the living mammals with what are supposed to have been their ancestors. Beginning with the lowest, the monotremes, each group is treated in succession. The conclusion that the lower groups of mammals are, of course, those which have retained the inherited qualities of their ancestors most distinctly, may or may not in future accord their present position to this group, since not a trace of any fossil discovery leads us from the present living monotremes back to the primeval world. Further, it is said that, even admitting the debatable supposition of direct alliance with the marsupials, separation must have taken place before the Trias. Marsupials are traced with some uncertainty from Microlestes of the Trias. Clues to the relationship between Australian and American living marsupials are not yet found among the fossils. The Didelphidæ are supposed to be the earlier branch, from the lower vertebrates, and, according to Bardeleben, America was the earlier home of the group. Of the Edentata, as of the preceding, known fossils are insufficient indications of ancestry or connections between the branches. At the close of his remarks upon them, the author says: "Finally, a few remains from the Upper Eocene of Quercy corroborate what is demanded by our theory and common sense. With this division of the living world, we may be said, upon the whole, to stand utterly helpless as regards geological antiquity, in so far as the question refers to a special proof for the origin of species, and the perfectly justifiable proof of a general deduction is not accepted."

It is among the hoofed animals that the greatest degree of success in tracing descent is attained; yet even of these the incomings are as yet lost in the same obscurity as those of the other orders, though found in various stages of development, as early as the lowest Eocene. North America is supposed to be the home of the camels, whence they migrated to the Old World. References to Anoplotherium, Gelocus, and Diplopus—forms which seem to answer the requirements of adaptability, in reduction of toes, etc., but yet became extinct—call out the frank admission of inability to point out the definite primary form for deer or other ruminant; but any attempt to explain the striking relation between the past and present forms, otherwise than by the theory of descent and in accordance with Darwin's principle, cannot be expected from the author. The teeth and feet receive the greatest amount of attention in the comparisons. In the horses the chain is carried further back than elsewhere, but even here it is short, and finds only conjectural connection with those leading from other quadrupeds. The origin of other groups is still more uncertain; we have no idea when or whence the whales originated, no fossil clue to the progenitors of the seals or to the lower ancestors of men. Speaking of anthropology, the Professor remarks that it has made no definite progress in the past ten years. It is no fault of the author that the lines of descent he traces are short and unsatisfactorily ended, disconnected from each other; it is due to the imperfect condition of our knowledge of the geological record.

Most of the exceptions to be taken are to the author's use of the various theories. For instance, "adaptability," power of the animal to raise, or to accommodate itself, as the author puts it (plasticity, as we should write it), is treated as an unmixed benefit. Yet we find, among the extinct animals, forms similar to those surviving, and others so greatly differentiated that, by their very adaptability and readiness to answer the moulding influences of circumstances, they would seem to have been led to their destruction. One looks in vain for proof that the extinct American were less adaptable than the surviving European horses and camels, or that they were more able to resist exterminating causes than species of less adaptability that disappeared with them or that still survive. Accident is treated as if out of the question; yet the circumstances and masses in which the fossils are found prove the advent of occurrences out of the ordinary course. The term does not alone include sudden geological changes; a disease that might deprive us of our cattle, sheep, or hogs to-day would deserve the name as well as a cause that suddenly rendered the horse extinct in the post-Tertiary. As a consequence of imperfect record and knowledge, the author naturally indulges in a great deal of conjecture, much of which, with the advance of science, will give way to something more certain or to guesswork having a better foundation. All things considered, however, Prof. Schmidt deserves great credit for the most compact, comprehensive, and interesting volume on evolution that has yet appeared.

Cannibals and Convicts: Notes of Personal Experiences in the Western Pacific. By Julian Thomas ("The Vagabond"). With portraits and map. Cassell & Co. 1886. Pp. xvi, 408. 8vo.

THE islands of the Western Pacific were till recently of interest chiefly to the Christian world as fields for missionary work. Twenty years ago the employment of natives on the cotton and sugar plantations of Queensland and the Fijis brought them into general notice. Now the interest in the labor traffic has given place to the question of the ownership of the remaining independent islands. Upon each of these subjects this book throws considerable light, but it deals mainly with the last, the burning question of Australian foreign politics. The author, an American by birth, is a well-known writer for the Melbourne and Sydney press, and also enjoys the distinction of being the only journalist whom the French have permitted to visit their penal settlements in the Pacific. He appears to possess the qualities essential for success in his profession of special correspondent—courage, tact in dealing with men, a keen thirst for information, together with considerable literary skill. Although confessedly viewing all subjects simply as they seem to affect Australian interests, he yet conveys the impression of describing truthfully and without exaggeration what he sees. The opening chapters on the Fijis and Norfolk Island are of interest only as they serve to contrast the condition of the British islands with New Caledonia. This island, the largest in the South Seas after New Zealand, he first visited in 1878, during an insurrection of the natives. He gives an entertaining account of his adventures while accompanying various expeditions into the interior in pursuit of the insurgents, but we cannot dwell upon it further than to say that he does not extol the efficiency or the humanity of the French soldiers in bush fighting. Among the leading officers was the novelist, M. Henri Rivière, who was killed five years later in Tonkin. He wrote a detailed account of these events in his 'Souvenirs de la Nouvelle-Calédonie,' which our author ironically styles "one of his most charming works of fiction."

Of greater present importance is what he has to tell about the convict establishments. These are now, the Communists having all returned to France, of two kinds, the depot on an island in the harbor of the capital, Nouméa, where the worst criminals are confined, and the pénitenciers agricoles. These are settlements of libérés or "good-conduct" men in places where, under certain restrictions, they cultivate the land and carry on their trades. At several of these stations Mr. Thomas stayed for some time, and says of them: "There was and is a condition of society as abominable as ever existed in the Cities of the Plain." Bad as this is, there appears to be in the future a yet lower depth for them. "One cannot to English readers hint at the infamies," he continues, "which are increasing. It is not many months back since I was on board a French transport, the Dupuy de Lôme, which lay alongside the pier at Port Melbourne. Her passengers included some sixty criminal women—young, strong, and healthy, selected on such qualifications from the prisons of France, to be sent to New Caledonia as mates for privileged convicts. That one had killed her husband, this one her lover, another her child. They were mostly murderesses, and one en voyage had thrown her baby out of the porthole to die in the sea!" And this is the Government which poses before the world as the protector of Christians in China and Tonkin. The number of convicts now in New Caledonia is variously estimated, Capt. Norman, in his 'Colonial France,' giving the last official figures as 9,334, Mr. Thomas putting them at nearly 20,000, which is probably much nearer the truth, since several thousand récidivistes have recently been transported thither. These "habitual criminals," persons who, in general terms, have within ten years been condemned three times to imprisonment for three months, or once to hard labor and once to a detention of three months, are to form settlements with the power of choosing their own municipal officers, and are, as we are given to understand, after a time to be permitted to leave the island, but never to return to France. Naturally Australia, only 700 miles distant, is the place to which they will go and to which a large number of the libérés do actually escape. This fact has led the Australians to protest, with justifiable vehemence, against the récidiviste bill and the annexation of the New Hebrides by France for the purpose of providing settlements for this new class of convicts.

It was in 1883, when the excitement over this question was at its height in Australia, that Mr. Thomas visited the New Hebrides to report upon the movements of the French and the present condition of the labor trade. He found the islands similar in most respects to the Fijis, but inhabited, with the exception of Aneitium, by a fierce race of savages, among whom a few white traders, planters, and missionaries live in constant fear of their lives. Several of those whom he saw at that time have since been killed. Most of the land in the possession of the whites had been bought by a French commercial house, which had absorbed nearly all the trade and was using its very powerful influence on the Government to annex the group. Mr. Thomas made it a part of his work to discover the opinions of the natives on this point, and with great courage he went alone among them to win their confidence and thus arrive at the truth. As a result of his investigations, he asserts that there is a universal and profound hatred of the French, or the Kaiwee-wee, as they are termed. In this conclusion he is borne out by Mr. Romilly, who, in his recent book on the Western Pacific, says that the natives do not consider the Frenchman to be a white man. Of their willingness to be annexed to Australia, which Mr. Thomas also confidently asserts, there is more reason to be sceptical.

Our traveller had equally favorable opportunities for studying the labor question. Not only did he cruise in labor vessels, but he landed in various places with the recruiters, and finally went to Australia in a ship with a cargo of natives to observe their treatment during the passage. One of the most notable men engaged in this traffic, with whom he sailed, was "the son of a Senator of Louisiana, and nephew to Gen. Beauregard," James Toutant Proctor, who lost a leg at Chancellorsville, but "served on the staff of Gen. Beauregard till the close of the war." Since then he had been a planter in the Fijis and New Hebrides, a trader, and was now a sailor in the employ of the French New Hebrides Company. The present condition of the labor trade is very different from what it was a few years ago, when this same Capt. Proctor was described by missionaries and Government officials as "be- a curse wherever he went." The natives' freedom of choice is carefully guarded. Government agents go out with each vessel to see that none are taken by force, and that the ship has the legally prescribed accommodations for its living freight. According to Mr. Thomas's account, the one hundred and twenty natives on board the Lizzie were happy and well cared for. They sang and danced and played "cat's cradle" with a piece of sinnet, making "most wonderful combinations, far exceeding anything a white child would dream of." He believes that they return to their homes, after a three-years' service on a Queensland plantation, improved; but in this favorable opinion Mr. Romilly, the Government Commissioner, and the missionaries generally do not agree. We have not space to dwell upon our author's observations on the work of the English missionaries, further than to say that his criticism on the comparative uselessness of translating the Scriptures into languages and dialects which are fast disappearing seems to us just. One would think that they had never heard of Eliot's Indian Bible. The French priests follow the wiser course of teaching their converts the French language. This policy of the missionaries is the more surprising from the fact that many of the natives in all the islands are able to speak a little English.

The final chapters of this very interesting book are upon New Guinea, but they add nothing new to our information about this island. We regret that the author has not valued his work highly enough to give it an index. In the map which accompanies the volume, the Caroline Islands are incorrectly ascribed to Germany instead of to Spain.

Sketches from English History. Selected and edited, with an introduction (from the Roman Conquests to the Revolution of 1688) by Arthur M. Wheeler, Professor of History in Yale College. New York: Chautauqua Press. 1886. 8vo, pp. 372.

PROF. WHEELER'S 'Sketches' consist of sixty-two selections, covering the entire field of English history, from "the Roman occupation" (Green) "to the story of Cawnpore" (Kaye). The selections are made with excellent judgment, from writers of the highest standing. A good notion of the execution, as regards both selection and completeness, will be given by the list of extracts for the reign of George II.: "Walpole as a Peace Minister" (Green); "The Preaching of Whitefield" (Lecky); "After Culloden" (Stanhope); "Pitt as a War Minister" (Macaulay). Each selection is introduced by a well-written paragraph by the editor, and he has provided also a general introduction—in too fine print, and ending, we cannot see why, at the accession of William III. One would have supposed that more abundant foot-notes would be desirable, and at any rate there should be some account of the authors and the works from which the selections are taken. An appendix contains fifteen maps, taken from Labberton's Historical Atlas. As a whole, the book is the best of its class with which we are acquainted.

The Two Spies. Nathan Hale and John André. By Benson J. Lossing, LL.D. Illustrated with pen-and-ink sketches by H. Rosa. D. Appleton & Co. 1886. Pp. 169.

IN this handsome volume Mr. Lossing relates with good taste and feeling the familiar stories of the two Revolutionary spies—stories familiar, but which will never lose their attractiveness or their pathos. There are too few materials for the life of Nathan Hale to allow it to be more than an introduction to that of the brilliant English officer; but, short as it is—barely thirty pages—this sketch makes a deeper impression upon the reader than the account of André which occupies the greater part of the volume. The publication of the book seems to have (apart from its general historical purpose) a two-fold object: partly to justify the erection, by Mr. Field, of the monument to André at Tappaan, but principally to excite interest in the projected monument to Hale. The writer's sentiment and sympathy are shown by these words of the "Foretalk":

"The motives of the two spies were expressed by themselves. Hale said: 'I wish to be useful. If the exigencies of my country demand a peculiar service, its claims to the performance of that service are imperious.' André avowed that in the enterprise in which he was engaged all he sought was 'military glory, the applause of his King and country, and, perhaps, a brigadiership.' The last words uttered by André under the gibbet indicated that his supreme thought at that moment was of himself. He said to the American officers present, 'I request you, gentlemen, that you will bear me witness to the world that I die like a brave man.' Hale's last words upon the ladder indicated that his supreme thought at that moment was of his country. He said: 'I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country.'"

This volume has an especial literary interest, as containing André's "Cow-chase" in full, and also Miss Anna Seward's "Monody on Major André"—never before published in this country; also, three letters from André to Miss Seward, written at the age of eighteen.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK.

Andrews, C. C. Brazil: Its Condition and Prospects. D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.
Bishop, J. P. Commentaries on the Law of Contracts, upon a New and Condensed Method. (A new work superseding the author's old one.) Chicago: T. H. Flood & Co.
Bowen, J. E. The Conflict of East and West in Egypt. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.
Conrad, G. S. Cassell's Public School French Reader. Cassell & Co. $1.
Daudet, A. La Belle-Nivernaise. Histoire d'un vieux bateau et de son équipage. William R. Jenkins. 25 cents.
Dawson, E. C. James Haanington, First Bishop of Equatorial Africa. A History of his Life and Work. 1847-1885. E. & J. B. Young & Co. $2.
Elliot, H. R. The Common Chord: A Story of the Ninth Ward. Cassell & Co. $1.
Fenn, G. M. The Master of the Ceremonies: A Novel. D. Appleton & Co. 50 cents.
Fischer, H. Lessing's Laokoon und die Gesetze der bildenden Kunst. Berlin: Weidmann. 3 m., 60 pf.
Fleming, Dr. G. The Practical Horse-Keeper. Cassell & Co. $2.
Fothergill, Jessie. Borderland: A Country-Town Chronicle. Henry Holt & Co. $1.
Frémont, J. C. Memoirs of My Life. Parts 4 to 10 inclusive. Belford, Clarke & Co. 50 cents each.
Frith, L. Life of Giordano Bruno, the Nolan. London: Trübner & Co. $2.
Galdoz, H. La Rage et St.-Hubert. Paris: Alphonse Picard.
Gaskell, Mrs. Cranford. Harper's Handy Series. 25 cents.
Gennevraye, A. L'Ombre. William R. Jenkins.
George Washington's Fifty-seven Rules of Behavior. With a historical preface by Wm. O. Stoddard. Denver: W. H. Lawrence & Co. 40 cents.
Greene, Belle C. A New England Idyl. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.
Greville Memoirs. A Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria. Vol. iii. D. Appleton & Co. $2.
Gröber, Prof. G. Grundriss der romanischen Philologie. Part 2. Strassburg: Karl J. Trübner.
Hale, E. E., Sr. and Jun. Franklin in France. From Original Documents, most of which are now published for the first time. Boston: Roberts Brothers.
Hodder, E. The Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury, K. G. With Portraits. In 3 vols. Cassell & Co. $7.50.
Irelan, J. R. A History of the United States of America from the Monarchic Colonial Days to the Present Times. In 18 vols. Vols. iii. and iv. Chicago: Fairbanks & Palmer Publishing Co.
Longfellow, H. W. The Golden Legend. With Notes. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 40 cents.
Maxwell, W. H. Primary Lessons in Language and Composition. A. S. Barnes & Co. 35 cents.
Memorial of James Alexander Dupee. With a Short Life. Boston: Cupples, Upham & Co.
Moor, C. R. Faith and Righteousness. A Memorial of Sumner Ellis, D.D., with an Outline of his Life and Ministry. Boston: Universalist Publishing House. $1.
Morison, Jeanie. The Purpose of the Ages. Macmillan & Co. $2.50.
Olcott, H. S. A Buddhist Catechism, according to the Sinhalese Canon. Approved and Recommended for Use in Buddhist Schools. Madras: Graves, Cookson & Co.
Reid, T. W. Gladys Fane: A Story of Two Lives. Harper's Franklin Square Library. 20 cents.
Row—Olcott. Hinduism: the Dwaita Philosophy of Sriman Madhwacharyar. Compiled from original Sanscrit and other works. Madras: Popham's Schroeder, S. The Fall of Maximilian's Empire. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.
Silsbee, M. C. D. A Half Century in Salem. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.
Stapfer, Prof. P. Racine et Victor Hugo. Paris: Armand Colin & Cie.
Taylor, J. N. Treatise on the American Law of Landlord and Tenant. Eighth ed. 2 vols. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.
Through the Gates of Gold: A Fragment of Thought. Boston: Roberts Brothers. 50 cents.
Walker, H. E. The Lady of Dardale, and Other Poems. Manchester, N. H.: Browne & Rowe.
Warriner, E. A. I am that I Am: The Philosophic Basis of Christian Faith. A Metrical Essay. Boston: Cupples, Upham & Co. $1.
Yriarte, Charles. Autour du Concile. Paris: J. Rothschild.
Zirndorf, H. Isaak Markus Jost und seine Freunde. Cincinnati. 75 cents.

"The 'Young Folks' Cyclopædia' should be in every juvenile library."—From a Report of the Connecticut Board of Education.

YOUNG FOLKS' CYCLOPÆDIA of { Common Things.....$2.50 / Persons and Places... 2.50

 Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price.

HENRY HOLT & CO., Publishers, New York.

March Atlantic,

Ready Saturday, has the following:

Our Hundred Days in Europe.
The first paper of a series by OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Fancy, or Fact?
A charming Poem by JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

The Second Son. IX.–XII.
By M. O. W. OLIPHANT and T. B. ALDRICH.

Paul Patoff. V.–VII.
By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

Theophile Gautier.
By JAMES BRECK PERKINS.

Curiosities of Criticism.
By AGNES REPPLIER.

Longfellow's Art.
By HORACE E. SCUDDER.

Poems.
By Mrs. L. C. MOULTON, ANDREW HEDBROOKE, BLISS CARMAN.

Other Essays, Poems, Contributors' Club, etc.

$4 a year; 35 cents a number.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.,
BOSTON;
11 East 17th St., New York.

Gray's Botanies.

GRAY'S BOTANICAL SERIES,
By Prof. Asa Gray of Harvard University. provides the best and most complete equipment for all classes or for special students.

GRAY'S HOW PLANTS GROW.
For Introduction..... $ .80
GRAY'S SCHOOL AND FIELD BOOK.
For Introduction..... 1.80
GRAY'S MANUAL. For Introduction.. 1.62
GRAY'S BOTANIST'S MICROSCOPE.
Two lenses..... 2.00
GRAY'S BOTANIST'S MICROSCOPE.
Three lenses..... 2.50

Write for circulars and for terms for introduction of other works in the series.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
753 and 755 Broadway, New York,
149 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

NEW LAW BOOKS.

Taylor's Landlord and Tenant.
EIGHTH EDITION.
Edited by HENRY F. BUSWELL.
2 vols. 8vo. $10.00 net.

Constitutional Prohibitions
Against Impairing the Obligation of Contracts.
By HENRY CAMPBELL BLACK.
Small 8vo. $3.50 net.

LITTLE, BROWN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
254 Washington Street, Boston.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S
NEW BOOKS.

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST. New Volumes.

THE SACRED BOOKS OF THE EAST. Translated by vasious Oriental Scholars, and edited by F. Max Müller.

Vol. 25. The Laws of Manu. Translated with extracts from Seven Commentaries. By G. Bühler. 8vo. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $5.25.

Vol. 29. The Grikya-Sûtras. Rules of Vedic Domestic Ceremonies. Translated by Hermann Oldenberg. Part I. Sankhayana-Asvalayana-Paraskara-Khadira. 8vo. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $3 25.

OUTLINES OF CLASSIFICATION AND SPECIAL MORPHOLOGY of Plants. By Dr. K. Goebel, Professor in the University of Rostock. A new edition of Sachs Text-Book of Botany. Book 2. Authorized English translation by Henry E. F. Garnsey, M.A. Revised by Isaac Bayley Balfour, M.A., M.D., F.R.S., with 407 woodcuts. Med. 8vo. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $5.25.

THE CHEMISTRY OF THE SUN. By J. Norman Lockyer, F.R.S., Member of the Committee on Solar Physics. With illustrations. 8vo, $4.50.

The Bampton Lectures.—New Volumes.

THE CHRISTIAN PLATONISTS OF ALEXANDRIA. Eight Lectures Preached before the University of Oxford in the year 1886 on the Foundation of the late Rev. John Bampton, M.A. By Charles Bigg, D.D., Assist. Chaplain of Corpus Christi College. 12mo. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $1.50.

"The author points out with great critical skill and large learning the relation of these great thinkers of the Church to each other, and to the unbelieving world about them; unfolds their opinions, connects them with their influence, shows their relation to modern thought, accounts for the peculiar interpretation of the doctrine of the logos, and has contributed a most valuable work to the library of the studious and scholarly."—Christian Advocate.

"All this has been done with a wealth of learning, with an amplitude of illustration, and with a cogency of reasoning which excite admiration and command respect; and, taken as a whole, this work on the Christian Platonists of Alexandria may justly be regarded as one of the most learned in the whole Bampton course of lectures, and which all true scholarly theologians will highly prize."—Church Press.

LESSONS OF THE CROSS AND PASSION. Words from the Cross. The Reign of Sin. The Lord's Prayer. Four Courses of Lent Lectures. By C. J. Vaughan, D.D., Dean of Llandaff and Master of the Temple. New edition. 12mo, $2.75.

New Book by the Author of 'The Heir of Redclyffe.'

THE VICTORIAN HALF CENTURY. A Jubilee Book. By Charlotte M. Yonge, Author of 'The Heir of Redclyffe,' etc., etc. 12mo, paper, 35 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

A New Volume by Dr. Maclaren.

CHRIST IN THE HEART, and Other Sermons. By Alexander Maclaren, D.D. Second Edition. 12mo, $1.50.

MY FRIEND JIM. By W. E. Norris. 12mo, $1.

HISTORIA NUMORUM. A Manual of Greek Numismatics. By Barclay V. Head. With Plates. Med. 8vo, half bound. Oxford: Clarendon Press. $10.50.

ÆSCHYLUS.—SEVEN AGAINST THEBES. With an Introduction, Commentary, and Translation by A. W. Verrall, M.A. 8vo, $2.

Clarendon Press Series.—New Volume.

JUVENAL.—THIRTEEN SATIRES. Edited with Introduction and Notes by C. H. Pearson, M.A., and Herbert A. Strong, M.A., LL.D. 12mo, $1.50.

Macmillan's Elementary Classics.—New Volume.

CORNELIUS NEPOS.—SELECTIONS ILLUSTRATIVE OF GREEK and Roman History. Edited for the Use of Beginners, with Introduction, Notes, Exercises, and Vocabulary, by G. S. Farnell, M.A. 18mo, 40 cents.

MACMILLAN & CO., 112 Fourth Avenue, New York.

The Nation

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1130. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

FORTY-SECOND ANNUAL REPORT

OF THE

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE CO.

Office: Nos. 346 and 348 Broadway, New York.

JANUARY 1, 1887.

Amount of Net Cash Assets, January 1, 1886 ..... $63,512,618 00

REVENUE ACCOUNT.

Premiums	$16,386,067 69
Less deferred premiums, January 1, 1886	878,161 65	$15,507,906 04
Interest and rents, etc. (including realized gains on Securities sold)	4,157,796 42
Less Interest accrued January 1, 1886	435,284 18	3,722,502 24
		$19,230,408 28
		$82,743,026 28

DISBURSEMENT ACCOUNT.

Losses by death, including reversionary additions to same	$2,757,635 97
Endowments, matured and discounted, including reversionary additions to same	559,075 01
Dividends, annuities, and purchased policies	311,119 11
Total Paid Policy-holders	$7,62[illegible]
Taxes and re-insurances	[illegible]
Commissions, brokerages, agency expenses, and physicians' fees	[illegible]
Office and law expenses, salaries, advertising, printing, &c.	[illegible]	923,402 80
		$[illegible]

ASSETS.

Cash in bank, on hand, and in transit (since received)		$3,023,306
United States Bonds and other bonds and stocks (market value, $43,124,273 85)		39,522,443 [illegible]
Real Estate		6,839,974 22
Bonds and Mortgages, first lien on real estate (buildings thereon insured for $14,000,000 and the policies assigned to the Company as additional collateral security)		15,228,775 00
Temporary Loans (market value of securities held as collateral, $5,912,741)		4,450,000 00
*Loans on existing policies (the Reserve held by the Company on these policies amounts to over $2,000,000 00)		408,619 44
*Quarterly and semi-annual premiums on existing policies, due subsequent to Jan. 1, 1887	1,041,666 15
*Premiums on existing policies in course of transmission and collection. (The Reserve on these policies, included in liabilities, is estimated at $1,050,000)	646,437 14
Agents' balances	161,905 31
Accrued interest on investments, January 1, 1887	486,497 10	$71,819,623 48
Market value of securities over cost on Company's books		3,601,829 89

* A detailed schedule of these items will accompany the usual annual report filed with the Insurance Department of the State of New York.

CASH ASSETS, January 1, 1887, - - - $75,421,453 37

Appropriated as follows:

Adjusted losses, due subsequent to January 1, 1887		$202,346 43
Reported losses, awaiting proof, &c.		355,625 28
Matured endowments, due and unpaid (claims not presented)		37,890 70
Annuities due and unpaid (uncalled for)		9,318 74
Reserved for re-insurance on existing policies; participating insurance at 4 per cent. Carlisle net premium; non-participating at 5 per cent. Carlisle net premium		62,525,599 00
Reserved for contingent liabilities to Tontine Dividend Fund, January 1, 1886, over and above a 4 per cent. Reserve on existing policies of that class	$3,123,742 77
Addition to the Fund during 1886	1,320,530 69
DEDUCT—	$4,444,273 46
Returned to Tontine policy-holders during the year on matured Tontines	267,818 21
Balance of Tontine Fund January 1, 1887		$4,176,455 25
Reserved for premiums paid in advance		33,720 72
		$67,340,926 12
Divisible Surplus (Company's Standard)		8,080,527 25
		$75,421,453 37

Surplus by the New York State Standard, at 4½ per cent (including the Tontine Fund) .. $15,549,319 53

From the undivided surplus of $8,080,527.25 the Board of Trustees has declared a Reversionary dividend to participating policies in proportion to their contribution to surplus, available on settlement of next annual premium.

Death-claims paid.	Income from Interest.	Insurance in force.	Cash Assets.
1882, $1,955,292.	1882, $2,798,018	Jan. 1, 1883, $171,415,097.	Jan. 1, 1883, $50,800,396
1883, 2,263,092.	1883, 2,712,863	" 1884, 198,746,043.	" 1884, 55,542,902
1884, 2,257,175.	1884, 2,971,624	" 1885, 229,382,586.	" 1885, 59,283,753
1885, 2,999,109.	1885, 3,390,069	" 1886, 259,674,500.	" 1886, 66,864,321
1886, 2,757,035.	1886, 3,722,502	" 1887, 304,373,540.	" 1887, 75,421,453

Number of policies issued during the year, 22,027. Risks assumed, $85,178,294.

TRUSTEES:

WM. H. APPLETON, WILLIAM H. BEERS, WILLIAM A. BOOTH, Hon. BENJ. H. BRISTOW, HENRY BOWERS, JOHN CLAFLIN, ROBERT B. COLLINS, R. SUYDAM GRANT, ELIAS S. HIGGINS, WALTER H. LEWIS, EDWARD MARTIN, RICHARD MUSER, GEORGE H. POTTS, C. C. BALDWIN, JOHN N. STEARNS, WM. L. STRONG, ALEX. STUDWELL, HENRY TUCK, A. H. WELCH, L. L. WHITE.

WILLIAM H. BEERS, President.
HENRY TUCK, Vice-President.
ARCHIBALD H. WELCH, 2d Vice-President.
RUFUS W. WEEKS, Actuary.

THEODORE M. BANTA, Cashier.
D. O'DELL, Superintendent of Agencies.
A. HUNTINGTON, M.D., Medical Director.

FOUR VALUABLE BOOKS.

FAMILIAR SHORT SAYINGS. By S. Arthur Bent, A.M. Fifth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 12mo, vellum cloth, $2.00.

Indispensable to students, writers, and libraries. It gives a collection of short, sententious sayings of all times, such as are constantly referred to, but are not to be found in other books of reference. A short sketch of each speaker and the circumstances attending each remark is also given. The work is brought down to the latest time, quoting 80 authors not before included, and containing over 300 new sayings from Agassiz, Choate, President Cleveland, Emerson, Evarts, Carlyle, Gladstone, Wellington, Parnell, etc., etc.

FAMILIAR ALLUSIONS. A Handbook of Miscellaneous Information, including the names and piquant descriptions of Celebrated Statues, Paintings, Palaces, Country Seats, Ruins, Churches, Ships, Streets, Clubs, Natural Curiosities, and the like. By W. A. Wheeler and C. G. Wheeler. $2.00.

EVENTS AND EPOCHS IN RELIGIOUS History. By James Freeman Clarke. Illustrated. $2.00.

CONTENTS.—The Catacombs; The Buddhist Monks of Central Asia; The Christian Monks; Augustine, Anselm, Bernard; Jeanne d'Arc; Savonarola, Luther, Loyola; The Mystics; Neo-Platonists, German Pietists, Fenelon, Swedenborg, Emerson; George Fox; The Huguenots, Waldenses, Albigenses; John Wesley; The Moravians and Methodists.

*THE COURSE OF EMPIRE. Being Out*lines of the Chief Political Changes in the History of the World. Arranged by Centuries, with variorum illustrations, by C. G. Wheeler. 12mo, $2.00.

A magnificent treasury of history. Twenty-five full-page colored maps, showing the Governments of Europe and Asia, in every century since 500 B. C.; with chronological table, list of great men, and 25 pages or more of history of each century, with copious and vigorous quotations from Guizot, Macaulay, Milman, Lecky, Hallam, Gibbon, Livy, Grote, Buckle, Carlyle, et als.

For sale by all booksellers. Sent, postpaid, upon receipt of price. Catalogues of our books mailed free.

TICKNOR & COMPANY, Boston.

MODERN LANGUAGE NOTES.

Contents of the March Number (Vol. II., No. 3):

LODEMAN, A.—The Modern Languages in University, College, and Secondary School. GARNER, SAMUEL.—The Gerundial Construction in the Romanic Languages. I. COOK, ALBERT S.—List of the Strong Verbs in Part II. of Aelfric's Saints. LANG, HENRY R.—A Passage in Gonzalo de Berceo's 'Vida de San Millan.' MCELROY, JNO. G. R.—The Etymology of Wannion. The Modern Language Association of Ontario. REVIEWS: NOREEN, ADOLF.—Altisländische und altnorwegische Grammatik unter Berücksichtigung des Urnordischen. (J. M. Hart.) GROPP, ERNST.—Ausgewaehlte Erzaehlungen von Alphonse Daudet; Auswahl franzoesischer Gedichte; Abriss der franzoesischen Versiehre. (Casimir Zdanowicz.) MERCESCO, V.—Grammaire de la langue roumaine. (H. Schmidt.) Brief Mention; Personal; Journal Notices; Recent Publications.

Address A. M. ELLIOTT, Managing Editor, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, for sample copy.

SUBSCRIPTION, $1 PER ANNUM.

The Crimean Journey of Catherine II.

LETTRES DU PRINCE DE LIGNE à la Marquise de Coigny pendant l'année 1787. Paris, Librairie Jouaust, 1886. 16mo, $1.00. (Reviewed in the Nation of January 22, 1887.)

Sent, post free, on receipt of price by DUPRAT & CO., 5 East 17th St., N. Y. Catalogues of JOUAUST and TAUCHNITZ Libraries on application.

ANY BOOK

noticed or advertised in the Nation will be supplied on receipt of price by LAUGHTON, MACDONALD & CO., Booksellers and Importers, 131 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

The Nation.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

Politics, Literature, Science, and Art.

FOUNDED 1865.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER.

THE WEEK 153

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS 156

EDITORIAL ARTICLES:
The Next Party Issue 158
A Great Chance for Labor Reformers 158
The Rule of the Criminal Classes 159
"The Soldier Vote" 159

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE:
Are Englishmen Interested in Politics? 160

CORRESPONDENCE:
Public and Private Interest 161
Ethics of Land Tenure 161
The Labor Vote in Philadelphia 162
Office-Holders as Political Workers 162
A Blind Guide 162
Nevada Oranges 163
The Wrong John Cotton 163
The Introduction of the Elective System 163
The Degree of A.B 163
Disguised Advertisements 163
That Russian Beggar 163

NOTES 164

REVIEWS:
Stephens's French Revolution 166
The Greville Memoirs 166
Recent Law Books 169
Retrospections of America 171
Talks with Socrates about Life 171
American Literature 172
The Synthetic Philosophy of Expression 172
The Functions of the Brain 173
Mathematical Teaching 173
A Tramp Trip 173

BOOKS OF THE WEEK 173

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars per year, in advance, postpaid to any part of the United States or Canada; to foreign countries comprised in Postal Union, Four Dollars.

The date when the subscription expires is on the Address-Label of each paper, the change of which to a subsequent date becomes a receipt for remittance. No other receipt is sent unless requested.

The paper is stopped at expiration of the subscription, unless previously renewed.

Remittances at the risk of the subscriber, unless made by registered letter or by check, express order, or postal order, payable to "Publisher of the NATION."

When a change of address is desired, both the old and new addresses should be given.

Address THE NATION, Box 794, New York.

Publication Office, 210 Broadway.

TERMS OF ADVERTISING.

[No deviation.]

Scale of Agate lines.

On any page not specified, 15 cents per line each insertion; with choice of page, 20 cents.

A column (140 lines), $20 each insertion; with choice of page, $27. — 5

A page (3 columns), $60 each insertion; with choice of position, $80.

Twenty per cent. advance for top of column or other preferred position, when specified; where positions are not specified, advertisements are classified as far as possible and arranged in order of size, the largest at the top. — 10

Twenty per cent. advance for cuts, fancy or other letters not comprised in THE NATION fonts, and all other special typography (subject to approval). Cuts are inserted only on inside pages of cover or fly-leaves, not on outside of cover, nor on pages numbered for binding. — 15

Marriage and Death Notices, 50 cents each.

DISCOUNT on yearly accounts amounting to $250, 10 per cent.; $500, 15 per cent.; $750, 20 per cent.; $1,000, 25 per cent. Credits are made December 31. On a yearly account amounting to 52 pages the discount is one-third.

Advertisements must be acceptable in every respect. Copy received until Tuesday, 5 P. M.

THE NATION is sent free to those who advertise in it, as long as advertisement continues.

The EDITION OF THE NATION this week is 8,700 copies. The Subscription List is always open to inspection.

 Copies of THE NATION may be procured in Paris of J. G. Fotheringham, 8 Rue des Capucines; and in London of B. F. Stevens, 4 Trafalgar Square; George Street, 30 Cornhill, E. C.; and H. F. Gillig & Co., 449 Strand.

Schools.

Alphabetized, first, by States; second, by Towns.

CONNECTICUT, Lyme.

BLACK HALL SCHOOL.—A FAMILY and Preparatory School for boys. Thorough instruction and careful training. New and enlarged accommodations. CHARLES G. BARTLETT, Principal.

CONNECTICUT, Middletown.

WILSON GRAMMAR SCHOOL — A Preparatory School for Boys. $500 per year. For Circular address E. H. WILSON, A.M.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, 1212 and 1214 14th St., and 1407 Massachusetts Ave.

THE NORWOOD INSTITUTE. — A Select Boarding and Day School for young ladies and little girls. MR. and MRS. WM. D. CABELL, Principals.

MARYLAND, Baltimore.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—Law School. Eighteenth annual session, October 3, 1887. Address HENRY D. HARLAN, Sec'y.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School. Address the Dean, *EDMUND H. BENNETT, LL.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston.

INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY. Courses in Civil, Mechanical, Mining, and Electrical Engineering, Chemistry, Architecture, etc. JAMES P. MUNROE, Sec'y. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Pres.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 18 Boylston Place.

PREPARATION FOR THE INSTI- tute of Technology and for Harvard College without Greek. Private School. ALBERT HALE.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 259 Boylston Street.

CHAUNCY-HALL SCHOOL (59th Year). —Preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology is a specialty. Reference is made to the Institute Faculty. The location is the most attractive in Boston.

MASSACHUSETTS, Boston, 231 W. Chester Park, Back Bay Extension.

FRENCH HOME FOR YOUNG LADY Students, 13th year; thorough teaching; French spoken exclusively; number limited. Refers to patrons. MADAME THOMAS.

MASSACHUSETTS, Cambridge, Larch St.

HOME FOR BOYS.—DR. ABBOT AD- mits not more than four boys into his family, to fit for college or educate privately. Separate tuition, with best of care in all respects. Charming location, with fine tennis-court. F. E. ABBOT, Ph.D., Proprietor.

MASSACHUSETTS, Quincy.

ADAMS ACADEMY. — PREPARA- tory and boarding school for boys. School year began 15th September, 1886. For all information address WILLIAM EVERETT, Ph.D.

MASSACHUSETTS, S. Williamstown, Berkshire Co.

GREYLOCK INSTITUTE.—A PRE- paratory School for Boys. 45th year. Catalogues on application. GEORGE F. MILLS, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, West Bridgewater.

HOWARD COLLEGIATE INSTI- tute. Full preparatory with shorter college course. HELEN MAGILL, Ph.D., Principal, Graduate of Swarthmore College, Boston University, and Newnham College, Cambridge, England.

NEW JERSEY, Lawrenceville.

LAWRENCEVILLE SCHOOL.—JOHN C. Green Foundation. It is desirable that applications should be made from 3 to 6 months in advance of date of entrance. For Catalogue containing Courses of Study and Calendar, address REV. JAMES C. MACKENZIE, Ph.D.

NEW YORK, New Hartford, near Utica.

MRS. COLLIER'S SCHOOL for YOUNG girls from six to sixteen. Open the entire year.

NEW YORK, Suspension Bridge.

DE VEAUX COLLEGE.—A Military Boarding School for Boys. WILFRED H. MUNRO, A.M., President.

NEW YORK, Syracuse.

MRS. CHARLOTTE MAY WILKIN- son's Home School for Girls.—$1,000 per year. No extras. Only ten pupils. Beautiful and healthful situation on the hills above Syracuse. School year begins Sept. 14, 1887. Refers to Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, George Wm. Curtis, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Hon. Andrew D. White, Louisa May Alcott, James B. Angell, LL.D., Hon. George V. N. Lothrop.

NEW YORK, Utica.

MRS. PIATT'S SCHOOL FOR YOUNG Ladies.—The next school year begins Wednesday, Sept. 21st, 1887. Applications should be made early.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, 1350 Pine St.

MISS ANABLE'S BOARDING AND Day School for Young Ladies will reopen Sept. 22.

PENNSYLVANIA, Philadelphia, Chestnut Hill.

MRS. COMEGYS AND MISS BELL'S English, French, and German Boarding School for Young Ladies. Students prepared for College. Ample grounds afford advantages for outdoor exercise. Additional class and recreation-rooms built during the past summer.

Teachers.

AN EXPERIENCED PROFESSOR OF modern languages, music, and drawing desires a summer engagement. Address Mr. HEERENBERG, Trinity School, Tivoli-on-Hudson, N. Y.

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER OF Articulation wants a position as governess to a deaf child. Good references. Address H. C. W., care Nation.

CHARLES W. STONE, Tutor for Harvard, 68 Chestnut Street, Boston.

JOHN W. DALZELL, PRIVATE TU- tor, 15 Applan Way, Cambridge, Mass., will take one boy into the family.

School Agencies.

BARDEEN'S SCHOOL BULLETIN Agency, Syracuse, N. Y., may be depended on to furnish suitable teachers, and to inform no others.

BRIDGE TEACHERS' AGENCY, 110 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.—College, high and private school work. J. RANSOM BRIDGE, Manager.

BROCKWAY TEACHERS' AGENCY, Times Building, Chicago, will supply superintendents, grade teachers, specialists with positions in Central, Western, and Southern States for ensuing year.

SCHOOL AGENCY.—Oldest and best known in the United States. Estab'd 1855. J. W. SCHERMERHORN & CO., 7 East 14th St., New York.

THE BOSTON TEACHERS' AGENCY Supplies Teachers to Schools, Positions to Teachers. Circular free. E. O. FISK, 13 Tremont Place, Boston.

UNION TEACHERS' AGENCY, 16 Astor Place, New York City. W. D. KERR, Secretary. Send for circulars, and list of places filled.

Wants.

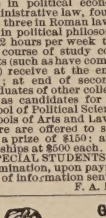
A COMPETENT STENOGRAPHER, with special experience in literary and technical work, having free several hours daily, desires to make engagement for dictation for that time. Notes accurately transcribed and promptly delivered. Reference offered. Address M. C. B., 464 West 23d Street, N. Y.

COLUMBIA COLLEGE School of Political Science.

This school begins the second session of its seventh year February 10, 1887. Its faculty consists of ten professors and lecturers. It offers (1886-7) eight courses in political and constitutional history, nine in political economy, five in constitutional and administrative law, four in diplomacy and international law, three in Roman law and comparative jurisprudence, two in political philosophy, and one in bibliography—in all 42 hours per week through the academic year. The full course of study covers three years. Regular students (such as have completed the junior year in any college) receive at the end of the first year the degree of A.B.; at end of second, A.M.; at end of third, Ph.D. Graduates of other colleges admitted to advanced standing as candidates for A.M. and Ph.D. Students of the School of Political Science admitted to all courses in the Schools of Arts and Law, without additional tuition fee. There are offered to students four fellowships of $250 and a prize of $150; and to graduates three prize lectureships at $500 each.

SPECIAL STUDENTS admitted to any course without examination, upon payment of proportional fee. Circulars of information upon application.

F. A. P. BARNARD, LL.D., President.



GOLD MEDAL, PARIS, 1878.

BAKER'S

Breakfast Cocoa.

Warranted absolutely pure Cocoa, from which the excess of Oil has been removed. It has three times the strength of Cocoa mixed with Starch, Arrowroot or Sugar, and is therefore far more economical, costing less than one cent a cup. It is delicious, nourishing, strengthening, easily digested, and admirably adapted for invalids as well as for persons in health.

Sold by Grocers everywhere.

W. BAKER & CO., Dorchester, Mass.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Parties who neglected to invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis real estate at the proper time and missed it, have now another opportunity in Sioux City. Those who did invest in Kansas City and Minneapolis and consequently enriched themselves, are invited to inspect the COMING CITY OF THE WEST. Send for circulars. Address JOHN PEIRCE, Sec'y, Sioux City, Iowa.

CAN BE REALIZED BY CHANGING

7 2/3 % Four Per Cent Government Bonds into 6 per cent. Debentures. Capital $600,000. Large reserve guarantee fund. Pamphlets. AMERICAN INVESTMENT CO., 150 Nassau st. N.Y.

EUROPE TENTH SEASON. The most enjoyable and economical excursions ever planned. More furnished for the money than in Any Tour yet offered. All Travel and Hotels first-class. COMPANY SELECT. By the Palatial, Fast, New Steamship, CITY OF ROME. Send for circular, free E. TOURJEE, Boston.

TREES—FRUIT AND ORNAMENTAL; ROSES; GRAPEVINES.

SPRING PLANTING.—We offer the largest and most complete general stock in the U. S., besides many Novelties. Catalogues sent to all regular customers, free. To others: No. 1, Fruits, 10c.; No 2, Ornamental Trees, etc., illustrated, 15c.; No. 3, Strawberries; No. 4, Wholesale; No. 5, Roses, free.

ELLWANGER & BARRY,
Mt. Hope Nurseries, Rochester, New York.

INVEST THROUGH THE SOUND AND RELIABLE
Western Farm Mortgage Co.

F. M. PERKINS, President. LAWRENCE, KAN. L. H. PERKINS, Secretary.

PAID UP CAPITAL, $250,000.00.

The choicest 1st Mortgage Farm Loans, also the Company's Ten Years Debentures based upon its paid up Capital and Assets of over $650,000. No Losses. Eleven Years Experience with absolute satisfaction to over 1,500 Investors. Send for circulars, forms, and full information; Branch Offices in N. Y. City and Albany; N. Y. Office, 137 Broadway. C. C. HINE & SON, Agents.

French, German, Spanish, Italian.

You can, by ten weeks' study, master either of these languages sufficiently for every-day and business conversation, by Dr. RICH. S. ROSENTHAL'S celebrated MEISTERSCHAFT SYSTEM. Terms, $5.00 for books of each language, with privilege of answers to all questions, and correction of exercises. Sample copy, Part I., 25 cents. Liberal terms to Teachers.

MEISTERSCHAFT PUBLISHING CO.,
Herald Building, Boston, Mass.

WALTER B. SAUNDERS 33 and 35 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.
Fine Art, Illustrated, Rare and Curious
BOOKS.
Priced Catalogues issued and sent upon application.

EYES Fitted with proper Glasses. Field, Marine, and Opera Glasses, Telescopes, Microscopes, Acoustic Cane for Deafness, Ear Cornets, etc. H. WALDSTEIN, Optician, 41 Union Square, New York. Catalogues by enclosing stamp. Established 1840.

BOOK CHAT shows at a glance every article appearing in the current magazines of the world, by subject; also gives digest of all new books. Samples, 10 cents; $1.00 per year.
BRENTANO BROS., 5 Union Square, New York.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANguages. Miscellaneous Books in Foreign Languages. Catalogues on application. Foreign Periodicals.
CARL SCHOENHOF, Importer, 144 Tremont St., Boston.

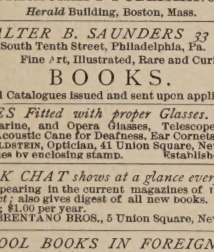
NASH & PIERCE, 80 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Booksellers. Local History, Genealogy, First American Editions, Old and Scarce Books in all departments. Catalogues sent on application.

NATION—SETS, VOLS., NUMBERS bought and sold by A. S. CLARK, 34 Park Row, N. Y.

INDEXES, DIFFICULT RESEARCHES, and books hard to find. E. A. MAC, 693 B'way, N. Y.

For convenience of subscribers wishing to permanently and uniformly bind their volumes, we can now furnish

Covers for the Nation,



In regular book form, ready for use by any bookbinder. These have black cloth sides, roan back and corners, and are stamped in gold on back The Nation and the number of the volume. Price 60 cents each, post-paid.

These covers will fit all volumes from XXXIII. to XLIII., i. e. since the increase in size to 24 pages each issue. (For the earlier volumes we cannot furnish covers.) In ordering state the volume-number wanted.

Address Publisher of the Nation, Box 794, New York.

CRITICAL AND SOCIAL ESSAYS.—Reprinted from the Nation, and in some measure supplying the place of the first two volumes of the paper, now very scarce. Cloth, 12mo, price $1.50. Sent post-paid, on receipt of price.
HENRY HOLT & CO., New York.

The Open Court.

A Fortnightly Journal published every other Thursday at 175 La Salle St., Chicago, by the Open Court Publishing Co.—B. F. UNDERWOOD (formerly editor of "The Index"), Editor and Manager; SARA A. UNDERWOOD, Associate Editor.

The Open Court, continuing the work of the Index, will aim to establish Ethics and Religion on the basis of Science—in furtherance of this object encouraging the freest and fullest discussion, by able thinkers, of all the great moral, religious, social, and philosophical questions, now engaging the attention of thoughtful minds. Editorially it will be thoroughly independent, asserting its own convictions with frankness and vigor. It will endeavor to substitute for unquestioning credulity intelligent inquiry; for blind faith, rational religious views; for unreasoning bigotry, a liberal spirit; and for sectarianism, a broad humanitarianism. While the critical work still needed in this transitional period will not be neglected, the most prominence will be given to the positive, affirmative side of modern thought. Subjects of practical interest will have preference over questions of pure speculation.

This new journal will aim to be broad and liberal in the best sense, and to keep the banner of Truth and Reason waving above the distractions, party contentions, theological controversies, and social and political crazes of the hour, submitting all opinions to careful scrutiny, and recalling men from their aberrations to sanity and the pathway of truth.

Among the contributors to the Open Court are M. D. Conway, James Parton, George Jacob Holyoake, M. J. Savage, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Edwin D. Mean, W. D. Gunning, Rowland Connor, Felix L. Oswald, John W. Chadwick, Ednah D. Cheney, Fred May Holland, W. J. Potter, Thos. Davidson, and Edmund Montgomery.

Terms, $3.00 per year; single copies, 15 cents.

Make all remittances payable to B. F. Underwood, and address the Open Court, P. O. Drawer F, Chicago, Ill.

Contents of the OPEN COURT for February 17:

SOCIETY AND THE INDIVIDUAL. By Wm. J. Potter.
THE NEED FOR FREE-THOUGHT EDUCATION. Thomas Davidson.
KALZENJAMMER. W. D. Gunning.
KING VOLTAIRE. Fred May Holland.
MONISM IN MODERN PHILOSOPHY AND THE AGNOSTIC ATTITUDE OF MIND. Edmund Montgomery.
THE TWO HEMISPHERES. B. W. Ball.
ETHNOLOGICAL STUDIES. Theodore Stanton.
APHORISMS FROM THE STUDY. Xenos Clark.
EDITORIALS.
THE BASIS OF ETHICS. Edward C. Hegeler.
DISCUSSION OF MR. HEGELER'S PAPER, by Messrs. Prussing, Stern, Underwood, and Zimmerman.
A LETTER FROM OUR JERUSALEM CORRESPONDENT, "Special."
BOOK NOTICES.
MISCELLANEOUS.

Gray's Botanies.

GRAY'S BOTANICAL SERIES,

By Prof. Asa Gray of Harvard University, provides the best and most complete equipment for all classes or for special students.

GRAY'S HOW PLANTS GROW.
For Introduction..... $ .80
GRAY'S SCHOOL AND FIELD BOOK.
For Introduction..... 1.80
GRAY'S MANUAL. For Introduction.. 1.62
GRAY'S BOTANIST'S MICROSCOPE.
Two lenses..... 2.00
GRAY'S BOTANIST'S MICROSCOPE.
Three lenses..... 2.50

Write for circulars and for terms for introduction of other works in the series.

IVISON, BLAKEMAN & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
753 and 755 Broadway, New York,
149 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

Books on Education.

"I do not think that D. C. Heath & Co. have ever printed a book on education that is not worthy to go on any 'Teacher's Reading List,' and the best list."—Dr. William T. Harris.

COMPAYRÉ'S HISTORY OF PEDAgogy. Translated by Professor W. H. Payne, University of Michigan. Price by mail, $1.75. "The best and most comprehensive history of education in English."—Dr. G. Stanley Hall.

GILL'S SYSTEMS OF EDUCATION. An account of the systems advocated by eminent educationists. Price, by mail, $1.10.
"I can say truly that I think it eminently worthy of a place on the Chatauqua Reading List, because it treats ably of the Lancaster and Bell movement in education—a very important phase."—Dr. William T. Harris.

RADESTOCK'S HABIT IN EDUCAtion. With an Introduction by Dr. G. Stanley Hall. Price, by mail, 65 cents. "It will prove a rare 'find' to teachers who are seeking to ground themselves in the philosophy of their art."—E. H. Russell, Prin. of Normal School, Worcester, Mass.

ROUSSEAU'S ÉMILE. Price by mail 85 cents.
"There are fifty pages of 'Émile' that should be bound in velvet and gold."—Voltaire.
"Perhaps the most influential book ever written on the subject of education."—R. H. Quick.

PESTALOZZI'S LEONARD AND GERtrude. With an Introduction by Dr. G. Stanley Hall. Price by mail, 85 cents.
"If we except Rousseau's 'Émile' only, no more important educational book has appeared for a century and a half than Pestalozzi's 'Leonard and Gertrude.'"—The Nation.

RICHTER'S LEVANA; THE DOCtrine of Education. A book that will tend to build that department of education which is most neglected, and yet needs most care—home training. By mail, $1.35.
"A spirited and scholarly book."—Prof. W. H. Payne, University of Michigan.

ROSMINI'S METHOD IN EDUCAtion. Price by mail, $1.75. Ready January 15.
"The best of the Italian books on education."—Editor London Journal of Education.

HALL'S METHODS OF TEACHING History. A symposium of eminent teachers of history. Price by mail, $1.40.
"Its excellence and helpfulness ought to secure it many readers."—The Nation.

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF PEDAGOGICAL Literature. Carefully selected and annotated by Dr. G. Stanley Hall. Covers every department of education. Price by mail, $1.75. Interleaved, $2.00.

LECTURES TO KINDERGARTNERS. By Elizabeth P. Peabody. Published at the urgency of a large number of kindergartners. By mail, $1.10.

MODERN PETROGRAPHY. An Account of the Application of the Microscope to the Study of Geology. by George Huntington Williams of the Johns Hopkins University. Price by mail, 25 cents.

THE STUDY OF LATIN IN THE Preparatory Course. By Edward P. Morris, M.A., Prof. of Latin, Williams Coll., Mass. By mail, 25 cts.

HOW TO TEACH READING, AND What to Read in the Schools. By G. Stanley Hall, Ph.D., Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy, Johns Hopkins University. Price by mail, 25 cents.
"Every teacher ought to buy it and read it three times."—Supt. A. P. Marble of Worcester.

MATHEMATICAL TEACHING AND its Modern Methods. By Truman H. Safford, Ph.D., Professor of Astronomy in Williams College. Price by mail, 25 cents.

SUGGESTIVE LESSONS IN LANguage and Reading. By Anna B. Badlam of the Rice Training School, Boston. Ready Jan. 15.

D. C. HEATH & CO., Publishers,
BOSTON, NEW YORK, AND CHICAGO.
Please mention the Nation.

Scribner & Welford's

NEW BOOKS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Campan's Marie Antoinette.

The Private Life of Marie Antoinette, Queen of France and Navarre, with Sketches and Anecdotes of the Court of Louis XVI.

By JEANNE LOUISE HENRIETTE CAMPAN, First Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen. New edition, in 1 volume, with 4 Portraits on steel. Crown 8vo, cloth, $2.25.

"Despite the stupendous mass of literature which exists in reference to the French Revolution and its antecedents, Madame Campan's 'Memoirs of Marie Antoinette' still supply the most vivid, and, as some writers say, 'matterful' collection of statements about the Queen. Perhaps there is still no single book of anecdotic history which may be read with such advantage."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Modern Hinduism.

Being an Account of the Religion and Life of the Hindus in Northern India.

By W. J. WILKINS of the London Missionary Society, author of 'Hindu Mythology—Vedic and Purânic.' Demy 8vo, cloth, $5.25.

GENERAL CONTENTS:

EARLY LIFE.—Birth and Ceremonies—The Hindu Home—The Guru, and Initiation into Hinduism.
HINDU SECTS.—Vedantism—The Vaishnave—Saivite—Saktas, etc., etc.
CASTE.—
WORSHIP.—Private — Temple — Festivals—Pilgrimages, etc.
WOMAN.—Her Position—Marriage Ceremonies—Widows—Sati.
MORALS.—Death—Shrâdha, and Future Judgment.

Studies in Religious History.

By ERNEST RENAN.

Post 8vo, cloth (481 pp.), $2.40.

Contents: Experimental Method Applied to Religion, Paganism, Comparative Mythology, First Works on Buddhism, New Works on Buddhism, The Translations of the Bible, The Teaziehs of Persia, Joachim di Fior and the Eternal Gospel, Francis of Assisi, A Monastic Idyl of the XIIIth Century, Religious Art, The Congregatione "de Auxiliis," A Word upon Galileo's Trial, Port Royal, Spinoza.

THE SOCIALISM OF TO-DAY. By EMILE DE LAVELEYE. Translated by G. H. Orpen, together with an Account of Socialism in England by the translator. 12mo, $2.40.

COURT AND PRIVATE LIFE IN THE TIME OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE. Being the Journals of Mrs. Papendiek, Bedchamber-woman to Her Majesty. Edited by Mrs. VERNON DELVES BROUGHTON. In 2 vols. demy 8vo, with Portraits. Cloth. $12.80.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL. By HEINRICH EWALD. Vol. 8. (Completing the Work.) The Post Apostolic Age. Translated by J. F. SMITH. 8vo. Cloth. $7.20. Vols. 1–7 also on hand; price, $40.00.

FIVE O'CLOCK TEA. Containing receipts for cakes of every description, savory sandwiches, cooling drinks, etc., etc. 12mo. Cloth, 60 cents.

PARLEYINGS WITH CERTAIN PEOPLE OF IMPORTANCE IN THEIR DAY. To wit: Bernard De Mandeville, Daniel Bartoli, Christopher Smart, George Bubb Dodington, Francis Furini, Gerard de Lairesse, and Charles Avison. Introduced by a Dialogue between Apollo and the Fates. Concluded by another between John Fust and his Friends. By ROBERT BROWNING. English Edition, Fcap, 8vo, cloth, $3.60.

"The respectable and sometimes excellent translations of Bohn's Library have done for Literature what railroads have done for internal intercourse."—R. W. Emerson.

"I may say in regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefullest thing I know."—Thomas Carlyle.

Bohn's Libraries.

CONTAINING

STANDARD WORKS of EUROPEAN LITERATURE in the ENGLISH LANGUAGE,

With Dictionaries and other Books of Reference,

Comprising in all Translations from the French, German, Italian, Spanish, Scandinavian, Anglo-Saxon, Latin, and Greek.

687 Volumes, $1.40 or $2 each, with exceptions.

RECENT ADDITIONS.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE LATIN AND TEUTONIC NATIONS. Translated by P. A. Ashworth, Translator of Dr. Gneist's 'History of the English Constitution.'

HEINE'S TRAVEL-PICTURES: including the Tour in the Harz, Norderney, and Book of Ideas, together with the Romantic School. Translated by Francis Storr. With Appendices and Map.

GOETHE'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH ZELTER. Selected, Translated, and Edited by A. D. Coleridge, M.A.

THE STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF HISTORICAL GEOLOGY. By A. J. Jukes-Browne, B.A., F.G.S., of the Geological Survey of England and Wales. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations.

WERNER'S TEMPLARS IN CYPRUS. Translated by E. A. M. Lewis.
"Werner was a Freemason, and his religious notions were, at the date of his writing this poem, of a theosophic order."—Preface.

PAUSANIAS'S DESCRIPTION OF GREECE. Translated into English, with Notes and Index, by A. R. Shilleto, M.A. 2 vols.

HOFFMANN'S TALES. The Serapion Brethren. First Portion, containing Thirteen Tales. Translated from the German by Major A. Ewing.

HAUFF'S TALES. The Caravan—The Sheik of Alexandria—The Inn in the Spessart. Translated by S. Mendel.

GOLDSMITH'S WORKS. A New Edition, containing pieces hitherto uncollected and a Life of the Author, with Notes from Various Sources. By J. W. M. Gibbs. 5 vols.

FOSTER'S ESSAY ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF TIME. Together with Notes of Sermons and other Pieces.

CHRISTIAN ICONOGRAPHY; or, The History of Christian Art in the Middle Ages. By the late A. N. Didron. Translated from the French by E. J. Millington, and completed, with Additions and Appendices, by M. Stokes. 2 vols., with numerous Illustrations.

TALFOURD'S LETTERS OF CHARLES LAMB. With Explanatory Notes. New Edition, Revised and Greatly Enlarged by W. Carew Hazlitt. 2 vols.

HAZLITT'S SPIRIT OF THE AGE; or, Contemporary Portraits. New Edition. By W. C. Hazlitt.

A SELECTION.

ANTONINUS.—THE THOUGHTS OF M. AURELIUS.
BAX'S MANUAL OF THE HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.
BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON (Centenary Edition, edited by Napier). 6 vols.
CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE. 2 vols. Translated.
COLERIDGE'S WORKS. 6 vols.
FAIRHOLT'S COSTUME IN ENGLAND. (Dillon) 2 vols.
HUGO'S (VICTOR) POEMS. Translated.
MOLIERE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. 3 vols.
PEPYS' DIARY. 4 vols.
RICHTER'S LEVANA.
RICHTER'S FLOWER, FRUIT, AND THORN PIECES.
SPINOZA'S CHIEF WORKS. Translated. 2 vols.
TAUNTON'S CHESS HANDBOOK.

* The above books will be sent upon receipt of advertised price. Catalogues of our regular stock will be mailed, if desired, to those interested. New Catalogue of Musical Literature ready. New Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books nearly ready.*

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

PUBLISHED TO-MORROW:

Scribner's Magazine

FOR MARCH. (Vol. I., No. 3.)

25 cents a Number. $3.00 a Year.

CONTENTS:

PORTRAIT OF M. THIERS, Frontispiece.
Engraved from the painting by Healy.

The Stability of the Earth. By Prof. N. S. Shaler of Harvard University. With illustrations drawn by Meeker, Davis, Turner, Gibson, and Robinson.

Aunt Fountain's Prisoner (A Story). By Joel Chandler Harris.

Reminiscences of the Siege and Commune of Paris. By ex-Minister E. B. Washburne. THE COMMUNE. With illustrations by Howard Pyle, T. de Thulstrup, Maynard, and others.

Seth's Brother's Wife.—Chapters X.–XII. By Harold Frederic.

The Story of a New York House.—III. By H. C. Bunner. Illustrated by A. B. Frost.

An Interlude (Poem). By R. Armytage.

The Bayeux Tapestry. By Edward J. Lowell. With illustrations from Photographs of the Tapestry.

The Residuary Legatee; or, The Posthumous Jest of the late John Austin. Part Second—THE CODICIL. By J. S. of Dale.

Ballade of the Penitents (Poem). By Andrew Lang.

What is an Instinct? By Prof. William James of Harvard University.

Father Andrei; The Story of a Russian Priest. By Robert Gordon Butler.

"Cordon!" (a Story). By T. R. Sullivan.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS.

 Remittances should be sent by post money-order or registered letter to

Charles Scribner's Sons,

743–745 Broadway, New York.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1887.

The Week.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S veto of the little Texas Seed Bill is a fit pendant to his veto of the great Dependent Pension Bill. Nothing could possibly have happened better calculated to enforce the moral of his negative upon a great Northern raid on the public Treasury than this opportunity to block a petty Southern raid. It was the same principle as that of the Pension Bill, that the Government ought to come to the help of anybody who is in distress, which prompted the passage of the Seed Bill. Certain Texas counties have suffered severely from a long-continued drought, and the farmers are in need of seed-grain. But instead of organizing a movement to relieve this distress in the only proper way, by the subscriptions of their fellow-citizens in Texas, or by an appropriation of the State Legislature, an appeal was made to Congress for $10,000 worth of seeds for distribution among the sufferers, and the appeal was granted by both the Senate and House. This was only an extension of the same theory which has led many Southerners to endorse a scheme for appropriations from the Federal Treasury to help support the public schools in their States, instead of having the States themselves fully support them, as they are abundantly able to do. "It is hard," they said, "for our people to raise as much money as we need to secure good schools. If we are going to extend the length of the terms, as we ought to do, we shall have to increase the rate of taxation. Now, there is a great surplus in the Treasury at Washington. What better use can be made of it than to devote part of it to improving our schools?"

The demand of Northern Republicans for more pensions for Union soldiers, and the demand of Southern Democrats for Federal appropriations for their schools, were thus based upon the same fundamental principle, that an appeal to the general Government for assistance is in order whenever anybody needs help—in other words, that the Government should support the people. It is this principle which Mr. Cleveland combats in his pension and seed-bill vetoes. "I can find no warrant for such an appropriation in the Constitution," says the President in his message of last week; "and I do not believe that the power and duty of the general Government ought to be extended to the relief of individual suffering which is in no manner properly related to the public service or benefit. A prevalent tendency to disregard the limited mission of this power and duty should, I think, be steadfastly resisted, to the end that the lesson should be constantly enforced that, though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people." After remarking that the friendliness and charity of our countrymen can always be relied upon to relieve their fellow-citizens in misfortune, as "has been repeatedly and quite lately demonstrated" (referring evidently to the liberal contributions for the relief of Charleston), Mr. Cleveland says: "Federal aid in such cases encourages the expectation of paternal care on the part of the Government, and weakens the sturdiness of our national character, while it prevents the indulgence among our people of that kindly sentiment and conduct which strengthens the bonds of a common brotherhood."

The report of the House Pension Committee in favor of passing the Pauper Pension Bill over the President's veto is an exceedingly weak attempt at self-defence. The best reply to their plea that the bill is a just and proper measure, is the fact pointed out by a Union soldier in a published letter that, while a wounded veteran may receive only $4 per month, this law would give $12 per month to "bounty-jumpers and drafted men, whether they ever smelled gunpowder in the service or not." The arrant demagogism which is behind the scheme clearly appears in the claim that "the surplus in the Treasury can be best restored to the people in the manner proposed in the bill." As for the charge that protests against it "only come from money centres," the best answer is the remarkable series of letters to the President from Union veterans, many of them wounded and crippled men, who are strong Republicans in politics, thanking him for his veto. A more striking evidence of the real feeling among self-respecting soldiers could not be imagined than these voluntary communications to the President, extorted from political opponents by admiration of his moral courage in vetoing this gigantic job of the claim agents.

A few Bourbon Republican papers, which still cling to the bloody shirt, criticise the President for having signed a Mexican War pension bill under which "rebels" may draw pensions. But the real objects of criticism are the Republicans in Congress who sent the President such a measure with their all but unanimous endorsement. The bill which the President signed went through the lower branch precisely as it came from the Republican Senate, and the vote of the Republican Representatives on its passage was 105 yeas against but 2 nays. Congressman Grosvenor of Ohio is now quoted as estimating that "at least three-fourths of the beneficiaries under the Mexican Pension Bill will be persons who were actively disloyal during the war"; but, upon consulting the list of yeas and nays, we find among the yeas the name of Grosvenor. Nor can he plead that he voted in ignorance, for during the brief debate on the passage of the bill the fact that "rebels" might draw pensions under it was distinctly brought out. If anybody is to be blamed by Republican organs because ex-Confederates may now get on the pension rolls, it is Grosvenor and the 104 other Republican Representatives who voted without protest for a bill placing them upon it.

The Senate having passed the Trade-Dollar Bill with the House amendment, which provides that the trade dollars shall not be counted as part of the monthly purchase and coinage under the Bland Act, but shall be additional thereto, we earnestly hope that the President will veto it, and that he will not be deterred from doing so by any consideration of the chance of its being passed over a veto. We have seen how great an influence in an educational point of view the veto of the Pauper Pension Bill has proved to be. The Trade-Dollar Bill, in any aspect, is in the nature of a gratuity from the Treasury to a lot of speculators (or their successors) who bought these coins in China at various rates of discount, averaging, perhaps, 85 cents to the dollar, and brought them back to this country to be passed off, or sold to the Government, at 100 cents. The trade dollar was never a legal tender, except for small sums, in the same way that halves and quarters and dimes are now. This limited legal-tender quality was given to it by inadvertence in the coinage act of 1873. The mistake was not noticed until 1876. It was then corrected, and the trade dollar became what it was intended originally to be, viz., a mere ingot manufactured for the Chinese market, designed to promote the sale of silver in a foreign country, having no legal-tender character whatever. Strict justice would require that all trade dollars coined prior to July 22, 1876, should continue to be legal tender for sums under $5. All such trade dollars would gradually work their way to the Treasury and would be redeemed according to the terms of their coinage. The mistake of putting them in the same category as the halves and quarters—a sufficiently costly one—would thus be paid for, and justice would be satisfied. Anything beyond this is a sheer gratuity and donation, in comparison with which the Texas Seed Bill, for example, is the merest trifle. The latter proposed to give certain poor people—much poorer and more deserving than the holders of the trade dollars—the sum of $10,000 to buy seed for their spring sowing. Ten thousand dollars is a definite sum of money, and an inconsiderable one for a Government like ours. But the bill was vetoed upon the sound constitutional and moral ground that the Government is not a charitable institution, and the veto was sustained.

The Trade-Dollar Bill calls for an indefinite sum and a very large sum. The Financial Chronicle, an excellent authority, estimates the number of trade dollars that will be brought in under the bill at upwards of $20,000,000, the total coinage having been nearly $36,000,000. But it remains to speak of the character imparted to the measure by the House amendment, which provides that the trade dollars shall be coined into standard silver dollars or subsidi-

